

The Student's Manual of English Literature

A HISTORY OF
ENGLISH LITERATURE

By THOMAS B. SHAW, M.A.

EDITED, WITH NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS,

By SIR WILLIAM SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D.

REVISED AND ENLARGED.

LONDON
JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

1895.

MURRAY'S STUDENTS' MANUALS

A Series of Historical Works, from the Creation of the World to the present time.

With 7 Coloured Maps and 70 Woodcuts (830 pp.), Crown 8vo., 7s. 6d.

THE STUDENT'S HUMB A HISTORY OF ENGLAND FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE REVOLUTION IN 1688. Based on the History of DAVID HUME. Incorporating the Corrections and Emendations of recent Historians. First Edition contributed to the Treaty of Berlin 1878. By the late Professor J. B. HURTER, M.A.

The Work may also be obtained in Three Volumes. Price 2s. 6d. each.

PART I—B.C. 25—1688. PART II—A.D. 1688—1815. PART III—1815—1878.

Also the following Volumes. 7s. 6d. each

STUDENTS' HISTORY OF MODERN EUROPE. FROM THE CAPTURE OF CONSTANTINOPLE BY THE TURKS IN 1453 TO THE TREATY OF BERLIN IN 1878. By the late Professor J. B. HURTER, M.A.

STUDENTS' HISTORY OF EUROPE DURING THE MIDDLE AGES. By HENRY HALLAM

STUDENTS' CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. FROM THE REIGN OF HENRY VII. By HENRY HALLAM

STUDENTS' OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY. By PHILIP SMITH. With Maps and Woodcuts.

STUDENTS' NEW TESTAMENT HISTORY. By PHILIP SMITH. With Maps
and Woodcuts.

STUDENTS' ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY. 2 Vols. I A.D. 50—1033 II
1033—1614. By PHILIP SMITH. With Woodcuts.

STUDENTS' ENGLISH CHURCH HISTORY. 3 Vols. I 1500—1600 II 1600—
1717 III 1717—1824. By Canon PREST

STUDENTS' HISTORY OF GREECE TO THE ROMAN CONQUEST. By Wm. SMITH. With Coloured Maps and Woodcuts.

STUDENTS' HISTORY OF ROME. TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE EMPIRE.
By DEAN LINGG. With Coloured Maps and Woodcuts.

STUDENTS' ROMAN EMPIRE. FROM ITS ESTABLISHMENT TO THE REIGN OF COMMODOUS 180. By J. B. HURTER. With Coloured Maps and Illustrations.

STUDENTS' DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. By EDWARD GIMON. With Woodcuts.

STUDENTS' HISTORY OF FRANCE TO THE FALL OF THE SECOND EMPIRE.
By W. H. JEVES. With Coloured Maps and Woodcuts.

STUDENTS' ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY. By Canon DEYAN. With Woodcuts.

STUDENTS' MODERN GEOGRAPHY. MATHEMATICAL, PHYSICAL, AND DES-
SCRIPTIVE. By Canon DEYAN. With Woodcuts.

STUDENTS' GEOGRAPHY OF BRITISH INDIA. PHYSICAL AND POLITICAL.
By Dr. GEORGE SMITH. With Maps.

STUDENTS' ENGLISH LANGUAGE. ITS ORIGIN AND GROWTH. By GEORGE F. MARSH.

STUDENTS' ENGLISH LITERATURE. WITH BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICES OF THE AUTHORS. By T. B. SHAW.

STUDENTS' SPECIMENS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. By T. B. SHAW.

STUDENTS' MORAL PHILOSOPHY. By DR. FLEMING.

Detailed Catalogues sent by post on application.

PREFACE.

THE present work, which was originally published under the title of 'Outlines of English Literature,' has been entirely re-written with a special view to the requirements of Students, so as to make it, as far as space would allow, a complete History of English Literature. The Author devoted to its composition the labour of several years, sparing neither time nor pains to render it both instructive and interesting. In consequence of Mr Shaw's lamented death the MS was placed in my hands to prepare it for publication as one of Mr Murray's STUDENT'S MANUALS, for which purpose it seems to me peculiarly well adapted. Through long familiarity with the subject, and great experience as a teacher, the Author knew how to seize the salient points in English literature, and to give prominence to those writers and those subjects which ought to occupy the main attention of the Student. Considering the size of the book, the amount of information which it conveys is really remarkable, while the space devoted to the more important names, such as Bacon, Shakspeare, Milton, Dryden, Addison, Sir Walter Scott, and others, is sufficient to impress upon the Student a vivid idea of their lives and writings. The Author has certainly succeeded in his attempt "to render the work as little dry—as readable, in short—as is consistent with accuracy and comprehensiveness."

As Editor, I have carefully revised the whole work, completed the concluding chapters left unfinished by the Author, and inserted at the end of the first and second chapters a brief account of Anglo-Saxon, Norman, and early English Literature, in order to render the work as useful as possible to Students preparing for the examination of the India Civil Service, the University of London, and the like. Moreover I have, in the other Notes and Illustrations, given an account of the less important persons, which though not designed for continuous perusal, will be useful for reference, for which purpose a copious Index has been added. All living writers are, for obvious reasons, excluded.

THIRD EDITION.

THIS Edition has been carefully revised, and there has been added a Chronological List of the works of the most eminent English poets of the fourteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, together with an account of the Poet-Laureateship, and a list of Poets-Laureate

W S

London, January, 1867

TENTH EDITION

IN this Edition the Chapter on Shakspeare has been revised throughout, and in part rewritten, by Edward Dowden, LL D, Professor of English Literature in the University of Dublin, from whom also important corrections have been received in other portions of the book.

W S

London, July, 1875

SIXTEENTH EDITION

THE lives of Charles Dickens, George Eliot, Lord Lytton, Lord Beaconsfield, Anthony Trollope, Thomas Carlyle, Dean Stanley, and John Stuart Mill, written by Mr Rowley, M A, Professor of English Literature, University College, Bristol, are now added, and numerous other corrections have been made.

W S

London, January, 1887

TWENTIETH EDITION

IN consequence of the death of several distinguished writers since the publication of the last edition, such as Tennyson, Browning, Matthew Arnold, Charles Kingsley, Cardinal Newman, Dean Church, Darwin, Sir Henry Maine, and others, a new chapter has been added, which also has been written by Professor Rowley, and it is hoped that, owing to his diligence, all names in recent English Literature, except those of living authors, are now inserted either in the text, or in the Notes and Illustrations appended to the chapter. Several important additions and many corrections in certain chapters have been made, for which the Editor is indebted to Mr T W Lyster, M A, of the National Library of Ireland, and it is believed that the Work, in its present form, will be still more worthy of the favour with which it has been hitherto received.

W S

London, October, 1893

A BRIEF MEMOIR OF THE AUTHOR.

THOMAS BUDD SHAW, born in Gower Street, London, on the 12th of October, 1813, was the seventh son of John Shaw, F R S, an eminent architect. From a very early period of his life, though of delicate constitution, he manifested that delight in the acquisition of knowledge which was continued throughout his subsequent career. In the year 1822 he accompanied his maternal uncle, the Rev Francis Whitfield, to Barbico in the West Indies, where that gentleman was the officiating clergyman, and who was eminently qualified as a scholar and an accomplished gentleman to advance his nephew in his studies and in the formation of his character. On his return from the West Indies, in 1827, he entered the Free School at Shrewsbury, where he became a favourite pupil of Dr Butler, afterwards Bishop of Lichfield. Here the writer of this brief record recollects that it was remarked of the subject of it that, although inferior to some of his contemporaries in the critical exactness of his scholarship, he was surpassed by none in the intuitive power with which he comprehended the genius and spirit of the great writers of antiquity. At this early period also, apart from school exercises, he rapidly accumulated that general and varied knowledge of books and things which when acquired seemed never to be forgotten.

From Shrewsbury, in 1833, Mr Shaw proceeded to St John's College, Cambridge. On taking his degree, in 1836, he became tutor in the family of an eminent merchant, and subsequently, in 1840, he was induced to leave England for Russia, where he commenced his useful and honourable career, finally settling in St Petersburg in the year 1841. Here he formed an intimacy with M Warrand, Professor at the University of St Petersburg, through whose influence, in 1842, he obtained the appointment of Professor of English Literature at the Imperial Alexander Lyceum. His lectures were eagerly attended: no professor acquired more thoroughly the love and respect of his pupils, many of whom continued his warmest admirers and friends in after life. In October in the same year he married Miss Annette Warrand, daughter of the Professor.

In 1851 he came to England for the purpose of taking his Master of Arts degree, and on his return to Russia was elected Lector of English Literature at the University of St. Petersburg. His first pupils were the Princes of Leuchtenberg, and, his reputation being now thoroughly established, he was in 1853 engaged as tutor and

Professor of English to the Grand Dukes, an appointment which he retained till his death

For nine years Mr Shaw's position was in every respect enviable, happy in his married life, loved by his pupils, respected and honoured by all for his high attainments and many virtues, his life passed in peace and prosperity. A few years more, and his means would have enabled him to retire and pass the evening of his life in literary pursuits. But this was not to be. In October, 1862, he complained of pain in the region of the heart, yet he struggled hard against his malady, until nature could bear no more. For a few days before his death he suffered acutely, but bore his sufferings with manly fortitude. On the 14th of November he was relieved from them, dying suddenly of aneurism. His death was regarded as a public loss, and his funeral was attended by their Imperial Highnesses and a large concourse of present and former students of the Lyceum. A subscription was raised, and a monument is erected to his memory.

The following is a list of such of Mr Shaw's works as have come to our notice.

In 1836 he wrote several pieces for 'The Fellow' and 'Fraser's Magazine'. In 1837 he translated into verse numerous German and Latin poems, and wrote a few original poems of merit, some of which appeared in 'The Individual'. Two well-written pieces, 'The Song of Hrolfkraken the Sea King,' and 'The Surgeon's Song,' were contributions to 'Fraser's Magazine'. In 1838 and two following years he contributed several translations from the Italian to 'Fraser'. In 1842 he started 'The St. Petersburg Literary Review,' he also published in 'Blackwood' a translation of 'Annalet Bek,' a Russian novel, by Marlinski. In 1844 he published his first work of considerable length, a translation of 'The Heretic,' a novel in three volumes, by Layetchnikoff. The work was well received, and an edition was immediately reprinted in New York. In the following year appeared in 'Blackwood' his 'Life of Poushkin, accompanied by exquisite translations of several of the finest of that poet's productions. In 1846 his leisure time was entirely occupied in writing his 'Outlines of English Literature,' a work expressly undertaken at the request of the authorities of the Lyceum, and for the use of the pupils of that establishment. The edition was speedily sold, and immediately reprinted in Philadelphia. A second edition was published by Mr Murray in 1849, and the edition now offered to the public is the fruit of his later years and mature judgment. It may, indeed, be said to be an entirely new work, as the whole has been re-written. In 1850 he published in the 'Quarterly' an exceedingly original and curious article, entitled 'Forms of Salutation.'

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

	PAGE
ORIGIN OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE	1

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS.—

A Anglo-Saxon Literature	17
B Anglo-Norman Literature	20
C Semi-Saxon Literature	25
D Old English Literature	27

CHAPTER II.

THE AGE OF CHAUCER	29
--------------------	----

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —

A. The Predecessors of Gower and Chaucer	49
B. John Gower	51
C Wicliffe and his School	55

CHAPTER III.

FROM THE DEATH OF CHAUCER TO THE AGE OF ELIZABETH	56
---	----

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —

A Minor Poets	67
B Minor Prose Writers	68

CHAPTER IV

THE ELIZABETHAN POETS (INCLUDING THE REIGN OF JAMES I)	70
--	----

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —

A The Mirror for Magistrates	84
B Minor Poets in the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I	85

CHAPTER V

THE NEW PHILOSOPHY AND PROSE LITERATURE IN THE REIGNS OF ELIZABETH AND JAMES I	93
---	----

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS' —

Minor Prose Writers in the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I	108
--	-----

CHAPTER VI.

	PAGE
THE DAWN OF THE DRAMA	111

CHAPTER VII

SHAKESPEARE	134
-----------------------	-----

CHAPTER VIII

THE SHAKESPEARIAN DRAMATISTS	160
--	-----

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —

Other Dramatists	176
----------------------------	-----

CHAPTER IX.

THE SO-CALLED METAPHYSICAL POETS	177
--	-----

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —

Other Poets	187
-----------------------	-----

CHAPTER X.

THEOLOGICAL WRITERS OF THE CIVIL WAR AND THE COMMONWEALTH	188
---	-----

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —

Other Theological and Moral Writers	193
---	-----

CHAPTER XI

JOHN MILTON	199
-----------------------	-----

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —

Contemporaries of Milton	220
------------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER XII.

THE AGE OF THE RESTORATION	222
--------------------------------------	-----

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —

Other Writers	249
-------------------------	-----

CHAPTER XIII

THE NEW DRAMA AND THE CORRECT POETS	250
---	-----

CHAPTER XIV.

THE SECOND REVOLUTION	269
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —
A Other Theological Writers	284
B Other Prose Writers	286

CHAPTER XV.

POPE, SWIFT, AND THE AUGUSTAN POETS	287
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —
Minor Poets	312

CHAPTER XVI

THE ESSAYISTS	314
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —
A. Minor Essayists, &c	328
B Boyle and Bentley Controversy	328
Other Writers	330

CHAPTER XVII

THE GREAT NOVELISTS	332
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —
Other Novelists	354

CHAPTER XVIII

HISTORICAL, MORAL, POLITICAL, AND THEOLOGICAL WRITERS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY	355
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —
Theological Writers	376
Philosophical Writers	377
Historians and Scholars	379
Miscellaneous Writers	380
Novelists	381

CHAPTER XIX.

THE DAWN OF ROMANTIC POETRY	389
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —
Other Poets of the Eighteenth Century	407

CHAPTER XX

	PAGE
WALTER SCOTT . . .	412

CHAPTER XXI

BYRON, MOORE, SHELLEY, KEATS, CAMPBELL, LEIGH HUNT, AND WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR	435
---	-----

CHAPTER XXII

WORDSWORTH, COLERIDGE, AND SOUTHBY	461
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —
Other Poets of the Nineteenth Century	475

CHAPTER XXIII

THE MODERN NOVELISTS	480
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —
Other Novelists	504

ADDENDUM —

CHARLES DICKENS, LORD LYTTON, GEORGE ELIOT, BENJAMIN DISRAELI, ANTHONY TROLLOPE	505
--	-----

CHAPTER XXIV

PROSE LITERATURE OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY	517
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —
Other Prose Writers of the Nineteenth Century	543

CHAPTER XXV

MORE RECENT WRITERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY	545
NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS —
Other Poets	581
Other Historians	585
Other Novelists and Miscellaneous Writers	590
Philosophers and Divines	592

CHRONOLOGICAL LIST of the Works of the Poets of the Fourteenth, Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Eighteenth Centuries	597
---	-----

POETS-LAUREATE, with an Account of the Origin of the Office	609
---	-----

INDEX	613
-------	-----

ENGLISH LITERATURE.

CHAPTER I

ORIGIN OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE

- 1 The most ancient inhabitants of the British Isles § 2 The Roman occupation § 3 Traces of the Celtic and Latin periods in the English language. § 4 Teutonic settlements in Britain § 5 Anglo-Saxon language and literature § 6 Effects of the Norman conquest upon the English population and language. § 7 Romance Literature, Norman Trouvères and Provençal Troubadours § 8 Change of Anglo-Saxon into English § 9 Principal epochs of the English language

1 WITHIN the limited territory comprised by a portion of the British Isles has grown up a language which has become the speech of the most free, the most energetic, and the most powerful portion of the human race, and which seems destined to be, at no distant period, the universal medium of communication throughout the globe. It is a language, the literature of which, inferior to none in variety or extent, is superior to all others in manliness of spirit and in universality of scope, and it has exerted a great and a continually increasing influence upon the progress of human thought and the improvement of human happiness. To trace the rise and formation of such a language cannot be otherwise than interesting and instructive.

The most ancient inhabitants of the British Islands, concerning whom history has handed down to us any certain information, were a branch of that Celtic race which appears to have once occupied a large portion of Western Europe. Though the causes and period of their immigration into Europe are lost in the clouds of pre-historical tradition, this people, under the various appellations of Celts, Gael (Gaul) or Cymry (Cimbrians), seems to have covered a very large extent of territory, and to have retained strong traces, in its Druidical worship, its astronomical science, and many other features, of a remote Oriental descent. It is far from probable, however, that this race ever attained more than the lowest degree of civilization: the earliest records of it which we possess, at the time when it came in contact with the Roman arms, show it to have been then in a condition very little superior to barbarism—a fact sufficiently indicated by its nomad and predatory mode of existence, by the absence of agriculture, and above all by the universal practice of that infallible sign of a savage state, the habit of tattooing and staining the body. Whether the Phœnicians ever extended their navigation to the British Islands must remain doubtful, but their intercourse with the natives must in any case have been confined to the southern coast of the island, and there is no ground for supposing that the influence of the more polished strangers could have produced any change in the great body of the Celtic population.

§ 2 The first important intercourse between the primitive Britons and any foreign nation was the invasion of the country by the Romans in the year 55 B.C. Julius Cæsar, having subdued the territory occupied by the Gauls, a cognate tribe, speaking the same language and characterized by the same customs, religion, and political institutions, found himself on the shores of the Channel, within sight of the white cliffs of Albion, and naturally desired to push his conquests into the region inhabited by a people whom the Romans considered as dwelling at the very extremity of the earth "penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos." The resistance of the Britons, though obstinate and ferocious, was gradually overpowered in the first century of the Christian era by the superior skill and military organization of the Roman armies: the country became a Roman province, and the Roman domination, though extending only to the central and southern portion of the country, that is, to England proper, exclusive of Wales, the mountainous portion of Scotland and the whole of Ireland, may be regarded as having subsisted about 480 years. A large body of Roman troops was permanently stationed in the new province, a great military road, defended by strongly fortified posts, extended from the southern coast at least as far as York, and the invaders, as was their custom, endeavoured to introduce among their barbarous subjects their laws, their habits, and their civilization. In the course of this long occupation by the Roman power, the native population became naturally divided into two distinct and hostile classes. Such of the Celts as submitted to the yoke of their invaders acquired a considerable degree of civilization, learnt the Latin language, and became a Latinized or provincial race, similar to the inhabitants on the other side of the Channel. The other portion of the Celts, namely, those who inhabited mountainous regions inaccessible to the Roman arms, and those who, refusing to submit to the invaders, fled from the southern districts to take refuge in their rugged fastnesses, retained, we may be sure, with their hostility to the invaders, their own language, dress, customs, and religion, and it was these who, periodically descending from the mountains of Wales and Scotland, carried devastation over the more civilized province, and taxed the skill and vigilance of the Roman troops. It was to restrain the incursions of these savages that a strong wall was constructed in the reign of Severus across the narrowest portion of the island, from the river Tyne to the Solway Frith. When the Roman troops were at length withdrawn from Britain, in order to defend Italy itself against the innumerable hordes of barbarians which menaced it, we can easily comprehend the desperate position in which the Romanized portion of the population now found itself. Having in all probability lost, during their long subjection, the valour which originally distinguished them, having acquired the vices of servitude without the union which civilization can give, they found themselves exposed to the furious incursions of hungry barbarians, eager to reconquer what they considered as their birthright, and who, intense as was their hatred of the victorious Romans, must have looked with a still fiercer enmity on their degenerate countrymen, as traitors and cowards who had basely submitted to a foreign yoke. Down from their mountains rushed the avenging swarms of Scottish and Pictish savages, and commenced taking a terrible vengeance on their unhappy countrymen. Every trace of civilization was swept away, the furious devastation which they carried through the land is commemorated in the ancient songs and legends of the Cymry, and the objects of their vengeance, after vainly imploring the assistance of Rome in a most piteous appeal, had recourse to the only resource now left them, of hiring some warlike race of foreign adventurers to protect them. These adventurers were the Saxon pirates.

§ 3 Before approaching the second act in the great drama of English history, it will be well to clear the ground by making a few remarks upon the traces left by the Celtic period in the language of the country. It must first of all be distinctly remembered that the Celtic dialect, whether in the form still spoken in Wales, which is supposed to be the most similar to the language of the ancient Britons, or in that employed in the Highlands of Scotland and among the Celtic population of Ireland, has only a very remote affinity to modern English. It is in all respects a completely different tongue, and so completely insignificant has been its influence on the present language that, in a vocabulary consisting of about 40,000 words, it would be difficult to point out a hundred derived directly from the Celtic.*

It is true that the English language contains a considerable number of words ultimately traceable to Celtic roots, but these have been introduced into it through the medium of the French, which, together with an enormous majority of Latin words, contains some of

* On the Celtic element in the English language, see 'The Student's Manual of the English Language,' p. 2^a seq., and p. 45.

Gaulish origin. The same remark may be made respecting the prominent Latin element in the English language. The Latin words, which constitute three-fifths of our language, cannot in any instance be proved to have derived their origin from any corrupt Latin dialect spoken in Britain, but to have been filtered, so to speak, through some of the various forms of the great Romance speech from which French, Italian, and Spanish are derived. One class of words, however, is traceable to the Brito-Roman period of our history, and this is ineffaceably stamped upon the geography of the British Isles. In Wales, in the Highlands of Scotland, and in Ireland, where the population is pure and unmixed, the names of places have probably remained unaltered from a very remote period, perhaps long anterior to the invasion of Julius Cæsar, and even in those parts of the country which have been successively occupied by very different races, many appellations of pure Celtic antiquity have survived the inundations of new peoples, and may still be marked, like some venerable Druidical cromlech, standing in hoar mysterious age in the midst of a more recent civilization. Thus the termination "don" is in some instances the Celtic word "dun," a rock or natural fortress. Again, the termination "caster" or "chester" is unquestionably a monument of the Roman occupation of the island, indicating the spot of a Roman "castrum" or fortified post.*

§ 4 The true foundations of the English laws, language, and national character were laid, between the middle of the fifth and the middle of the sixth centuries, deep in the solid granite of Teutonic antiquity. The piratical adventurers whom the old German passion for plunder and glory, and also, perhaps, the entreaties of the "miserable Britons," allured across the North Sea from the bleak shores of their native Jutland, Schleswig, Holstein, and the coasts of the Baltic, were the most fearless navigators and the most redoubted sea-kings of those ages. On their arrival in Britain, concerning which the early chronicles are filled with vague and picturesque legends, like that of Hengist and Horsa, these rovers were in every respect savages, though their rugged energetic Teuton nature, so admirably sketched by Tacitus at a preceding period, offered a rich and fertile soil capable of being developed by Christianity and civilization into a noble type of national character. Successive bands of the same race, attracted by the reports of their predecessors respecting the superiority of the new settlement over their own barren and perhaps over-peopled fatherland, gradually established themselves in those parts of Britain which the Romans had occupied before them. But the same causes which prevented the Romans from penetrating into the mountainous districts of Wales and Scotland, continued to exclude the Saxons also from those inaccessible fastnesses. Gradually, and after sanguinary conflicts, they succeeded, as the armies of Rome had done before, in driving back into these regions the wild Celtic populations which had descended thence with the hope of reconquering their inheritance, and this historical fact receives confirmation from the circumstance that the present inhabitants of these mountain regions are in the present day of pure Celtic blood, retaining the language of their British ancestors, and forming a race as completely distinct from the English people properly so called, as the Finn or the Lett, for example, from the Slavonic occupier of the land of his forefathers. The level, and consequently more easily accessible, portion of Scotland was gradually peopled by the Anglo-Saxon race, and their language and institutions were established there as completely as in South Britain itself. This fact alone ought to be sufficient to destroy the prejudice, so common not only among foreigners but even among Englishmen, of regarding all the inhabitants of Scotland as Celts alike, of representing William Wallace, for instance, in a Highland kilt, a mistake as ludicrous as would be that of painting Washington armed with a tomahawk, or adorned, like a Cherokee chief, with a belt of scalps or a girdle of wampum. It is probable that even the half-Romanized Britons who first invited the Saxon tribes to come to their assistance were speedily involved by their dangerous allies in the same persecution as their savage mountain countrymen. At all events one fact is certain, that the Celt in general, whether friendly or hostile, possessing a less powerful organization and a less vigorous moral constitution than the Teuton, was in the course of time either quietly absorbed into the more energetic race, or gradually disappeared, with that fatal certainty which seems to be an inevitable law regulating the contact of two unequal nationalities, just as the aboriginal Indian has disappeared before the descendants of the very same Anglo-Saxons in the New World. It is only a peculiar combination of geographical conditions that has enabled the primeval Celt to retain a separate existence on the territory of Great Britain, while the predominance—a numerical predominance only—of the Celtic race in the population of Ireland may be traced to other, but no less exceptional causes.

* In the same way some other Latin words appear in other names of places as strata, "paved roads," in Strat-ford, Strat-ton, colonia, in Lin-coln, port us in Portsmouth, &c.

§ 5 The true parentage, therefore, of the English nation, is to be traced to the Teutonic race. The language spoken by the Northern invaders was a Low-Germanic dialect, akin to the modern Dutch, but with many Scandinavian forms and words. Like the people who spoke it, it was possessed of a character at once practical and imaginative, at once real and ideal, and required but the influence of civilization to become a noble vehicle for reasoning, for eloquence, and for the expression of the social and domestic feelings. In the modern English, the ideas which address themselves to the emotions, and those which bring man into relation with the great objects of nature and with the sentiments of simple existence, will be found to derive their linguistic representatives, to a great extent, from the Teutonic tongue. The conversion of the Anglo-Saxons to Christianity, which took place in the sixth century, brought them into contact with more intellectual forms of life and with a higher type of civilization—the transfer of their religious allegiance from Thor, Woden, Tuisk, and Freya to the Saviour, while it softened their manners, exposed their language to the modifying influences of the corrupt but more civilized Latin literature of the Lower Empire, and gave rapid proof how improveable a tongue was that in which they had hitherto produced nothing, probably, but rude war-song and sagas like that of Beowulf. A very varied and extensive literature soon arose among the Anglo-Saxons, embracing compositions on almost every branch of knowledge, law, historical chronicles, ecclesiastical and theological disquisitions, together with a large body of poetry in which their very peculiar metrical system was adapted to subjects derived either from the scriptures, or from the mediæval lives of the saints. The curious, but rather tedious, versified paraphrase of the Bible by Cædmon—generally attributed to the middle of the seventh century—was long considered to be one of the most ancient among the more considerable Saxon poems, but the discovery of the manuscript of the Lay of Beowulf, to which we have just alluded, has furnished us with a specimen of Anglo-Saxon poetry decidedly more ancient, as well as far more interesting, inasmuch as, having been composed in all probability at a period anterior to the general conversion of the race to Christianity, it is free from any traces of that imitation of the rhetorical style of the lower Latinity which prevents Cædmon from being a good representative of the national literature of his race. This poem, the picturesque vigour of which gives it a right to be placed among the most interesting monuments of early literature, is not inferior in energy and conciseness to the Nibelungen-Lied, though undeniably so in extent of plot and development of character. The subject is the expedition of Prince Beowulf, a lineal descendant of Woden, from Suffolk to Durham, on the adventure of delivering the king of the latter country from a kind of demon or monster which secretly enters the royal hall at midnight, and destroys some of the warriors who are sleeping there. This monster, called in the poem the Grendel, is probably nothing but the poetical personification of some dangerous exhalations from a marsh, for it is represented as issuing from a neighbouring swamp, and as taking a refuge in the same when, after a furious combat, Beowulf succeeds in driving it back, wounded to the death, into the gloomy abyss. The description of the voyage of Beowulf in his “feary-necked” ship along the "swan-path" of the ocean, of his arrival at the foreign court, and his narrative of his own exploits, are in a very similar style to the ancient Scandinavian Sagas. The versification of this, as well as of all Saxon poetry in general, is exceedingly peculiar; and the system upon which it is constructed for a long time defied the ingenuity of philologists. The Anglo-Saxons based their verse not upon any regular recurrence of syllables, still less upon the employment of similarly sounding terminations of lines or parts of lines, that is, upon what we call rhyme. With them it was sufficient to constitute verse, that in any two successive lines—which might be of any length—there should be at least three words beginning with the same letter. This very peculiar metrical system is called alliteration.*

The language in which these works are composed is usually called Anglo-Saxon, but in the works themselves it is always styled English, and the country England, or the land of the Angles. The term Anglo-Saxons is meant to distinguish the Saxons of England from the Saxons of the Continent, and does not signify the Angles and Saxons. But why English became the exclusive appellation of the language spoken by the Saxons as well as the Angles, is not altogether clear. It has been supposed by some writers that the Saxons were only a section of the Angles, and consequently that the latter name was always recognized among the Angles and Saxons as the proper national appellation. Another hypothesis is, that as the new inhabitants of the island became first known to the Roman see through the Anglian captives who were carried to Rome in the sixth century, the name of this tribe was given by the Romans to the whole people, and that the Christian missionaries to Britain would naturally continue to employ this name as the appellation both of the people and the country†. Some modern writers have proposed to discard the term Anglo-Saxon altogether, and employ English as the name of the language, from the earliest date to the present day. But, as has been already observed in a previous work of the present series, "a change of nomenclature like this would expose us to the inconvenience, not merely of embracing within one designation objects which have been conventionally separated, but of confounding things logically distinct for, though our modern English is built upon and mainly derived from the Anglo-Saxon, the two dialects are now so discrepant, that the fullest knowledge of one would not alone suffice to render the other intelligible to either the eye or the ear." For all practical purposes, they are two separate languages, as different from one another as the Italian from the Latin, or the present English from the German.

* For an account of Anglo-Saxon verse see the 'Student's Manual of the English Language,' p. 387, and for a fuller account of Anglo-Saxon literature, see Notes and Illustrations (A).

† For further particulars see the 'Student's Manual of the English Language,' pp. 14, 15. It is there shown that the common account of the imposition of the name of England upon the country by a decree of King Egbert, is unsupported by any contemporaneous or credible testimony, and that the title of Anglæ or Anglorum REX, is much more naturally explained by the supposition that England and English had been already adopted as the collective names of the country and its inhabitants.

For a long period the Saxon colonization of Britain was carried on by detached Teutonic tribes, who established themselves in such portions of territory as they found vacant, or from which they ousted less warlike occupants, and in this way there gradually arose a number of separate and independent states or kingdoms. This epoch of our history is generally denominated the Heptarchy, or Seven Kingdoms, the names of the principal of which may still be traced in the appellations of our modern shires, as Essex and Northumberland. As might easily have been foreseen, one of these tribes or kingdoms, growing gradually more powerful, at last absorbed the others. This important event took place in the ninth century, in the reign of Egbert, from which period to the middle of the eleventh century, when there occurred the third great invasion and change of sovereignty to which the country was destined, the history of the Anglo-Saxon monarchy presents a confused and melancholy picture of bloody incursions and fierce resistance to the barbarous and pagan Danes, who endeavoured to treat the Saxons as the Saxons had treated the Celts. The only brilliant figure in this period is the almost perfect type of a patriot warrior, king and philosopher, in the person of the illustrious Alfred, whose virtues would appear to posterity almost fabulous, were they not handed down in the minute and accurate records of a biographer who knew and served him well. The two fierce races, so obstinately contending for mastery, were too nearly allied in origin and blood for their amalgamation to have produced any very material change in the language or institutions of the country. In those parts of England, principally in the North and East, as in some of the maritime regions of Scotland, where colonies of Danes established themselves, either by conquest or by settlement, the curious philologist may trace, in the idiom of the peasantry and still more clearly in the names of families and places, evident marks of a Scandinavian instead of an Anglo-Saxon population. As examples of this we may cite the now immortal name of Havelock, derived from a famous sea-king of the same name, who is said to have founded the ancient town of Grimsby, so called after Grim in the story. As to memorials of the Saxons, preserved in the names of men, families, or places, or in the less imperishable monuments of architecture, they are so numerous that there is hardly a locality in the whole extent of England where a majority of the names is not pure and unaltered Saxon, the whole mass of the middle and lower classes of the population bears unnum-takeable marks of pure Saxon blood and the sound and sterling vigour of the popular language is so essentially Saxon, that it requires but the re-establishment of the now obsolete inflexions of the Anglian grammar, and the substitution of a few Teutonic words for their French equivalents, to recompose an English book into the idiom spoken in the days of Alfred

§ 6 It would be, however, an error to suppose that all the words of Latin origin found even in the earlier period of the English language were introduced after the introduction into England of the Norman-French element, that is to say, after the conquest of the country by William in the eleventh century For a long time previous to that event the cultivation of the Latin literature in the monasteries and among the learned, as well as the employment of the Latin language in the services of the Church, must have tended to incorporate with the Saxon tongue a considerable number of Latin words Alfred, we know, visited Rome in his youth, acquired there a considerable portion of the learning which he unquestionably possessed, and exhibited his patriotic care for the enlightenment of his countrymen by translating into Saxon the "Consolations" of Boëthius The Venerable Bede, and other Saxon ecclesiastics, composed chronicles and legends in Latin, and we may therefore conclude that, though the sturdy Teutonic nationality of the Anglo-Saxon language guarded it from being corrupted by any overwhelming admixture of Latin, yet a considerable influx of Latin words may have become perceptible in it before the appearance of Normans on our shores It is also to be remarked that the superior civilization of the French race must have exerted an influence on at least the aristocratic classes, and the family connexions between the last Saxon dynasty and the neighbouring dukes of Normandy, of which the reign of Edward the Confessor furnishes examples, must have tended to increase the Gallicizing character perceptible in Anglo-Saxon writings previous to the Conquest In tracing the influence of that mighty revolution on the language, the institutions, and the national character of the people, it will be advisable to advert separately to its effects as regarded from a political, a social, and a philological point of view

The most important change consequent upon the subjugation of the country by the Normans was obviously the establishment in England of the great feudal principle of the military tenure of land, of the chivalric spirit and habits which were the natural result of feudal institutions, and lastly, of the broad demarcation which separated society into the two great classes of the Nobles and the Serfs It is unnecessary to say that the Feudal institutions, which lay at the bottom of all these modifications, were totally unknown to the original Saxons who established themselves in England, and were indeed utterly repugnant to that free democratic organization of society which they brought with them from their native Germany, and which Tacitus shows to have universally prevailed among the primitive dwellers of the Teutonic swamps and forests. The Scandinavian pirates, who carried devastation over every coast accessible to their "sea-horses," and who, under the valiant leadership of Hrolf the Ganger, wrested from the feeble and degenerate successors of Charlemagne the magnificent province to which they gave their own North-man appellation, adopted, from the force of circumstances, that strong military organization which could alone enable a warlike minority to hold in subjection a more numerous but less vigorous conquered people. Like the Lombards in Italy, like a multitude of other races in different parts of the world and in different historical epochs, they found feudal institutions an indispensable necessity of their position, and what had been forced upon them at their original occupation of Normandy they naturally practised on their irruption into England. But as the invasion of William was carried on under at least a colourable allegation of a legal right to the inheritance of the English throne, his investiture of the crown was accompanied by a studied adherence to the constitutional forms of the Saxon monarchy, and it was perhaps only the obstinate resistance of the sullen sturdy Saxon people, that at length wearied him into treating his new acquisition with all the rigour of a conquering invader. The whole territory was by his orders carefully surveyed and registered in that curious monument of antiquity which still exists, entitled Domesday Book. The severest measures of police, as for example the famous institution of the Curfew (which was, however, no new invention of William to tyrannize over the enslaved country, but a very common regulation in feudal states), were introduced to keep down the rising of the people, the territory was divided into 60,000 fiefs, the original Saxon holders of these lands were as a general rule ousted from their estates, which were distributed, on the feudal conditions of homage and general defence, to the warriors who had enabled him to subjugate the country, vast tracts of inhabited lands were depopulated and transformed into forests for the chase, and the higher functions of the Church and State were with few exceptions confided to men of Norman blood. The natural consequence of such a state of things, when it continued, as it did in England, through the reigns of the long series of Norman and Plantagenet sovereigns, was to create in the country two distinct and intensely hostile nationalities. The Saxon race gradually descended to the level of an oppressed and servile class, but being far superior in numbers to their oppressors, they ran no risk of being absorbed and lost in the dominant people. The high qualities, too, of the Norman race, qualities which made them greatly superior in valour, wisdom, and intellectual activity, to any other people then existing on the continent of Europe, no less saved them from gradually disappearing in the subjugated population. It required several ages to amalgamate the two nationalities, but, partly in consequence of their high, though very different merits, and partly in consequence of a most peculiar and happy combination of circumstances, they were ultimately amalgamated, and formed the most vigorous people which has ever existed upon earth. In the present case the two nationalities were not dissolved in each other, but like some chemical bodies their affinities combined to form a new and powerful substance. But for several centuries the two fierce and obstinate races felt nothing but hatred towards each other, a hatred cherished by the memory of a thousand acts of tyranny and contempt on the one part, and savage revenge and sullen degradation on the other. Macaulay has well observed that "so strong an association is established in most minds between the greatness of a sovereign and the greatness of the nation which he rules, that almost every historian of England has expatiated with a sentiment of exultation on the power and splendour of her foreign masters, and has lamented the decay of that power and splendour as a calamity to our country. This is, in truth, as absurd as it would be in a Haytian negro of our time to dwell with national pride on the greatness of Lewis XIV, and to speak of Blenheim and Ramilies with patriotic regret and shame. The Conqueror and his descendants to the fourth generation were not Englishmen: most of them were born in France: their ordinary speech was French: almost every high office in their gift was filled by a Frenchman: every acquisition which they made on the Continent estranged them more and more from the population of our island." Though every trace of this double and hostile nationality has long passed away, abundant monuments of its having once existed may be still observed in our language. The family names of the higher aristocracy in England are almost universally French, while those of the middle and lower orders are as unmistakeably German. Thus our peerage abounds in Russells (Roussel), Mortimers (Mortemar), Courtenays and Talbots, while the Smiths, Browns, Johnsons and Hodgkins plainly betray their Teutonic origin. Under the Norman régime the Saxon subdivisions of the country were transformed from the democratic shire into the feudal county, administered by a military governor or count. The ancient Saxon witanagemote, or thing, was metamorphosed into the feudal Parlement, the members of which occupied their seats, not as elective representatives of the people, but in their feudal capacity as vassals in the enjoyment of military fiefs. Thus the great ecclesiastical dignitaries took part of right in the deliberations of the legislative body, in their quality of holders of lands, and as such disposing of a certain contingent of military force.

But it is with the effects of the Norman Conquest upon the language of the country that we are at present concerned and it is here that the task of tracing the process of admixture between the two races becomes at once more complicated and more interesting. On their arrival in Normandy, the piratical followers of Hrolf the Ganger had found themselves exposed to the civilizing influences which a small minority of rude conquerors, placed in the midst of a subject population superior to them in numbers as well as intellectual cultivation, can never long resist with success. Like the hordes of barbarian invaders who shared among them the territories of the Roman empire, the Northmen, with the Christianity of the conquered nation, imbibed also the language and civilization so intimately connected with that Christianity, and in an incredibly brief space of time, exchanged for their native Scandinavian dialect a language entirely similar, in its words and grammatical forms, to the idiom prevalent in the northern division of France. It was a repetition of the introduction of Greek art and culture into republican Rome.

Græcia capta ferum victorem cepit et artes

The language thus communicated by the subject to the conquering nation was a dialect of that great Romance speech which extended during the Middle Ages from the northern shore of the Mediterranean to the English Channel, and which may be defined as the decomposition of the classical Latin. It was soon divided into two great sister-idioms, the Langue-d'Oc and the Langue-d'Oil (so called from the different words for yes), the general boundary or line of demarcation between them being roughly assignable as coinciding with the Loire. The former of these languages, spoken to the south of this river, was closely allied to the Spanish and Italian, and was subsequently called the Provençal, the latter was the parent of the French. Knowing the circumstances under which such a dialect as the Romance was formed, it is no difficult problem to establish a priori the changes which the mother-tongue, or Latin, must have undergone, in its process of transformation into what, though afterwards developed into regular and beautiful dialects, was at first little better than a barbarous jargon. The language of ancient Rome, a highly inflected and complicated tongue, naturally lost all, or nearly all its inflexions and grammatical complexity. Thus the Latin substantive and adjective lost all those terminations which in the original language expressed relation, as the various cases of the different declensions, these relations being thenceforward indicated by the simpler expedient of prepositions.

§ 7 The literary models introduced into England by the Norman invasion were no less important than the linguistic changes consequent upon the admixture of their Romance dialect with the Saxon speech.

Together with the institutions of feudalism the Normans brought with them the poetry of feudalism, that is, the poetry of chivalry. The lais and romances, the fabliaux and the legends of mediæval chivalry soon began to modify the rude poetical sagas and the tedious narratives of the lives of saints and hermits which had formed the bulk of the literature of Saxon England. Few subjects have excited more lively controversy among the learned than the origin and specific character of the Romance literature. In particular the distinction between the compositions of the Norman Trouvères and of the Provençal Troubadours has given rise to many elaborate dissertations and many contending theories and yet the fundamental question may be easily and, we think, not unsatisfactorily solved by the simple comparison of the two terms. Trouvère and Troubadour are obviously the two forms of the same word as pronounced respectively by the population who spoke the Langue d'Oïl and the Langue d'Oc. The natural and picturesque definition of a poet as a finder or inventor bears some analogy with the term Skald, or polisher of language, by which the same idea was represented among the Scandinavians, with the Greek ποιητής, a term exactly reproduced in the Maker of the Lowland Scots, and the beautiful qualification of the poetic art as el gay saber and la guaye science, no less faithfully corresponds to the idea contained in the Saxon term gleeman, applied to the singer or bard, whose invention furnished the joy of the banquet. Now, if we keep in mind the characteristic differences which are universally found to distinguish a Northern as compared with a Southern people, we shall generally find that in the former the imagination, the sentiments, and the memory are most developed, while the latter will be more remarkable for the vivacity of the passions and the intensity—and consequently also the transitory duration—of the affective emotions. We might therefore predict a priori, given respectively a Northern and a Southern population, that among the former an imaginative or poetical literature would have a natural tendency to take a narrative, and among the latter a lyric, form. For narrative is the necessary type in which the first mentioned class of intellectual qualities would clothe themselves while ardent and transitory passion would as inevitably express itself in the lyric form. And this is what we actually find, on comparing the prevailing literary type of the Trouvère with that of the Troubadour literature. It is evident that the composition of long narrative recitals of real or imaginary events would require a certain degree of literary culture, as well as a considerable amount of leisure, and therefore many of the interminable romances of the Trouvères may be traced to the ecclesiastical profession, while the shorter and more lively lyric and satiric effusions which constitute the bulk of the Troubadour literature were frequently the productions of princes, knights, and ladies, the power of writing verses being considered as one of the necessary accomplishments of a gentleman

“ He coude songes make, and wel endite.”

Concerning the source from which the Romance poets, both of the Northern and Southern dialects, drew the materials for their chivalric fictions great diversity has prevailed; and the various theories which have been broached on this curious subject may be practically reduced to three hypotheses: the one tracing these inventions to an Oriental, and the other to a Celtic source, while a third class of investigators have endeavoured to assign to them a Teutonic paternity, whether in the general German or the exclusively Scandinavian nationality. Each of these theories has been supported with much ingenuity, and defended with an immense display of learning. but they are all equally obnoxious to the reproach of having been made too exclusive. the existence of the well-marked general features of Chivalric Romance long before the European nations acquired, by the Crusades, any familiarity with the imagery and scenery of the East renders the first hypothesis untenable in its full extent, while the second is in a great measure invalidated by the comparatively barbarous state into which the Celtic tribes had generally fallen at the time when the Chivalric literature began to prevail, and the little knowledge which the Romance populations of Europe possessed of the ancient Gaulish language and historical legendary lore. It is true that the Trouvères almost invariably pretend to have found the subjects of their narratives in the traditions, or among the chronicles of the “olde gentil Bretons,” just as Marie de France refers her reader to the Celtic or Armorican authorities, but this was in all probability in general a mere literary artifice, like that which induced other poets to place the venue of their wondrous adventures in some distant and unknown region

“ In Sarra, in the land of Tartarie ”

The important part played in these legends by the half-mythical Arthur and his knights might seem to argue in favour of a Celtic origin for these fictions, for if ever such a personage as Arthur really existed he must have been a British prince, but when we remember that Arthur, though mentioned in the authentic traditional poems of the ancient Britons, is a comparatively insignificant character, and that these same traditions contain no trace whatever of the existence of that chivalric state of society of which Arthur and his preux are the ideal, we shall find ourselves as much warranted in accepting the authenticity of a Celtic origin on these grounds, as in attributing the chivalric character with which Alexander, Hector, and Hercules are also invested in the mediæval poets, to an intimate acquaintance with the Homeric and classical poems, from which the Troubadour may indeed have borrowed some striking names and leading incidents but with the true spirit of which every line shows him to be unacquainted *

§ 8 For two centuries after the Norman conquest, the Anglo-Saxon and the Norman-French continued to be spoken in the island, as two distinct languages, having little intermixture with one another. The most important change, which converted the Anglo-Saxon into Old English, and which consists chiefly in the substitution of the vowel e for the different inflexions, was not due in any considerable degree to the Norman conquest, though it was probably hastened by that event. It commenced even before the Norman conquest, and was owing to the same causes which led to similar changes in the kindred German dialects. The large introduction of French words into English dates from the time when the Normans began to speak the language of the conquered race. It is, however, an error to represent the English language as springing from a mixture of Anglo-Saxon and French, since a mixed language, in the strict sense of the term, may be pronounced an impossibility. The English still remained essentially a German tongue, though it received such large accessions of French words, as materially to change its character. To fix with precision the date when this change took place is manifestly an impossible task. It was a gradual process, and must have advanced with more or less rapidity in different parts of the country. In remote and less frequented districts the mass of the population long preserved their pure Saxon speech. This is sufficiently proved by the circumstance, that even in the present day, the inhabitants of such remote, or upland districts still show in their patois an evident preponderance of the Saxon element, as exhibited in the use of many old German words which have long ceased to form part of the English vocabulary, and in the evident retention of German peculiarities of pronunciation. "Nothing can be more difficult," says Hallam, "than to determine, except by an arbitrary line, the commencement of the English language, not so much, as in those of the Continent, because we are in want of materials, but rather from an opposite reason, the possibility of tracing a very gradual succession of verbal changes, that ended in a change of denomination. For when we compare the earliest English of the thirteenth century with the Anglo-Saxon of the twelfth, it seems hard to pronounce, why it should pass for a separate language, rather than a modification or simplification of the former. We must conform, however, to usage, and say that the Anglo-Saxon was converted into English - 1 by contracting or otherwise modifying the pronunciation and orthography of words 2 by omitting many inflexions, especially of the noun, and consequently making more use of articles and auxiliaries, and, 3 by the introduction of French derivatives. Of these the second alone, I think, can be considered as sufficient to describe a new form of language, and this was brought about so gradually, that we are not relieved of much of our difficulty, whether some compositions shall pass for the latest offspring of the mother or for the earliest proofs of the fertility of the daughter."

* See Notes and Illustrations (3) Anglo-Norman Literature

The picturesque illustration, so happily employed by Scott in the opening chapter of Ivanhoe, has often been quoted as a good popular exemplification of the mode in which the Saxon and French elements were blended—the common animals serving for food to man, while under the charge of Saxon serfs and bondmen, retained their Teutonic appellation, but when served up at the table of the Norman oppressor received a French designation. As examples of this, he cites the parallels Or and Beef, Swine and Pork, Sheep and Mutton, Calf and Veal. It is curious to see, on examining the grammar and vocabulary of the early English language, as exhibited in the writings of our old poets and chroniclers, how often the primitive Saxon forms continued very gradually to become effaced, while the French orthography and pronunciation of the newly-introduced words have not yet become harmonized, so to speak, with the general character of the new idiom. Thus, in the following lines of Chaucer

"The sleer of himself yet saugh I there,
His herte-blood hath bathed al his here,
The nayl y-dryve in the snode a-nyght,
The colde detli, with mouth gapyng upright
Amyddes of the tempal set mischaunce,
With sory comfort and evel contynauce."

In these verses we see the Saxon grammatical forms combined with a large importation of Norman-French words, which have not yet lost their original accentuation. The old German is found running into, as it were, and overlapping the lately-introduced Gallicism. Such was the state in which Chaucer found the national idiom at the beginning of the fourteenth century, and the admirable genius of that great poet may be said to have put the last touch to the consolidation of the English language. For a considerable period after his time, however, such writings as were addressed to the sympathies of the lower classes continued to retain much of the Saxon characteristics in orthography, grammatical structure and versification, for example, traces of the peculiar alliterative system are perceptible for a period long subsequent to the reign of Richard II., while the elaborate compositions addressed to the still purely Norman nobility retain much of the French spirit in their diction and imagery.

§ 9 Though it is impossible to assign any exact date to the change of Anglo-Saxon into English, the chief alterations in the language may be arranged approximately under the following epochs.—

I. Anglo-Saxon, from A.D. 450 to 1150

II. Semi-Saxon, from A.D. 1150 to 1250 (from the reign of Stephen to the middle of the reign of Henry III.), so called because it partakes strongly of the characteristics of both Anglo-Saxon and Old English

III. Old English, from A.D. 1250 to 1350 (from the middle of the reign of Henry III. to the middle of the reign of Edward III.)

IV. Middle English, from A.D. 1350 to about 1550 (from the middle of the reign of Edward III. to the reign of Edward VI.)

V. Modern English, from A.D. 1550 to the present day.*

The three first periods scarcely belong to a history of English literature, and consequently only a brief account of them is given in the Notes and Illustrations appended to the present chapter. The real history of English literature begins with Chaucer, in the brilliant reign of Edward III.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

A—ANGLO-SAXON LITERATURE.

A.D. 450-1150

The earliest literature of the Anglo-Saxons bears the impress of the religious culture under which it was formed. Unlike their brethren, who sung their old heroic lays in their primeval forests, the conquerors of the rich provinces of Britain had sunk from action to contemplation, and their literature was artificial. There was but little difference of time in the development of poetry and prose, and the works produced were, with only three exceptions, the elaborate compositions of educated men, rather than the spontaneous products of genius, inspired by a people's ancient legends. The chief subjects were moral, religious, historical, and didactic. Under the tutelage of the Church, the most lasting monuments of Anglo-Saxon prose literature were written in Latin, and the vernacular tongue was chiefly employed in translating the learned works of such men as Bede and Alcuin.

What value it possesses is chiefly for its matter, for it almost entirely wants that beauty of form, which alone raises literature to an art.

I. The VERNACULAR POETRY scarcely retains a trace of that wild epic fire which is seen in the Scandinavian Sagas. (1) We have only three specimens of old national songs, written in the spirit of the continental Germans, and probably composed, in part at least, before their migration to England. The first of these is the Lay of Beowulf, which is fully described in the text. Its spirit is that of the old heathen Germans. It seems to have been originated at the primitive seat of the Angles, in Schleswig and to have been brought over to England about the end of the fifth century. The other two are the Traveller's Song, and the Battle of Finnesburg, the scene of which seems to be on the Continent. It is only in the tenth century that we again meet with compositions of this class, in the patriotic poems on Athelstan's Victory at Brunanburgh (A.D. 937), on the

* The writers, who wish to discard the term Anglo-Saxon, call the Anglo-Saxon First English, the Semi-Saxon Second English, and give the name of Third English to the remaining periods.

Coronation (A.D. 953) and the Death of Edgar (A.D. 975) and on the Battle of Maldon (A.D. 994) (2.) Of Religious Poetry, the chief specimen is the so-called Metrical Paraphrase of the Scriptures, which Bede ascribes to Cædmon, a monk of Whitby, in the seventh century. Some modern writers assign the work to a much later date. But whatever be the date, it is a striking poem, and appears to have supplied Milton with some hints. One passage strikingly resembles Milton's soliloquy of Satan in hell. CRNEWOLF (in Latin kennilphus) a monk of Winchester and abbot of Peterborough in 992, is highly eulogized by a local historian, but we have only two short poems which preserve his name in a sort of acrostic of Runic characters. ALDHHELM, the great Latin writer mentioned in the next column, wrote poetry in the vernacular and is said to have translated the Book of Psalms into Anglo-Saxon verse. These poems were preserved orally, not only by the minstrels, but as exercises of memory by the monks. Hence the MSS exhibit very great diversities.

II. ANGLO-SAXON LITERATURE IN LATIN demands notice before the vernacular prose literature as the latter was, for the most part, based upon the former. It was the product of foreign ecclesiastical influence. The earliest missionaries were imbued with the learning of the Western Church and great schools were soon founded in Kent and the South, and afterwards in Northumbria. In the latter part of the seventh century, THEODORE or TARSUS became Archbishop of Canterbury, and with his friend the ABBOT ADRIAN taught both Greek and Latin literature. In the eighth century books were so multiplied, that Alcuin complains to Charlemagne of the literary poverty of France as compared with England. He also gives an account of the great library at York, from which and other lists we can see what writers formed the taste of the seventh, eighth, and ninth centuries. There was a decided preference for the Greek authors above the Latin. The classical poets were read, but with a religious suspicion, and the works most valued were those of the Fathers and the Christian poets, whose faults are closely imitated in the Latin poetry of the Anglo-Saxon churchmen. The ecclesiastical taste was strengthened and the literary treasures increased by the habit of visiting Rome, which became frequent in the eighth century. Many women were celebrated for their learning.

(1) Anglo-Latin Poetry

ALDHHELM, of Sherborne, founder of the abbey of Malmesbury, (b. about A.D. 854, d. A.D. 709), was the most distinguished pupil of Adrian. His poetry is turgid and full of extravagant conceits. He wrote in Hexameters De Laude Virginitatis (besides a prose treatise on the same theme), a book of Aenigmata in imitation of Symposius, and a poem on the Seven Cardinal Virtues. These, with a few letters, are all his extant works. The great prose writer ALCUIN (see below) was also fertile in Latin verse. His style is simpler than Aldhelm's, but less animated. His best poem is an Elegy on the Destruction of Lindisfarne by the Danes. The long poem on the Church of York has some good descriptive passages. He also wrote Epigrams, Elegies and Aenigmata. Columban, Boniface, Bede, and Cuthbert wrote some Latin verses, and passing over a few others, the list concludes, in the tenth century, with the Life of St. Wilfred, by FRITHGODE, and the Life of St. Swithun by WOLSTAN.

(2) The Latin Prose Literature of the Anglo-Saxons consists of religious treatises works on science and education, and histories in which the ecclesiastical element preponderates, but its most interesting remains are the letters of Alcuin and Boniface, for the light they throw on contemporary history and manners.

(a) The period opens with some writers who were not Saxons, but of the old Celtic race which had preserved British Christianity, or had learned it anew from Ireland. Passing over the obscure Histories of GILDAS, son of the British King of Alcluyd (Dumbarton), in the sixth century and NENNIVS, whose work is probably not genuine in the seventh, we come to ST. COLUMBANUS (lived about A.D. 543-615) of Ireland, who, having joined the lately founded monastery at Bangor set out thence at the head of a mission to the eastern parts of Gaul, Switzerland, and the south west of Germany. He wrote in Latin several theological treatises, some poems, and five letters. Nearly two centuries later Ireland sent forth JOHANNES SCOTUS, surnamed from his native land EUGENA (d. A.D. 877) who settled in France, and became, by his dialectic skill and his acquaintance with the doctrines of Neo-Platonism, one of the founders of the philosophical sect of the Realists. The story of his coming to England on Alfred's invitation is more than doubtful.

(b) The earliest Anglo-Saxon prose writer in Latin is WILFRED (lived A.D. 834-709) Archbishop of York and apostle of Sussex, who succeeded, after a troubled life, in uniting the churches of the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms. His works are lost, but he deserves mention as the founder of the school of learning at York, which was fostered by Bishop EGBERT (A.D. 678-766), and produced BEDÉ and ALCUIN, the two great names of the Anglo-Saxon Latin literature.

The course of BEDÉ (A.D. 672-735), sur-named the "Venerable," is a perfect type of the outward repose and intellectual activity of the monastic life, in its best aspect. At the age of seven he was placed under the teaching of Benedict Biscop, in the monastery of Wearmouth, became a deacon at 19, and a priest at 30. Whether he visited Rome is uncertain. He only left his monastery on rare visits to other religious houses, and his dying moments were divided between religious exercises and dictating the last sentences of a work which he just lived to finish.

His works embrace the whole compass of the learning of his age. Numbering no less than forty-five, they may be divided into four classes, Theological, consisting chiefly of commentaries on the Scriptures, pervaded by the allegorical method, Scientific Treatises, exhibiting the imperfect knowledge of science, from Pliny to his own time; Grammatical Works, which display much learning, with some correct but lifeless Latin poems, Historical Compositions, which place him in the first rank among writers of the middle ages. The History of his own Monastery and the Life of St. Cuthbert deserve mention, but his great work is the Ecclesiastical History of the Anglo-Saxons from their first settlement in England. He used the aid of the most learned men of his time in collecting the documents and traditions of the various kingdoms, which he relates with scrupulous fidelity and in a very pleasing style. The History was translated into Anglo-Saxon by King Alfred.

Bede was surrounded by a body of literary friends, as Acca and others, among whom the most distinguished was EGBERT, Archbishop of York (about A.D. 678-766), the reformer of his diocese, and founder of the splendid library already mentioned. His writings are chiefly on points of discipline, and two of them, the Confessionale and Poenitentiale, were published in Anglo-Saxon as well as in Latin. St. BONIFACE (Winfrid), a native of Crediton in Devonshire (lived about A.D. 680-755) and the apostle of Western Germany, has left a collection of valuable letters, amounting (with those addressed to him) to a hundred and six. The eighth century closes with the great name of ALCUIN (about A.D. 735-804). He was born at York, and, like Bede, was placed in a convent in his infancy. Trained in the school of Archbishop Egbert, he became the favourite pupil of that prelate's kinsman and successor, Albert, on whose appointment to the archbishopric (A.D. 786), the school was entrusted to Alcuin just ordained a deacon. Eanbald, a pupil of Alcuin, on succeeding to the archbishopric (A.D. 780), sent Alcuin to Rome, and this mission caused his introduction to Charlemagne, at whose court he resided with magnificent appointments, till A.D. 790, and again from A.D. 792 to his death. His works were commentaries, dogmatic and practical treatises, lives of saints, and several very interesting letters. His Latin poems have been already noticed. He is chiefly important in the History of English Literature, as another example, like that of Erigena, of what the Continent gained from the learning of these islands. The name of Asser, bishop of Sherborne (d. A.D. 910) is connected with a Latin history of King Alfred, of very doubtful authenticity. The renowned DUNSTAN (A.D. 925-988) wrote commentaries on the Benedictine rule, and other works. Of his contemporary Odo (d. 961) we have only a single letter. A few other names might still be mentioned.

III. The VERACULAR ANGLO-SAXON PROSE LITERATURE contains few but great names. Above all shines that of KING ALFRED (A.D. 848-901), the story of whose early training and life-long self-discipline needs not to be recounted here. His early love for the old national poetry, the growing neglect of Latin even by the priests, and the eager desire, of which he himself tells us, that the people might enjoy the treasures of learning collected in the churches for security from the invaders, urged him to the culture of the native tongue for popular instruction. While inviting overlearned men to repair the decay of scholarship, the king himself set the example of translating existing works into the vernacular. Having learned Latin only late in life, he did not disdain the help of scholars, such as Bishop Asser, in clearing up grammatical difficulties, while he brought to the work untiring industry, great capacity of comprehending the author's general meaning and sound judgment upon points needing illustration. His most important translations were those of Bede's Historical History, the Ancient History of Orosius, Boethius's de Consolatione Philosophiæ, and, for the use of the clergy the Pastorale of St. Gregory. According to William of Malmesbury, Alfred had composed an Anglo-Saxon version of the Psalms shortly before his death. Among the works falsely attributed to him are Alfred's Proverbs, a translation of Æsop's Fables, and a metrical version of the Mistres of Boethius. Many works were translated by the king's order or after his example, for instance the Dialogues of St. Gregory by Werfred, bishop of Worcester. The new intellectual impulse given by Alfred a policy of calling foreign scholars into the realm which was followed by other kings down to the eve of the conquest, sustained the revival of Anglo-Saxon literature in full activity for some time.

The great light of the tenth century was ALFRED, Archbishop of Canterbury, surnamed Grammaticus (d. A.D. 1006) whose opposition to Romish doctrines called attention to his work, and so gave an impulse to Anglo-Saxon studies in modern times. His eighty Homilies are his chief work. He also translated the Books of Moses, and wrote other theological treatises. As a grammarian he laboured to revive the neglected study of Latin, by his Latin Grammar (from Donatus and Priscian), his Glossary and Colloquium (a conversation book). He appears as a scientific writer in the Manual of Astronomy, if it is rightly assigned to him. He is often confounded with two other Alfreds, the name being common among the Anglo-Saxons. There was an Alfred, Abbot of Malmesbury (d. A.D. 921), and an Alfred, surnamed Bala, Archbishop of York (d. 1035), a devoted disciple of the great Alfred. His Grammar and Colloquium he published, besides writing a life of Bishop Ethelwold (A.D. 925-985). In the eleventh century we need only mention WELFRYD, Archbishop of York (d. 1023) the author of some Homilies.

It remains to notice two great monuments of Anglo-Saxon prose literature, the Chronicle and the Laws. The Saxon Chronicle is a record of the history of the people compiled at first, as is believed, for Alfred, by Æthelwold, Archbishop of Canterbury who brought it down to A.D. 1021. It was continued as a contemporary record to the end of the Anglo-Saxon period, in the middle of the twelfth century. It breaks off abruptly in the first year of Henry II. (A.D. 1154). 'It is a dry chronological record noting in the same lifeless tone important and trifling events without the slightest tinge of dramatic colour, of criticism in weighing evidence, or of judgment in the selection of the facts narrated' (Marsh, Origin and History of the English Language, Lect. III. p. 103). This want of historical talent, as the same writer observes, prevents our learning from it much of our ancestors' social life, or of the practical working of their institutions.

The fragments of the Anglo-Saxon Laws contain some as early as the reign of Ethelbert, king of Kent reduced however to the language of a later age. Alfred, who began the work says that, with the advice of his Witan, he rejected what did not please him, but added little of his own. The work was then submitted to and adopted by the Witan. His chief followers in these labours were Athelstane, Ethelred, and Canute. (See Schmid Gesetz der Angelsachsen 2d ed. 1858).

B.—ANGLO NORMAN LITERATURE. A.D. 1066-1350

The Norman Conquest had both a destructive and a reconstructive influence on the literature of the country. The ordinance forbidding the Saxon clergy to aspire to any ecclesiastical dignity, confined the literary activity that was left to the monasteries, except in the case of those who were willing to adapt themselves to the new state of things. The Anglo-Saxon learning gradually died out by the middle of the twelfth century, its chief work being the completion of the Saxon Chronicle in the monastery of Peterborough. The chief works of learning were composed in Latin, while for lighter compositions the English adopted the language of their conquerors. On the other hand, the Normans introduced a new and most potent element of intellectual activity. The fifty years preceding the Conquest had witnessed a great revival of learning on the Continent, originating from the Arabs who had themselves become imbued with the Greek learning of the conquered East. Thus the revival of letters in the eleventh century like the brighter revival in the fifteenth owed its source to the ancient Greeks, but with this great difference—while in the latter case inspiration was drawn from the great poets and orators, the Arabs were chiefly attracted by the physical, logical, and metaphysical works of the school of Aristotle. The Aristotelian logic and spirit of systematizing were eagerly applied to theology, especially in France. The monasteries of Caen and Bec, in Normandy, became distinguished seats of the new science, and in them were trained LANFRANC and ANSELM, the first great lights of Anglo-Norman learning. Indeed Anselm is often regarded as the founder of the Scholastic Philosophy, which was the fruit of the new movement. But he is only a connecting link. The old method of treating theology, followed by the Fathers, was based on the foundation of faith in the dogmatic statements of Scripture. The scholastic philosophy aspired to establish a complete system of truth by a chain of irrefragable reasoning. Anselm only applied its methods to the establishment of separate doctrines, while ABELARD, breaking away from the old foundation of faith, which Anselm tacitly assumed, made the same methods the instruments of scepticism. He was met by St BERNARD, who took his stand upon the old patristic ground. "Scholasticism," says Mr Arnold (Eng Lit. p 16), "made a false start in the school of Bec, its true commencement dates a little later, and from Paris." Its founder was PETER LOMBARD, called the "Master of the Sentences," from his Four Books of Sentences, published in A.D. 1161. Thus the same age produced St. Bernard, the last of the Fathers, and Peter Lombard, the first of the schoolmen. In England there is no trace of the new learning before the Conquest, though she had helped to prepare for it by sending forth such men as Erigena and Alcuin. Erigena, indeed, as early as the ninth century, had employed philosophical methods in religious discussion, but he was a Platonist, the schoolmen were Aristotelians. The new learning not only entered in the train of the Conqueror, but was fostered by his personal influence. William, and nearly all his successors, down to Henry III., were themselves well educated, and patronized literature and art. The displacement of the Saxon bishops and abbots seems to have arisen from contempt for their illiteracy, as well as from political motives, and their places were filled by the most learned of the Norman ecclesiastics, as Archbishops Lanfranc and Anselm. HERMAN, bishop of Salisbury, who founded a great library. GODFREY prior of St Swithin's at Winchester, who wrote Latin epigrams in the style of Martial, and GEORFRED, an eminent scholar from the University of Paris, who founded a school at Dunstable, and acted, with his scholars, a drama of his own on the Life of St. Catharine. Numerous as were the Saxon monasteries, no less than 557 new religious houses were founded, from the Conquest to the reign of John. All of these, as well as the cathedrals, had schools for those destined to the church, and general schools were founded in the towns and villages. The twelfth century witnessed the foundation of our two great Universities, but they were at first regarded rather as portals to the continental Universities, to which English subjects resorted in great numbers, especially to Paris, where they formed one of the four "nations." Classical learning revived at the Universities, and was extended from the Latin poets to Greek and even Hebrew, in the thirteenth century, chiefly by the influence of ROBERT GROSSETESTE, bishop of Lincoln. About the same time, the invention of the art of making paper from linen rags more than made up for the growing lack of parchment, and gave a new mechanical impulse to literature.

Meanwhile, the tenacity with which the English language held its ground among the common people, caused the ultimate fruit of these movements to be shown in the formation of a truly English literature in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

It remains to mention the classes of literature and the chief writers of the period. Literature being cultivated almost entirely by the clergy and the minstrels, nearly all the prose works were in Latin, and the poetry in Norman French exclusive, however, of the contemporaneous Semi-Saxon literature (see below, C). An age of violence and oppression permitted but little popular literature, in the proper sense.

I. ANGLO-NORMAN AND ANGLO-SAXON LITERATURE IN LATIN.—1. Theologians and Schoolmen.—LANFRANC (b. A.D. 1005 d. A.D. 1089) was a Lombard of Pavia, where, after studying in other Italian Universities, he practised as a pleader. Removing to Normandy, he opened a school at Avranches (A.D. 1035 or later), which became a centre of elegant Latinity. In A.D. 1042 he suddenly joined the small abbey of Bec, was elected prior, and opened a school, which soon surpassed that of Avranches. He soon found a wider field for his ambition as the counsellor of Duke William; and being sent by him on a mission to Rome, he distinguished himself by defending the doctrine of transubstantiation, against Berengarius of Tours. In A.D. 1066 (the year of the Conquest) William made him abbot of his new monastery of St. Stephen at Caen, and in 1070 he became archbishop of Canterbury, in place of the deposed Saxon prelate Stigand. His reform of the Anglo-Saxon Church and severity towards its clergy concern us here less than his invitations to learned foreigners, whereby he founded a new school of science and literature in England. His great work was the Treatise against Berengarius (written A.D. 1079 or 1080) he also wrote Commentaries on Scripture and Letters. Many of Lanfranc's works are lost. ANSELM (b. A.D. 1033 d. 1109) was also an Italian, of Aosta. His eagerness for learning led him to Bec, where he succeeded Lanfranc as prior and afterwards became abbot in place of Herluin (A.D. 1078). Most of his works were composed here, while he gained the highest reputation for piety and taught diligently. On his second visit to England, in A.D. 1092, the voice of the bishops and barons forced William Rufus to appoint him as the successor of Lanfranc, who had been dead four years. Anselm's troubles in the privacy belong to history rather than literature, but amidst them all he continued to write and teach. It is unnecessary to enumerate his many works which are less important than his influence on the learning of his age. They consist of theological and dialectic treatises, homilies, devout meditations, and letters. His claims to a share in the Hymnology of the church are doubtful.—Besides many distinguished prelates only inferior in fame to these two, some of whom are mentioned above, we may name two writers of more general literature, JOHN OF SALISBURY (died Bp. of Chartres in A.D. 1182), an Englishman, who wrote a treatise De Augus. Curialium et Vestigis Philosophorum, besides Latin verses; and PETER OF BLOIS (d. after A.D. 1198), whose letters throw much light on the characters and manners of his time. He wrote many other works and an interesting poem on Richard's misfortunes in Palestine. The English Schoolmen were for the most part of the Anglo-Saxon race, but lived chiefly abroad. ALEXANDER HALE, 'the Irrefragable Doctor,' a native of Gloucestershire, was the teacher of St. Bonaventure. He lived and taught abroad, and died at Paris A.D. 1215. JOHANNES LEWIS SCOTUS, "the Subtle Doctor" taught at Oxford and Paris, and died at Bologna, A.D. 1308. WILLIAM OF OCCAM (b. A.D. 1300, d. A.D. 1347, at Munich) the Invincible Doctor," spent most of his life at the court of the German Emperor, whose cause he maintained against the Pope. Though the pupil of the great Realist, Duns Scotus, he was the head of the school of the Nominalists who held that our abstract ideas are merely general expressions of thought not necessarily corresponding to real existence. At Oxford, the Franciscan friar ROBERT BACON (about A.D. 1214-1292), by his devotion to physical science gained the reputation of a sorcerer, while dimly anticipating some of the great inventions of later times, among which is thought to have been that of gunpowder. His Opus Majus is an enquiry into "the roots of wisdom" namely language, mathematics, optics and experimental science. That he had begun to cast off the scholastic trammels and already to question nature in the spirit of his great namesake is shown by his saying, on a disputed fact in physics, 'I have tried it, and it is not the fact but the very reverse'.

2. Latin Chroniclers of past and contemporary history had already been commenced before the Conquest. Their writers were churchmen, and mostly of the Saxon race, and, with a few exceptions they confined themselves to the history of England. Passing over the more than doubtful work ascribed to LEOLFRIK, abbot of Evesham (A.D. 1075-1109) and its continuation (to A.D. 1118), we have a History of the Norman Conquest by WILLIAM OF PONTREUIL, a follower of the Conqueror extending from A.D. 1035 to A.D. 1067; but the beginning and end are lost, we know that it came down to A.D. 1070. LEOBEN OF WORCESTER (d. A.D. 1118) compiled a chronicle from the Creation to the year of his death chiefly from the Saxon Chronicle and the Chronology of Marianus Scotus, a German monk. LADMER (d. A.D. 1121) history is chiefly a monument to the time of Anselm. ORDERIC VITALIS (b. A.D. 1075, near Shrewsbury d. after A.D. 1143) wrote an Ecclesiastical History in thirteen books, from the Creation to the latter year. The best of all these chroniclers is WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY (about A.D. 1140) who dedicated his history to Robert, earl of Gloucester natural son of Henry I. It is in two parts, the Gesta Regum Anglorum in five books from the landing of Hengist and Horsa to A.D. 1120 and the Historia Novella, in three books, down to A.D. 1142. The work is written in the spirit and manner of Bede. He also wrote a Life of Wulfstan, a history of the English Bishops, and other works. His contemporary, HENRY OF HUNTINGDON (d. after A.D. 1154), also a worthy follower of Bede, though inferior to William, wrote a History of England, from the landing of Julius Cæsar to the accession of Henry II. (A.D. 1154). To the eight books of the history he added his other works, forming four more, the last consisting of his Latin poems. GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH (d. A.D. 1154) also inscribed to Robert, earl of Gloucester, his Historia Britonum, which professes to be a translation of an old British chronicle brought over from Brittany by Walter, archdeacon of Oxford, in nine books. It relates the legendary story of the British kings from Brutus, the great-grandson of Adam, to the death of Cadwallader, son of Cadwallo, in A.D. 682. The lively Welshman keeps his country's traditions free from those rationalising attempts, which "spoil a good poem, without making a good history," and he provided for the romance writers some of their best stories, among the rest, that of Arthur and the knights of the Round Table. His work was abridged by ALFRED OF BEVELEY, and continued by CARADOC OF LANCERYN to A.D. 1154. The latter work is only known in a Welsh version, which has been translated into English. Another learned Welshman, GRIEGLUS CAMBRIENSIS (Gerald Barry, b. about A.D. 1146, d. A.D. 1223), wrote topographical works on Wales and Ireland, on account of his own life, and many other works, including Latin poems. He was about the most vigorous and versatile author of his time.

ALFRED OF RIEVAUX, in Yorkshire (b. A.D. 1109, d. A.D. 1166) has left an admirable account of the Battle of the Standard (A.D. 1138), and several theological works. ROGER DE HOWDEN (i.e. of Howden, in Yorkshire), continued Bede's History from A.D. 732 to A.D. 1202, transcribing many documents of great historical value. GLOTFREY DE VILSAUF wrote an important work on the Crusade, in which he followed Richard Coeur de Lion. MATTHEW PARIS (a monk of St. Alban's) wrote his celebrated Historia Major, from the Norman Conquest to the year of his death, A.D. 1259. Much of it consists of open plagiarisms from the Chronicle, or Flores Historiarum of ROGER DE WENDOVER, also a monk of St. Alban's who died prior of Beveley May 6th, A.D. 1237. This work extends from the Creation to the nineteenth year of Henry III. (A.D. 1236), and the latter part is very valuable. It was published by the Rev. Henry O. Coxe, for the English Historical Society, 5 vols. 8vo., London 1841-1844. Another monk of St. Alban's, WILLIAM RISHANGER, continued the work of Matthew Paris probably to the fifteenth of Edward II. (A.D. 1322), but the latter part of his book is lost. NICHOLAS TRURFT wrote an excellent history, from Stephen to Edward I. (A.D. 1135-1307), which was edited by Mr. F. Hogg, Lond. 1815. From these two works was compiled the Chronicle of St. Alban's, which is plagiarized (like Roger of Wendover by Matthew Paris) in the Historia Anglicana of WALSHINGHAM, published by Mr. Piley, 1862. Another chronicler of the 14th century is RALPH OF RASTLIGH HEMER, a Benedictine monk of St. Werburgh at Chester, where he died at a great age about A.D. 1370. His 100-year chronicon was a Universal History in 7 books. Only the part preceeding the Norman Conquest was printed in Only a Scriptores XV (Oxon 1691, fol.); but John de Trevisa's English translation of the whole work, completed before the end of the century, was printed by Caxton, who added an eighth book, in A.D. 1482. Some authorities ascribe to Higden the Chester Virgiles, performed in A.D. 1323. The History of Samson, Abbot of Gury St Edmunds (A.D. 1172-1203), by JOCELIN OF BLAKETOWN, only recently discovered, has furnished the materials for Mr. Carlyle's vivid picture of the old abbot and his age (Past and Present, 1843).

Besides the writings of these chroniclers (and several almost as important might be named), we have a mass of public rolls and registers, beginning with Domesday Book, but these official documents hardly belong to literature.

3 The frequent resort of Englishmen to the University of Bologna gave an impulse to the study of Civil Law, which excited the emulation of the great masters of the Common Law, and so produced, towards the end of the twelfth century, the first great treatise on the laws of England, the Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ, by the chief jurist, RANULPH DE GLANVILLE (d. A.D. 1190).

4 The Letters of the leading churchmen of the age, besides the value of their matter, afford many good specimens of Latin composition. Beginning with Lanfranc and Anselm the series comes down to THOMAS A BECKET and STEPHEN LANGTON, but by far the most valuable for their matter, and the most interesting for their literary excellence are those of John of Salisbury and Peter of Blois, which reveal to us much both of the political and the scholastic history of the latter half of the twelfth century. The letters of ROBERT GROSSETESTE have been edited by Mr Luard, 1861; and the works of John of Salisbury are thoroughly analyzed in the monograph of Dr Schaarschmidt, Leipzig, 1862.

5 Latin Poetry was cultivated as an elegant accomplishment by the men of learning, as Lawrence of Durham Henry of Huntingdon, John of Salisbury, John de Hauteville, and others. But a more natural, though irregular school was formed under the influence of the minstrels the application of whose accentual system of verse to Latin, in defiance of quantity, gave rise to the Leonine Verse, which was used for epigrams, satires and also for the hymns of the Church. The term Leonine describes specifically verses rhymed as well as accentual, but both forms are common. Leonine verse was naturalized in Europe by the end of the eleventh century. It was applied to hymnology by St. Bernard St. Thomas Aquinas, and Pope Innocent III., and every one is familiar with some of the finest of these hymns, as the Dies Irae and Stabat Mater (See the Hymns Ecclesiae, Oxon. 1838). A curious instance of its use in England is furnished by the epitaph on Bede, the first line of which was transformed by later ingenuity into

"Continet hæc theca Bedæ venerabilis ossa,"

"Continet hæc fossa Bedæ venerabilis ossa."

A further stage of license is seen in the frivolous Macaronic Poetry, which abounds not only in Latin words of the strangest formation but in mixtures of different languages, as in the following example in Latin French, and English, belonging to the early part of Edward II.'s reign (Marsh p. 247) —

"Quasi homines dicit pariter, vident quæ verba loquatur non current aer ne stultior inveniat

Quædo quis loquitur, loquitur resque verba et

Verbum patitur, aut Intel so shall he sayne; — and so on. 'This confusion of tongues,' adds Mr Marsh "led very naturally to the corruption of them all and consequently none of them were written or spoken as correctly as at the period when they were kept distinct

But the Leonine, as indeed also the regular verse was chiefly used for satire especially by the secular clergy and by laymen against the regular clergy and the vices of the age. Here is one example —

"Mille annis jam peractis
Nulla fides est in pactis;
Mel in ore, verba lactis,
Fol in corde, frans in factis."

It was employed also for all manner of light and popular pieces. The earliest known writer in this style was HILANUS, a disciple of Abelard and probably an Englishman who flourished about A.D. 1125. A mass of such poetry probably by various writers, is ascribed to WALTER MAPES, or MAP, Archdeacon of Oxford, under Henry II. under the general title of Confessio Goliath, — Goliath being the type of loose lives, especially among the clergy. Map also wrote in regular Latin verse, and in prose De Augusti Curialium. He was an author too in Anglo-Norman poetry and prose, chiefly on the legends of Arthur. Altogether he seems to have been one of the most active minds of the age.

The regular Latin writers were up in arms against the Leonines. GREGORY VINSAUVE already noticed as a chronicler addressed to Pope Innocent III. a regular poem, De Avast Poetria of great merit, and containing interesting allusions to contemporary history. His overstrained lament for Richard's death is satirized by Chaucer even while addressing him as

"O Gaufrida, dear malster sovereign."

One of the last and best examples of the regular Latin poetry is the work of JOSEPHUS ISCAHTUS (Joseph of Exeter, d. about A.D. 1210) de Bello Trojano, which was so popular as to be used in schools with the classic poets. He also wrote a Latin poem entitled Antiochela, on Richard's expedition to Palestine. But the whole style was doomed to extinction before a more vigorous rival than the Leonines — the vernacular poetry which sprang up in imitation of the French minstrelsy — and it had almost disappeared by the middle of the thirteenth century.

II THE ANGLO-NORMAN FRENCH LITERATURE WAS, as already observed, chiefly in poetry and the production of laymen, whether the professional minstrels, or knights and even kings who deemed it a gentlemanly accomplishment to sing as well as act the deeds of chivalry. RICHARD CŒUR DE LION (d. A.D. 1199) was the type of the latter class, and the style he cultivated and patronized was that of the Troubadours.

(see the text) Every one knows the legend of the discovery of the place of his captivity by his tenson with the minstrel Blondel, and his arrest against his barons, composed in prison, has come down to us with a few other fragments.* (See the great work of Raynouard on Provençal Poetry) But the great mass of the poetry which the Normans brought in was that of the Trouvères. It may be arranged in four classes—

- (1) Romances, relating chiefly to these four cycles of legends—Charlemagne and his Paladins, of whom the Norman minstrel Isabelle is said to have sung at Hastings, Arthur and his Knights, founded on the legends of Wales and Brittany, Cœur de Lion, his exploits and sufferings, and Alexander of Macedon, the chief poem of this cycle (the Alexandreis, A.D. 1184) giving its name to the Alexandrine Verse,—
- (2) The Fabliaux, or Metrical Tales of Real Life, often derived from the East,—
- (3) Satires of which the Desplan fable was a common form, as in that tale common to Europe, Reynard the Fox, and
- (4) The Metrical Chronicles. Of these last a most important example is the Brut d'Angleterre of WACE (d. after A.D. 1171), who also wrote, in French, the Roman de Rou (Romance of Rollo). His Brut, borrowed from Geoffrey of Monmouth, became the source of the Brut of Layamon (see below). Though this French poetry is of great importance in our literature, as it furnished both subjects and models for later English poets, there are few of its writers whose names require special mention. We have religious and moral poems in French of a very early date, and the universally accomplished ROBERT GROSSETESTE, Bishop of Lincoln, wrote in this as well as other styles. GEOFFREY DE VIGEAUX composed metrical chronicles in French as well as Latin, and he had a rival in BENOIT DE ST MAUR (fl. A.D. 1180), author of the Romance of Troy and Chronicle of the Dukes of Normandy. GEOFFREY GADIER (about A.D. 1148) wrote a Chronicle of the Anglo-Saxon Kings. THOROLD was the author of the Roman de Roland, and a Roman d'Alexandre is ascribed to THOMAS OF KENT, who is variously placed in the twelfth and fourteenth centuries. The Roman de la Rose, imitated by Chaucer, is the earliest French work of the thirteenth century. Other favourite romances were, Havelok the Dane, the Gest of King Horn, Bevis of Hampton, and Guy of Warwick. Most of the authors of these works were native Englishmen, though they wrote in French, which had become almost the sole vehicle of popular literature.

The Prose Versions of the Romances in Norman French were written chiefly by Englishmen. The most important series was formed by those of Arthur, containing the Roman de St Graal (or Holy Cup) the Roman de Merlin the Roman de Lancelot, the Quête du St Graal, and the Roman de la Mort Arthus, with a sequel, in two parts, the Roman de Tristan (or Tristrem). The chief writer was WALTER MARES (already mentioned), but the Roman de St Graal is by ROBERT DE BORNOV, the first part of the Tristan by LUCES DE GAST, and the second part of the Tristan by HILAR DE BONROV.

A digest of these romances, made by Sir Thos Malory, who was alive under Edward IV., has been edited by Mr Wright, from the last black letter edition of 1634 under the title of "La Mort d'Arthur. The History of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table," London, 1858.

Excepting some versions of portions of Scripture, these are the only important works in Anglo-Norman prose, till we come to the grand Chronicle of SIRE JEAN FROISSART the liveliest picture which an imaginative historian ever drew of events witnessed for the most part by himself. Froissart was born at Valenciennes about A.D. 1337, but his chronicle extends over the whole reigns of Edward III and Richard II (A.D. 1326-1400). He was also a great poet, and on his last visit to England (1396) he presented his poetical works to King Richard II.

Q.—SEMI-SAXON LITERATURE.

A.D. 1150-1250

The end of the Saxon Chronicle marks the close of the old Anglo-Saxon Language, as well as Literature, for the chronicler does not throw down his pen before he has begun to confuse his grammar and to corrupt his vocabulary with French words. The language dies out in literature, to appear again as almost a new creation, the basis of our English but not at first in a finished form. The state of transition occupies two centuries from about the accession of Henry II. (1151) to the middle of the reign of Edward III. (1350), when Chaucer rose. The compositions of this age can hardly be divided by any clear line of demarcation, but the first of the two centuries, to the middle of Henry III.'s reign, may be conveniently assigned to the Semi-Saxon period, the second to the Old English. The writers in both dialects were for the most part translators and imitators of the Norman poets, and their works may be assigned to the same four heads. There are, however, a few more original fragments, such as the Song of Canute, as he rowed past Ely recorded by the monk of Ely, who wrote about A.D. 1166, the Hymn of St Gomma (d. A.D. 1170), and to have been set up at Here (A.D. 1189). But three chief works may be chosen as most characteristic of the language of the Semi-Saxon period.

* The strenite (from scribitum military service) related to military affairs, the tenson probably comes from contentio a 'contention' between two singers.

(1) LAYAMON'S Brut, or Chronicle of Britain, of which there are two texts one much earlier than the other. The title of the English Ennius formerly applied to Robert of Gloucester may now fairly be transferred to Layamon. He tells us that he was a priest of Elnley near Redstone on the Severn (probably Lower Arley), and that he compiled his work partly from a book in English by St. Bede which can only mean the translation of the Historia Ecclesiastica ascribed to Alfred partly from one in Latin by St. Albin and Austin and partly from one made by a French clerk, named Wace and presented to Eleanor, queen of Henry II. He seems however, to have followed only Bede in the story of Pope Gregory and the English slaves at Rome, his second authority appears to be but a confused reference to the Latin text of the Historia Ecclesiastica, and his work was really founded upon the Brut of Wace, already noticed. This he amplified from 15,300 lines to 32,250 partly by paraphrasing, partly by inserting speeches and other compositions, such as the Dream of Arthur, which show much imaginative power and partly by the addition of many legends, from Welsh and other sources not used by Geoffrey of Monmouth. He makes several allusions to works in English which are now lost. The date of the completion of the work, usually assigned to the latter years of Henry II., should probably be brought below A.D. 1200 after John's accession. The style of the work bears witness to Norman influence both in the structure of the verse and the manner of the narrative but not nearly so much as might have been expected from the translator of a French original. The earlier text has not fifty words of French origin, and both texts only about ninety. "We find preserved," says Sir F. Madden, "in many passages of Layamon's poem the spirit and style of the earlier Anglo-Saxon writers. No one can read his description of battles without being reminded of the Ode on Athelstan's Victory at Brunanburgh." After noticing resemblances in grammar and language he adds "A foreign scholar and poet (Grunnig) versed both in Anglo-Saxon and Scandinavian literature, has found Layamon's beyond comparison the most lofty and animated in its style at every moment reminding the reader of the splendid phraseology of Anglo-Saxon verse. It may also be added, that the colloquial character of much of the work renders it peculiarly valuable as a monument of the language since it serves to convey to us, in all probability the current speech of the writer's time" (Preface, pp. xxiii, xxiv). His verse also retains the alliterative structure of the Anglo-Saxon poetry, mingled with the rhyming couplets of the French the former predominating. Besides alliteration, which consists in the sameness of initial consonants Layamon uses the kindred device of assonance, that is, the concurrence of syllables containing the same vowel. The rhyming couplets are founded (as Dr. Guest has shown, History of English Rhythms vol. II., pp. 114 foll.) on the Anglo-Saxon rhythms of 4, 5, 6 or 7 accents those of 5 and 6 being the most frequent. The important bearing of Layamon's dialect on the history of the formation of the English language is fully discussed by Sir F. Madden (Preface, pp. xxi, xxviii) who concludes that "the dialects of the western, southern, and midland counties contributed together to form the language of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries and consequently to lay the foundation of modern English. To the historical student the work is important as the last and fullest form of the old Celtic traditions concerning early British history (Layamon's Brut, &c., with a Literal Translation Notes and a Grammatical Glossary By Sir Frederick Madden, B.L. Published by the Soc. of Ant., 3 vols., 1847.)

(2) The Ancien Rule (the Rule of Female Anchorites i. e. Rules), a code of monastic precepts drawn up in prose by an unknown author about the end of the twelfth century or beginning of the thirteenth and edited for the Camden Society by the Rev Jas. Morton, 1853, is also most valuable for the history of our language. Its proportion of French words is about four times that of Layamon, the English is rude and the spelling uncouth.

(3) The Ormulum is so called by its author after his own name ORM or ORMIN. It was a series of homilies in verse on the Lessons from the New Testament in the Church Service, on an immense scale. The extant portion contains nearly 10,000 lines (or rather couplets) of 15 syllables, only differing from the "common service metro" by ending with an unaccented syllable, and entirely free from the Anglo-Saxon alliteration. Apart from the peculiar system of spelling, to which the author attaches great importance, and which deserves study, its language differs far less than Layamon's from the English of the present day. Written in the east or north-east (perhaps near Peterborough), the Ormulum occupies in the Anglian literature a place answering to that of the Brut in the Saxon, and it tends to prove that the former dialect was the first to throw off the old inflections. The work only exists in one MS. (in the Bodleian Library) which is thought to be the autograph, its hasty writing in ink and material, seem to assign it to the earlier part of the thirteenth century. The character of the language, and the regular rhythm of the verse, however, lead some to place it decidedly after the middle of the thirteenth century, and therefore in the Old English period.

The versification seems to be modelled on the contemporary Latin poetry. The language has a small admixture of Latin ecclesiastical words, with scarcely a trace of Norman French. "I am much disposed to believe," says Mr Marsh (Origin and History, &c., p 179), "that the spelling of the Ormulum constitutes as faithful a representation of the oral English of its time as any one work could be at a period of great confusion of speech." The work has been edited with Notes and a Glossary, by R. M. White, D.D., 2 vols., Ox 1852.

Other works in Semi-Saxon that have been printed are the Homily of St Edmund, in Thorpe's Analecta, the Bestiary and Proverbs falsely ascribed to King Alfred, in the Reliquiae Antiquae, the Address of the Soul to the Body, printed by Sir Thomas Phillipps in 1838, and reprinted by Mr Singer in 1845, and the Legend of St Catherine edited by Mr Norton for the Abbotford Club in 1841.

D.—OLD ENGLISH LITERATURE

A.D 1250 1350

By the middle of the reign of Henry III. the language finally lost those inflectional and other peculiarities which distinguish the Anglo-Saxon from the English, but it retains archaisms which sufficiently distinguish it from the language of the present day to justify the title of Old English.

Some regard the short proclamation of Henry III., in A.D 1258, as the earliest monument of Old English, while others consider it as Semi Saxon. It is printed and fully discussed by Marsh (Origin and History, &c., pp 189, foll.) The Surtees Psalter stands also on the line dividing the two periods, being probably not later than A.D 1250.

Among the chief literary works of this period is the metrical Chronicle of ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER, from the legendary age of Brutus to the close of Henry III.'s reign. The latter part at all events, must have been written after A.D 1297. The earlier part closely follows Geoffrey of Monmouth, but the old prose chronicler is more truly poetical than his metrical imitator. The verse is the long line (or couplet) of fourteen syllables, divisible into eight and six, its movement is rough and inharmonious. The Chronicle was printed from incorrect MSS., by Hearne, 2 vols 8vo., Oxon, 1724, and this edition was reprinted in London, 1810. Short works by Robert of Gloucester, as the Martyrdom of Thomas à Becket and the Life of St Brendan, were printed by the Percy Society in 1846. A collection of Lives of the Saints is also attributed to this author, whose works, though of small literary merit, are valuable for the light they throw on the progress of the English language.

On a still larger scale is the metrical Chronicle of ROBERT MANING, or ROBERT OF BRUXNE, the last considerable work of the Old English period. It is in two parts. The first, translated from the Brut of Wace, reaches to the death of Cadwallader the second, from the Anglo-Norman of Peter de Langtoft, comes down to the death of Edward I. (A.D 1307). The second part only has been published, with the editions of Robert of Gloucester mentioned above. The work is evidently an imitation of Robert's, and of about equal literary merit. The language is a step nearer to modern English the most important changes being the use of s for th in the third person singular, and the introduction of nearly the present forms of the feminine personal pronoun. The verse is smoother than that of Robert of Gloucestre. The first part is in the eight-syllable line of Wace, the second is partly in the same metre, and partly in the Alexandrine, the heroic measure of the age.

Far more interesting in themselves are the popular poems of this age, translated or imitated for the most part from the French and belonging to the same classes of Romances Fabliaux and Satires. But there are some ballads and songs of genuine native origin, as early as the middle of the thirteenth century. Such are the story of the Norfolk peasant-boy Willy Grece the song beginning Sumer is I-cumen in the oldest to which the notes are added, and many of the pieces (including political ballads) printed by Warton, Percy, Ritson and Wright.

One of the most pleasing of these poems is the Owl and Nightingale a dispute between the two birds about their powers of song consisting of about 1800 verses in rhymed octosyllable metre.

The satirical poem, called the Land of Cockayne, which Warton placed before the reign of Henry II., is at least as late as A.D. 1300 and is clearly traced to a French original. It is somewhat doubtfully ascribed, with other poems, to MICHAEL OF KILDARE the first Irishman who wrote verses in English. It is a satire upon the monks. That the Metrical Romances should have been translated from the French, is a natural result of the fact, that French was the language of popular literature for some generations after the Conquest. Many of the legends were indeed, British and Anglo-Saxon, but this may be accounted for by the affinity of the Britons and Armoricans and the close connection between the Norman and the later Anglo-Saxon kings. Nor is it probable that the Trouvères should have missed many of these legends. Their poetry at first amused the leisure and enlivened the banquets of the conquerors, but, as the two races became one and as the Anglo-Saxon tongue died out, they began to be translated into the new formed language of the English people. The most popular of these such as Richard, Sir Tristram, Sir Gawaine, Kyng Horn, King Alexander, and Richard Cour de Lion may be referred to the beginning of Edward I.'s reign. They are followed by a series of poems by unknown authors, far too numerous to mention, down to and considerably below the age of Chaucer many of which are printed in the collections mentioned below. The change, by which these English Metrical Romances superseded the French originals, may be referred to the fourteenth century. In the fifteenth their popularity, besides being divided with the prose romances yielded, at least among the educated classes, to the regular poetry of Chaucer and his school, but they only ceased to be generally written after the beginning of the sixteenth. It was not till 300 years later that Sir Walter Scott revived the taste for a kind of poetry, similar in form but appealing to very different sentiments. Among the Minor Poems other than Romances, are many imitations of the French Fabliaux, or tales of Common Life. The Satires both political and ecclesiastical, and ably helped the progress of freedom under Henry III and his successors and prepared the way for Wickliffe if they do not rather exhibit a state of popular feeling demanding such a teacher.

The chief authorities for these four periods are Wright, Biographia Britannica Literaria Vol. I. The Anglo-Saxon Period Lond. 1842, Vol. II. The Anglo-Norman Period Lond. 1846, Percy Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, first published in 1765, Warton History of English Poetry 1774 edited by Price 3 vols 8vo, Lond. 1840, Tyrwhitt Chaucer's Canterbury Tales with Preliminary Essays, 1775, Pinkerton Scottish Poems 3 vols 1792, Herbert Robert the Devil 1793, Ritson, Ancient Songs and other collections, Ellis George Specimens of Early English Metrical Romances 3 vols. 8vo 1805, Wright, Political Songs of England from John to Edward II., 1839 the publications of the Roxburghe Club, the Bannistyne Maitland Abbotsford and Camden Societies the Society of Antiquaries &c., Chambers Cyclopaedia of English Literature Craik History of English Literature and the English Language 2 vols 1861, March Origin and History of the English Language 1862.

CHAPTER II

THE AGE OF CHAUCER A.D. 1350—A.D. 1400

§ 1 The fourteenth century a great period of transition—Chaucer, the type of his age § 2 His literary predecessors, especially GOWER § 3 Influence of WICLIFFE § 4 CHAUCER his personal history, character, and appearance § 5 Two periods in his literary career, corresponding to the Romantic and Renaissance tendencies The religious element his relations to Wicliffe § 6 Critical survey of his works Of the Romantic type—(i) Poem of the Rose, (ii) Court of Love, (iii) Assembly of Fowls, (iv) Cucuz and Nightingale, (v) The Ilover and the Leaf, (vi) Chaucer's Dream, (vii) Boke of the Duchesse, (viii) House of Fame Of the Renaissance type, (ix) The Legend of Good Women, (x) Troilus and Cressida § 7 The CANTERBURY TALLS the Prologue and Portrait Gallery § 8 Plan incomplete. The existing Tales their arrangement, metrical form, and sources § 9 Critical examination of the chief Tales, in their two classes, serious and humorous The two prose Tales § 10 Chaucer's services to the English language

§ 1. THE fourteenth century is the most important epoch in the intellectual history of Europe It is the point of contact between two widely-differing eras in the social, religious, and political annals of our race, the slack water between the ebb of Feudalism and Chivalry, and the "young flood" of the Revival of Letters and the great Protestant Reformation As in the long bright nights of the Arctic summer, the glow of the setting sun melts imperceptibly into the redness of the dawning, so do the last brilliant splendours of the feudal institutions and the chivalric literature transfuse themselves, at this momentous period, into the glories of that great intellectual movement which has given birth to modern art, letters, and science Of this great transformation, the personal career, no less than the works, of the first great English poet, CHAUCER, will furnish us with the most exact type and expression, for, like all men of the highest order of genius, he at once followed and directed the intellectual tendencies of his age, and is himself the "abstract and brief chronicle" of the spirit of his time Dante is not more emphatically the representative of the moral, religious, and political ideas of Italy, than Chaucer of English literature He was, indeed, an epitome of the time in which he lived a time when chivalry, about to perish for ever as a political institution, was giving forth its last and most dazzling rays, "and, like the sun, looked larger at its setting," when the magnificent court of Edward III had carried the splendour of that system to the height of its development, and when the victories of Sluys, of Crécy, and Poitiers, by exciting the national pride, tended to consummate the fusion into one vigorous nationality of the two elements which formed the English people and the English language. It was these triumphs that gave to the English character its peculiar insularity, and made the Englishman, whether knight or yeoman, regard himself as the member of a separate and superior race, enjoying a higher degree of liberty and a more solid material welfare than existed among the neighbouring continental monarchies. The literature, too, abundant in quantity, if not remarkable for much originality of form, was rapidly taking a purely English tone, the rhyming chronicles and legendary romances were either translated into, or originally composed in, the vernacular language.

§ 2 Thus, among the predecessors of Chaucer, the literary stars that heralded the splendid dawning of our national poetry, Richard Rolle, Laurence Minot, and among his contemporaries, Langlande in South Britain, and Barbour and Wyntoun in Scotland, all show evident traces of a purely English spirit*. The immediate poetical predecessor of Chaucer, however, was undeniably GOWER, whose interminable productions, half moral, half narrative, and with a considerable infusion of the scholastic theology of the day, though they certainly will terrify a modern reader by their tiresome monotony and the absence of originality, rendered inestimable services to the infant literature, by giving regularity, polish, and harmony to the language. Indeed, the style and diction of Gower is surprisingly free from difficult and obsolete expressions, his versification is extremely regular, and he runs on in a full and flowing, if commonplace and unpoetical, stream of disquisition. It is very curious, as an example of the contemporary existence of the French, the Latin, and the vernacular literature at this period in England, that the three parts of Gower's immense work should have been composed in three different languages—the Vox Clamantis in Latin, the Speculum Mediantis in Norman-French, and the Confessio Amantis in English.†

§ 3 In endeavouring to form an idea of the intellectual situation of England in the fourteenth century, we must by no means leave out of the account the vast influence exerted by the preaching of Wickliffe, and the mortal blow struck by him against the foundations of Catholic supremacy in England. This, together with the general hostility excited by the intolerable corruptions of the monastic orders, which had gradually invaded the rights, the functions, and the possessions of the far more practically-useful working or parochial clergy, still farther intensified that enquiring spirit which prompted the people to refuse obedience to the temporal as well as spiritual authority of the Roman See, and paved the way for an ultimate rejection of the Papal yoke. Much influence must also be attributed to Wicliffe's translation of the Bible into the English language, and to the gradual employment of that idiom in the services of the church, in the perfecting and regulating of the English language, an influence similar in kind to the settlement of the German language by Luther's version of the same holy book, though, perhaps, less powerful in degree for in the latter case the reading class in Germany must have been more numerous than in the England of the fourteenth century*.

* For an account of Chaucer's predecessors, see Notes and Illustrations (A)

† For a fuller account of Gower, see Notes and Illustrations (B).

§ 4 GEOFFREY CHAUCER was born about 1340, and his long and active life extended till the 25th of October, 1400. Consequently the poet's career almost coincides, in its commencement, with the splendid administration of Edward III., and comprehends also the short and disastrous reign of Richard II., whose assassination preceded the poet's death by only a few months. In the brilliant court of Edward, in the gay and fantastic tourney, as well as in the sterner contests of actual warfare, the poet appears to have played no insignificant part. Geoffrey was the son of John Chaucer, vintner, of Thames Street, London, and of Agnes, his wife, his grandfather, Robert Chaucer, had carried on the like occupation of bottler. His surname points to a trading and respectable parentage. We have distinct proof, not only in the fact of his having been "armed for twenty-seven years" (which is shown by his evidence in the disputed cause of the Scrope and Grosvenor arms), but also in the honourable posts which he held, that Chaucer, as one of the Esquires to the King, and M.P. for Kent, obtained access to the higher sphere of society. His marriage (which perhaps took place in 1374) with one of the maids of honour in attendance upon Queen Philippa,—herself also named Philippa, and possibly a relative of the poet,—affords further evidence of this fact.

Though we do not yet know the exact year of Chaucer's birth, we have evidence that his father was not married in 1328, and we may safely infer that he was not in 1331. In December 1324, the boy John Chaucer, then not fourteen, was carried off from his mother and her third husband, Richard Chaucer, by one Geoffrey Stace, Agnes de Westhall, and their confederates, in order that they might marry the boy to a Joan de Esthale, but his mother recovered him before the marriage took place. In 1328, Geoffrey

* For an account of Wicliffe and his school, see Notes and Illustrations (C).

Stace stated that John Chaucer was "unhore disarmie," still unmarried,* and from the plea of the said Geoffrey in prison † in 1331, it is pretty clear that John Chaucer was still a bachelor. The date of about 1340, as that of Geoffrey Chaucer's birth, harmonizes best with what we know of his life.

The boy, perhaps, went to the cathedral school of St. Paul's, or some other monastic school, as a day-boy, took part in all the sports described by Fitzstephen in earlier days, and talked to the foreigners, shipmen, and dealers, connected with his father's trade. That father, John Chaucer, had been, in 1338, in attendance on Edward III and his Queen, Philippa, and had no doubt kept up his connection with the court. Hence he would be able to get his son into the household of one of the king's children. In those days young men were sent for training either into noblemen's houses or to the University. Accordingly we find that during the years 1356-9, Geoffrey Chaucer, the future poet, was in the service of Elizabeth de Burgh, wife of Lionel Duke of Clarence, probably as page. He was taken prisoner in 1359 by the French at the siege of Rhétiers, and being ransomed, according to the custom of those times, was enabled to return to England in 1360.

For a period of seven years, from 1360 onwards, trustworthy information respecting Chaucer's life is almost wholly wanting. In 1367 we find him named one of the "valets of the king's chamber," and writs are addressed to him under the then honourable designation "dictus valettus noster." His official career appears to have been active and even distinguished: he enjoyed during a long period various profitable offices connected with the customs, having been comptroller of the important revenue arising from the large importation of Bordeaux and Gascon wines into the port of London, and he seems also to have been occasionally employed in diplomatic negotiations. Thus he was joined with two citizens of Genoa in a commission to Italy in 1373, on which occasion he is supposed to have made the acquaintance of Petrarch, then the most illustrious man of letters in Europe. Chaucer was identified to a considerable degree with the household and party of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster. In his Boke of the Duchesse he laments the death of his patron's first wife, Blanche, which took place in 1369, and incidentally lets us learn that he is now cured of a long love-sickness of his own,—an unreturned passion, probably for some high-born beauty of the Court, which he had already sung in his Compleynte to Pity (1367), and from which he could not deliver himself during eight past years, but now all is over—"what will not be, must needs be left." Chaucer recovered from his love-sorrow, married, and took his share in active life. In 1386

* Rolls of Parliament. ii 14 † Coram Rege, Trinity Term, 5 Edw. III.

he was elected as representative of Kent in the Parliament which was dissolved in November of the same year

But when thus the wheel of fortune had lifted him to his highest point, it turned, and cast him gradually down. On the 4th of December, 1386, Chaucer lost his Comptrollership of Customs and Subsidies, and on the 14th of December his Comptrollership of Petty Customs. In October, 1386, he had lost the rooms that the City of London had granted him on the 10th of May, 1374, above the gate of Aldgate. In these he had probably lived the twelve years of his custom-house work. In the latter half of 1387 his wife died. How far this last event was considered a calamity by him may be doubted. His allusion to his wife in the House of Fame, and his frequent disquisitions on wives' tempers, leave the reader with an impression that Mrs Chaucer was not the most amiable of her sex. Certainly it was in no mood of moping widowhood that Chaucer went his Canterbury pilgrimage in the spring of 1388, but twinkling with humour, and as full of sly fun and power of enjoyment as ever poet was. But directly after he must have wanted money, as, on the 1st of May he had to assign his two pensions of twenty marks each to John Scully. In 1389, however, he got appointed clerk of the king's works, &c, at Westminster, at 2s a day, and in 1390 clerk of the works at St George's Chapel, Windsor. In the course of these works he laid out above 1200*l* of the king's money, including 8*l* 12*s* 6*d* for the scaffolds he had put up for Richard II and his queen to see the Smithfield jousts from, in 1390, and on Tuesday, September 6, 1390, he was twice robbed of sums amounting to 20*l*, his horse, &c. In June and July, 1391, Chaucer lost his two appointments, but he obtained from Richard II a fresh pension of 20*l* a year, in February 1394. After this he was obliged to get loans from the Exchequer, and when Isabella Buckholt sued him in April-May, 1398, for 14*l* 1*s* 11*d*, he procured from the king letters of protection against his creditors. Thus there is only too good reason to believe that, though his pecuniary circumstances must have been, during a great part of his life, proportionable to the position he occupied in the state and in society, his last days were more or less clouded by embarrassment. But on the accession, in 1399, of Henry IV, the son of the duchess Blanche, whose death and beauty Chaucer had celebrated in 1369, the poet obtained help from the new king. He also got a lease of a house near Westminster Abbey. Here the close of his career was probably passed, near London, the city which he loved for its picturesque life, and its various types of human character. His death took place at Westminster, in his house, which was afterwards removed to make room for the chapel of Henry VII.

§ 5 The literary and intellectual career of Chaucer seems to divide itself naturally into two periods, closely corresponding with the two great social and political tendencies which meet in the fourteenth century. The earlier productions of Chaucer bear the stamp and character of the Chivalric, his later and more original creations of the Renaissance literature. It is more than probable that the poet's visits to Italy, then the fountain and centre of the great literary revolution, brought him into contact with the works and the men by whose example the change in the taste of Europe was brought about. Dante, it is true, died before the birth of Chaucer, and though his influence as a poet, a theologian, and a metaphysician, may not yet have fully reached England, yet Chaucer must have fallen under it in some degree. There is a third element in the character of Chaucer's writings, besides the imitation of the decaying Romance and the rising Renaissance literature, which must be taken into account by all who would form a true conception of his intellect, and this is the religious element. It is difficult to ascertain how far the poet sympathized with the bold doctrines of Wicliffe, who, like himself, was favoured and protected by John of Gaunt, fourth son of Edward III. It is, however, probable, that though he sympathized—as is shown by a thousand satirical passages in his poems—with Wicliffe's hostility to the monastic orders and abhorrence of the corruptions of the clergy, and the haughty claims of papal supremacy, the poet did not share in the theological opinions of the reformer, then regarded as a dangerous heresiarch. Chaucer probably remained faithful to the creed of Catholicism, while attacking with irresistible satire the abuses of the Catholic ecclesiastical administration. How intense that satire is, may be gathered from the contemptible and odious traits which he has lavished on nearly all his portraits of monastic personages in the Canterbury Tales, and not less clearly from the strong contrast he has made between the sloth, sensuality, and trickery of these persons, and the almost ideal perfection of Christian virtue which he has associated with his Persounne, the only member of the secular or parochial clergy he has introduced into his inimitable gallery. It is by no means to be understood that the principal works of this great man can be ranged chronologically under the two strongly-marked categories just specified, or that all those bearing manifest traces of the Provençal spirit and forms were written previously, and those of the Renaissance or Italian type subsequently, to any particular epoch in the poet's life, but only that his earlier productions bear a general stamp of the one, and his later of the other literary tendency, while the greatest and most original of all, the Canterbury Tales, may be placed in a class by itself.

§ 6 In criticising Chaucer's works, we are at the outset met by the difficulty of distinguishing among the many mediæval poems

ascribed to him those which are genuine. Certain poems long included in the printed works of Chaucer have been set aside as not belonging to him by recent scholars upon two grounds—their absence in the most authoritative manuscripts, and their failing to conform to a rule of rhyming observed in all the unquestioned works of the poet (that of treating a final ye as a dissyllable). Upon these grounds we may consider as doubtful the Romaunt of the Rose (of which however some translation was certainly made by Chaucer), The Court of Love, The Complaint of the Black Knight (probably by Lydgate), The Cuckoo and the Nightingale, Chaucer's Dream, The Flower and the Leaf. It will be convenient however to take this opportunity of giving an account of some of these remarkable poems, and the reader will be the better fitted to understand the genius of Chaucer through acquaintance with works which certainly belong to the same general period.

(1) The Romaunt of the Rose is a translation of the famous French allegory Le Roman de la Rose, which forms the earliest monument of French literature in the 13th century. The original is of inordinate length, containing, even in the unfinished state in which it was left, 22,000 verses, and it consists of two distinct portions, the work of two very different hands. It was begun by Guillaume de Lorris, who completed about 5000 lines, and was continued after his death by the witty and sarcastic Jean de Méun the former of these authors died about 1240, and the latter was writing about 1270–80, which will make him nearly the contemporary of Dante. The portion composed by Lorris has great poetical merit, much invention of incident, vivid character-painting, and picturesque description, the allegorical colouring of the whole, though wire-drawn and tedious to our modern taste, was then highly admired, and gave the tale immense popularity. The continuation by Méun, though following up the allegory, diverges into a much more satirical spirit, and abounds in what were then regarded as most audacious attacks on religion, social order, the court, and female reputation. Even at this distance of time it is impossible not to admire the boldness, the vivacity, and the severity of the satire. According to the almost universal practice of the old Romance poets, the story is put into the form of a dream or vision, and the principal allegorical personages introduced, as Hate, Felony, Avarice, Sorrow, Envy, Pope-Holy, Poverty, Idleness, &c. are of the same kind as usually figure in the poetical narratives of the age. A lover—the hero of the poem—is alternately aided and obstructed in his undertakings: the principal of which is that of culling the enchanted rose, which gives its name to the poem, by a multitude of beneficent or malignant personages, such as Bel-Accueil, Faux-Semblant, Danger, Male-Bouche, and Constrained-Abstinence. Chaucer's translation, which is in the octosyllabic

Trouvère measure of the original, and consists of 7699 verses, comprehends the whole of the portion written by Lorris, together with about a sixth part of Méun's continuation, the portions omitted having either never been translated by the English poet in consequence of his dislike of the immoral and anti-religious tendency of which they were accused, or left out by the copyist from the early English manuscripts. The translation gives incessant proof of Chaucer's remarkable ear for metrical harmony, and also of his picturesque imagination, for though in many places he has followed his original with scrupulous fidelity, he not unfrequently adds vigorous touches of his own. Thus, for example, in the description of the Palace of Elde, a comparison between the original and the translation will show us a grand image entirely to be ascribed to the English poet —

Travail et Douleur la herbergent,
Mais ils la tient et enferment,
Et tant la batent et tormentent,
Que mort prochaine li présentent.

With hir Labour and Travaille
Logged ben with Sorwe and Woo,
That never out of hir court goo
Peyne and Distresse, Sykenesse and Ire,
And Malencoly, that angry sire,
Ben of hir paleys senatoures,
Gronyng and Gronchyng hir herbejeours.
The day and nyght hir to turment,
And tellen hir, erliche and late
That Deth stondith armed at hir gate.

(11) The Court of Love is a work bearing, both in its form and spirit, strong traces of that amorous and allegorical mysticism which runs through all the Provençal poetry, and which seems to have been developed into substantive institutions in the Cours d'Amour of Picardy and Languedoc, whose arrêts form such a curious example of the refining scholastic subtleties of mediæval theology transferred to the fashions of chivalric society. It is written in stanzas of seven lines, each line being of ten syllables, the first and third rhyming together, as do the second, fourth and fifth, and again the sixth and seventh. It is written in the name of "Philogenet of Cambridge," clerk (or student), who is directed by Mercury to appear at the Court of Venus. The above designation has induced some critics to suppose that the poet meant under it to indicate himself, and have drawn from it a most unfounded supposition that Chaucer had studied at Cambridge. The poet proceeds to give a description of the Castle of Love, where Admetus and Alcestis preside as king and queen. Philogenet is then conducted by Philobone to the Temple, where he sees Venus and Cupid, and where the oath of allegiance and obedience to the twenty commandments of Love is administered to the faithful. The hero is then presented to the Lady Rosal, with whom, in strict accordance with Provençal poetical custom, he has become enamoured in a dream. We then have a description of the courtiers, two of whom, Golden and Leaden Love, seem to be borrowed from the Eros and Anteros of the Platonic philosophers. The most curious part of the poem is the celebration of the grand festival of Love on May-day, when an exact parody of the Catholic Matin service for Trinity Sunday is chanted by various birds in honour of the God of Love.

(iii) In the Assembly of Fowls we have a poem written in the same form of verse as the preceding. The subject is a debate carried on before the Parliament of Birds to decide the claims of three eagles for the possession of a beautiful formel (female or hen) by which is meant some lady sought by royal lovers, not yet identified. The principal incidents of this poem were probably borrowed from a fabliau to which Chaucer has alluded in another place, and the popularity of which is proved by the existence of several versions of the same subject, as for instance Huelme et Eglantine, Le Jugement d'Amour, and Florence et Blancheflor.

(iv) The Cuckow and the Nightingale, though of no great length, is one of the most charming among this class of playful productions. It describes a controversy between the two birds, the former of which was among the poets and allegorists of the Middle Ages the emblem of profligate celibacy, while the Nightingale is the type of constant and virtuous conjugal love. In this poem we meet with a striking example of that exquisite sensibility to the sweetness of external nature, and in particular to the song of birds, which we know to have been possessed by Chaucer, like Chaucer assuredly (if not Chaucer himself), was the writer of the following inimitable passage.

"There sat I downe among the faire flourés,
And sawe the birdes trappe out of hir boures,
There as they rested hem alle the night,
They were so joytul of the dayes light,
They began of May for to done honoures.

They coude that service al by rote,
There was many a lovely note!
Some songe loud as they had plained,
And some in other manner voice yfained,
And some al oute with the fulle throte

They proyned hem, and maden hem right gay,
And daunceden and lepen on the spray
And evermore two and two in fere,
Right so as they had chosen hem to-yere
In Feverere upon Saint Valentine's day.

And the rivers that I sat upon,
It made such a noise as it ron,
Accordaunt with the birdes armony,
Me thought it was the beste melody
That mighte ben yheard of any man."

morning by the song of birds, and goes forth to join a party of hunters in the forest. Here he finds seated a young knight, clad in black, and absorbed in his sorrow. The poet having inquired the cause of his grief, the young knight (John of Gaunt) relates the story of his courtship, his brief season of wedded happiness, and the death of his lady "Faire white" (Blanche). The poet is unable to supply any adequate consolation, but at this moment the hunt is over, Chaucer awakes, and finds that it is a dream. The poem, which is one of great beauty, belongs to the early period of Chaucer's authorship.

(viii.) For its extraordinary union of brilliant description with learning and humour, the poem of the House of Fame is sufficient of itself to stamp Chaucer's reputation. It is written in the octosyllabic measure, and under the fashionable form of a dream or vision, gives us a vivid and striking picture of the Temple of Fame, crowded with aspirants for immortal renown, and adorned with myriad statues of great poets and historians, and the House of Rumour, thronged with pilgrims, pardoners, sailors, and other retailers of wonderful reports. The Temple, though originally borrowed from the Metamorphoses of Ovid, exhibits in its architecture and adornment that strange mixture of pagan antiquity with the Gothic details of mediæval cathedrals, that strikes us in the poetry and in the illuminated MSS. of the fourteenth century, and in the description of the statues of the great poets we meet with a curious proof of that mingled influence of alchemical and astrological theories perceptible in the science and literature of Chaucer's age. In richness of fancy it far surpasses Pope's imitation, The Temple of Fame.

(ix.) The Legend of Good Women is supposed, from many circumstances, to have been one of the latest of Chaucer's compositions, and to have been written as a kind of amende honorable or recantation for his unfavourable pictures of female character, and in particular for his having, by translating the Roman de la Rose, to a certain degree identified himself with Jean de Méun's bitter sarcasms on the sex. Though the matter is closely translated, for the most part, from the Heroides of Ovid, the colouring given to the stories is entirely Catholic and mediæval. The misfortunes of celebrated heroines of ancient story are related in the manner of the Legends of the Saints, and Dido, Cleopatra, and Medea are regarded as the Martyrs of Saint Venus and Saint Cupid. The poet's original intention was to compose the legends of nineteen celebrated victims of the tender passion, but the work having been left incomplete, we possess only those of Cleopatra, Thisbe, Dido, Hypsipyle, Medea, Lucretia, Ariadne, Philomela, and Phyllis. The poem is in ten-syllable heroic couplets, the rhymed heroic measure, and exhibits a consummate mastery over the resources of the English language and prosody, and many striking passages of description interpolated by Chaucer. A few droll anachronisms also may be noted, as the introduction of cannon at the Battle of Actium.

(x) The poem which the generations contemporary with, or succeeding to, the age of Chaucer placed nearest to the level of the Canterbury Tales, was unquestionably the Troilus and Creseide, and this judgment will be confirmed by a comparison of the two works, though the wonderful variety and humour of the Tales has tended to throw into the shade, for modern readers, the graver beauties of the poem we are now about to examine. The source from which Chaucer drew his materials for this work was indubitably Boccaccio's poem entitled Filostrato. The story itself, which was extremely popular in the Middle Ages (and its popularity continued down to the time of Elizabeth, Shakespeare himself having dramatized it), has been traced to Guido di Colonna, and to the mysterious book entitled Trophe of the equally mysterious author Lollius, so often quoted in Chaucer's age, and respecting whom all is obscure and enigmatical. Some of the names and personages of the story, as Cryseida (Chryseis), Troilus, Pandarus, Diomedes, and Priam, are obviously borrowed from the Iliad, but their relative positions and personality have been most strangely altered, and the principal action of the poem, being the passionate love of Troilus for his cousin, her ultimate infidelity, the immoral subserviency of Pandarus, all of which became proverbial in consequence of the popularity of this tale,—all details, in short, bear the stamp of mediæval society, and have no resemblance whatever to the incidents and feelings of the heroic age, a period when the female sex was treated as it is now in Eastern countries, and when consequently that sentiment, which we call chivalric or romantic love, could have had no existence. Chaucer has frequently adhered to the text of the Filostrato, and has adopted the musical and flowing Italian stanza of seven lines, but in the conduct of the story he has shown himself far superior to his original, the characters of Troilus, Pandarus, and Creseide in the Filostrato, contrasting very unfavourably with the pure, noble, and ideal personages of the English poet, whose morality indeed, is far higher and more refined than that of his great Florentine contemporary. I may remark in conclusion, that this beautiful poem is of great length, nearly equal in this respect to the Æneid of Virgil, and that it abounds in charming descriptions, in exquisite traits of character, and in incidents which, though simple and natural, are involved and developed with great ingenuity.

§ 7 Chaucer's greatest and most original work is, beyond all comparison, the Canterbury Tales. It is in this that he has poured forth in inexhaustible abundance all his stores of wit, humour, pathos, splendour, and knowledge of humanity. It is this which will place him, till the remotest posterity, in the first rank among poets and character-painters

The exact portraiture of the manners, language, and habits of society in a remote age could not fail, even if executed by an inferior hand, to possess deep interest, as we may judge from the avidity with which we contemplate such traits of real life as are laboriously dug up by the patient curiosity of the antiquary from the dust and rubbish of bygone days. How great then is our delight when the magic force of a great poet evokes a whole series of our ancestors of the fourteenth century, making them pass before us "in their habit as they lived," acting, speaking, and feeling in a manner invariably true to general nature, and stamped with all the individuality of Shakespeare or Molière. The plan of the Canterbury Tales is singularly happy, enabling the poet to give us, first, a collection of admirable daguerreotypes of the various classes of English society, and then to place in the mouths of these persons a series of separate tales highly beautiful when regarded as compositions and judged on their own independent merits, but deriving an infinitely higher interest and appropriateness from the way in which they harmonize with their respective narrators. The work can be divided into two portions, which are, however, skilfully mixed up and incorporated the first being the general Prologue, describing the occasion on which the pilgrims assemble, the portraits of the various members of the troop, the adventures of their journey and their commentaries on the tales as they are successively related, and the second the tales themselves, viewed as separate compositions.

The general plan of the work may be briefly sketched as follows. The poet informs us, after giving a brief but picturesque description of spring, that being about to make a pilgrimage from London to the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket in the Cathedral of Canterbury, he passes the night previous to his departure at the hostelry of the Tabard in Southwark. While at the inn the hostelry is filled by a crowd of pilgrims bound to the same destination.

"In Southwerk at the Tabard as I lay,
Redy to wenden on my pilgrimage
To Canterbury with ful devout corage,
At night was come into that hostelrye
Wel nyne and twenty in a compaignye*
Of sondry folk, by aventure i-falle
In felawschipe, and pilgrims were thei alle,
That toward Canterbury wolden ryde."

The goodly company, assembled in a manner so natural in those times of pilgrimages and of difficult and dangerous roads, agree to travel in a body, and at supper the Host of the Tabard, a jolly and sociable personage, proposes to accompany the party and serve as a guide, having, as he says, often travelled the road before, and at the same time suggests that they may much enliven the tedium of their journey by relating stories as they ride. He is to be accepted by the whole society as a kind of judge or moderator, by whose decisions every one is to abide. As the journey to Canterbury and the return journey then occupied several days, the plan of the whole work, had Chaucer completed it, would have comprised the adventures on the outward journey, the arrival at Canterbury, a description, in all probability, of the splendid religious ceremonies and the visits to the numerous shrines and relics in the Cathedral, the return to London, the farewell supper at the Tabard, and dissolution of the pleasant company, which would separate as naturally as they had assembled. Harry Bailey proposes that each pilgrim should relate two tales on the journey out, and two more on the way home, and that on the return of the party to London, he who should be adjudged to have related the best and most amusing story should sup at the common cost. Such is the setting or framework in which the separate tales are inserted, and the circumstances and general mise en scene are so natural and unforced, that no reader refuses credence to the ancient tradition of our great poet's having founded his work upon an actual pilgrimage to Canterbury, in which he had himself taken part. The tales themselves are admirably in accordance with the characters of the persons who relate them, and the remarks and criticisms to which they give rise are no less humorous and natural, some of the stories suggesting others, just as would happen in real life under the same circumstances. The pilgrims are persons of all ranks and classes of society, and in the inimitable description of their manners, persons, dress, horses, &c., with which the poet has introduced them, we behold a vast and minute portrait gallery of the social state of England in the fourteenth century. They are—(1) A Knight, (2) A Squire, (3) A Yeoman, or military retainer of the class of the free peasants, who in the quality of an archer was bound to accompany his feudal lord to war, (4) A Prioress, a lady of rank, superior of a nunnery, (5, 6, 7, 8) A Nun and three Priests, in attendance upon this lady, (9) A Monk, a person represented as handsomely dressed and equipped, and passionately fond of hunting and good cheer, (10) A Friar, or Mendicant Monk, (11) A Merchant, (12) A Clerk, or Student of the University of Oxford, (13) A Serjeant of the Law, (14) A Franklin or rich country-gentleman, (15, 16, 17, 18, 19) Five wealthy burgesses or tradesmen, described in general but vigorous and characteristic terms, they are A Haberdasher, or dealer in silk and cloth, A Carpenter, A Weaver, A Dyer, and A Tapisser, or maker of carpets and hangings, (20) A Cook, or rather what in old French is called a rôtisseur, i.e. the keeper of a cook's shop; (21.) A Shipman, the master of a trading vessel, (22.) A Doctor of Physic; (23.) A Wife of Bath, a rich cloth-manufacturer (24.) A Parson, or secular parish priest, (25.) A Ploughman, the brother of the preceding personage, (26.) A Miller, (27.) A Manciple, or steward of a lawyer's hostel or inn of court; (28.) A Reeve, bailiff or intendant of the estates of some wealthy landowner, (29.) A Sompneur, or Sumner, an officer in the then formidable ecclesiastical courts, whose duty was to summon or cite before the spiritual jurisdiction those who had offended against the canon laws, (30.) A Pardoner, or vendor of Indulgences from Rome. To these thirty persons must be added Chaucer himself, and the Host of the Tabard, making in all thirty-two.

* But in his subsequent enumeration (see next page), Chaucer counts 30 persons.

§ 8 Now, if each of these pilgrims had related four tales, viz. two on the journey to Canterbury, and two on their return, the work would have contained 128 stories, independently of the subordinate incidents and conversations. In reality, however, the pilgrims do not arrive at their destination, and there are many evidences of confusion in the tales which Chaucer has given us, leading to the conclusion that the materials were left by the poet not only incomplete, but in an unarranged state. The stories that we possess are 24 in number, and are distributed as follows, in nine groups, each written originally independent of the other groups, though the tales of each group are carefully linked to one another. A The Knight, The Miller, The Reeve, The Cook (incomplete, The Tale of Gamelyn is spurious),* B The Man of Law, The Shipman, The Prioress, Chaucer himself (to whom two tales are assigned in a manner to which I shall refer presently), The Monk, the Nun's Priest, C The Doctor, The Pardoner, D The Wife of Bath, The Friar, The Sompneur, E The Clerk of Oxford, The Merchant, F The Squire, whose tale is left unfinished, The Franklin, G The Second Nun, The Canon's Yeoman—a personage who does not form a part of the original company, but joins the cavalcade on the journey, H The Manciple, and I the Parson. Thus it will be seen that many of the characters are left silent, while some of them relate more than one story, and two persons altogether extraneous are introduced. These are the Canon and his Yeoman, who unexpectedly join the cavalcade during the journey, at Beughton-under-Blean forest, about five miles from Ospringe, where the pilgrims had probably slept the night before. The Canon, who is represented as an Alchemist, half swindler and half dupe, is driven away from the company by shame at his attendant's indiscreet disclosures, and the latter, remaining with the pilgrims, relates a most amusing story of the villainous artifices of the charlatans who pretended to possess the Great Arcanum. The stories narrated by the pilgrims are admirably introduced by what the author calls "prologues," consisting either of remarks and criticisms on the preceding tale, and which naturally suggest what is to follow, of the incidents of the journey itself, an excellent example of which is the drunken uproariousness of the Miller and the Cook, or of the infinitely varied manner in which the Host proposes and the Pilgrims receive the command to perform their part in contributing to the common entertainment. The Tales are all in verse, with the exception of two, that of the Parson, and Chaucer's second narrative, the allegorical story of Melibæus and his wife Prudence. Those in verse exhibit an immense variety of metrical forms, ranging from the regular heroic rhymed couplet,—in which the largest portion of the work is composed, as well as the general prologue and introductions to each story,—through a great variety of stanzas of different lengths and arrangement, down to the short irregular octosyllable verse of the Trouvère Gestours, in which most of the chief Early-English poems had been written, such as the translation of the Cursor Mundi, Richard Rolle of Hampole's Prickle of Conscience. All these forms Chaucer handles with consummate ease and dexterity, and the nature of the versification will often assist us in tracing the sources from whence Chaucer derived or adapted his materials, whether from the fabliaux of the Provençal poets, the legends of the mediæval chroniclers, the Gesta Romanorum, or the early Italian writers, Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio.

* Group A. ends at Dartford, 15 miles on the road, B at Rochester, 30 miles, C and D probably at Sittingbourne, 40 miles, E. probably at Opringe, 46 miles, and F to I at Canterbury, 56 miles. The Tales range in date from that which is probably the earliest, The Second Nun's, 1373-4, to the Parson's, 1399-1400. The tests of date of the metrical Tales are the differences of metre and characterization. Certainly some, and probably all, of the Tales in stanzas, are before those in 5-measure couplets, which Chaucer seems to have begun writing in 1385. Those Tales, in which you know the characters as well as you do those in the Prologue, are near its date, say 1381. The lecturing in the Doctor's and Manciple's Tales shows them to be late.

§ 9 The Tales themselves may be roughly divided into the two great classes of serious, tragic, or pathetic, and comic or humorous. In both styles Chaucer has seldom been equalled, and assuredly never surpassed. His wonderful power of object and character-painting, the incomparable conciseness and vividness of his descriptions, the loftiness of his sentiment, and the intensity of his pathos, can only be paralleled by the richness of his humour and the outrageously droll, yet perfectly natural extravagance of his laughable scenes. Both in the one style and in the other, the peculiar naïveté and sly infantine simplicity of his language add a charm of the subtlest kind, the reality of which is best proved by the evaporation of this delicate perfume in the process, so often and so unsuccessfully attempted, of modernizing his language. The finest of the elevated and pathetic stories are the Knight's Tale—the longest of them all, in which is related the adventure of Palamon and Arcite;—the Squire's Tale, a wild half-oriental story of love, chivalry, and enchantment, the action of which goes on "at Sarray (Bakhtchi-Saray) in the land of Tartary," the Man of Law's Tale, the beautiful and pathetic story of Custance, the Prioress's Tale, similar to the legend of "litle Hew of Lincoln," the Christian child murdered by the Jews for so perseveringly singing his hymn to the Virgin; and above all the Clerk of Oxford's Tale, perhaps the most beautiful pathetic narration in the whole range of literature. Thus, the story of Griselda, the model and heroine of wisely patience and obedience, is the crown and pearl of all the serious and pathetic narratives, as the Knight's Tale is the masterpiece among the descriptions of love and chivalric magnificence.

I will rapidly note the sources from which, as far as can be ascertained at present, Chaucer derived the subjects of the narratives above particularized. The Knight's Tale is freely borrowed from the Theseida of Boccaccio, many of the incidents of the latter being themselves taken from the Thebais of Statius. Though the action and personages of this noble story are assigned to classical antiquity, it is needless to say that the sentiments, manners, and feelings of the persons introduced are those of chivalric Europe, the "Two Noble Kinsmen," Palamon and Arcite, being the purest ideal types of the knightly character, and the decision of their claims to the hand of Emilie by a combat in champ clos, an incident completely alien from the habits of the heroic age. The Squire's Tale bears evident marks of Oriental origin, but whether it be a legend directly derived from Eastern literature, or received by Chaucer after having filtered through a Romance version, is now uncertain. It is equal to the preceding story in splendour and variety of incident and word-painting, but far inferior in depth of pathos and ideal elevation of sentiment, yet it was by the Squire's Tale that Milton characterized Chaucer in that inimitable passage of the Penseroso where he evokes the recollections of the great poet — "And call up him that left half-told — "The story of Cambuscan bold,

 Of Cambal, and of Algarsife,
 And who had Canace to wife
 That owned the virtuous ring and glass,
 And of the wondrous horse of brass
 On which the Tartar king did ride."

The Man of Law's Tale is taken with little variation from Gower's voluminous poem "Confessio Amantis," the incidents of Gower's narrative being in their turn traceable to a multitude of romances, as for instance those of Emare, the Chevalier au Cygne, the Roman de la Violette, Le Bone Florence de Rome, and the inexhaustible Gesta Romanorum. The character of the noble but unhappy Constance, beautiful as it is, is idealized almost beyond nature, and the employment of the Italian stanza harmonizes well with the tender but somewhat enervated graces of the narrative. The legend of the "litle clergion," foully murdered by the Jews of Asia, and whose martyrdom is so miraculously attested, was in all probability founded on fact, at least so far as regards cruel punishment having been inflicted on the Jews accused of such a crime. An infinity of ballads were current in England and Scotland on this subject, and one indeed has been preserved in Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, entitled "The Jewes Daughter." Moreover there still exists a record of the trial of some Jews for the assassination of a Christian child at Lincoln in 1256, in the reign of Henry III. Though Chaucer has retained the principal incidents of the English legend, he has laid the scene in Asia, but many allusions to the story of Hugh of Lincoln prove that the fundamental action is identically the same. The tale is exquisitely tender and graceful in sentiment, and exhibits precisely that union of religious sentimentality and refinement which makes it so appropriate in the mouth of Madame Eglantine the Prioress.

The pedigree of the most pathetic of Chaucer's stories, that of Patient Griselda, narrated by the clerk of Oxford, is traceable to Petrarch's Latin translation of the last tale in Boccaccio's Decameron, and which Petrarch sent to Boccaccio in 1373, the year before his own death. There is evidence that the pathos of this beautiful story was found to transgress the limits of ordinary endurance. The submission of Griselda to the ordeals imposed upon her conjugal and maternal feelings by the diabolical tyranny of the Marquis of Saluzzo, her husband, seems exaggerated beyond all the bounds of reality. Yet we should remember that the very intensity of Griselda's sufferings is intended to convey the highest expression of the inexhaustible goodness of the female heart.

The finest of Chaucer's comic and humorous stories are those of the Miller, the Reeve, the Sompnour, the Canon's Yeoman, and the Nun's Priest. Though all of these are excellent, the three best are the Miller's, the Reeve's, and the Sompnour's, and among these last it is difficult to give the palm of drollery, acute painting of human nature, and exquisite ingenuity of incident. It is much to be regretted that the comic stories turn upon events of a kind which the refinement of modern manners renders it impossible to analyze, but it should be remembered that society in Chaucer's day, though perhaps not less moral in reality, was far more outspoken and simple.

and permitted and enjoyed allusions which have been proscribed by the more precise delicacy of later ages. The first of these irresistible drolleries is probably the adaptation to English life—for the scene is laid at Oxford—of some old fabliau, the Reeve's Tale may be found in substance in the 6th novel of the Ninth Day of the Decameron—the Sompnour's Tale, though probably from a mediæval source, has not hitherto been traced. The admirable wit, humour, and learning, with which in the Canon's Yeoman's Tale Chaucer exposes the rascalities of the pretenders to alchemical knowledge, may have been derived from his own experience of the arts of these swindlers. The tale may be compared with Ben Jonson's comedy of the Alchemist. The tale assigned to the Nun's Priest is an exceedingly humorous apologue of the Cock and the Fox, in which, though the dramatis personæ are animals, they are endowed with such a droll similitude to the human character, that the reader enjoys at the same time the apparently incompatible pleasures of sympathizing with them as human beings, and laughing at their fantastic assumption of reason as lower creatures.

I have remarked, some pages back, on the circumstance of two of the stories being written in prose. It may be not uninteresting to investigate this exception. When Chaucer is applied to by the Host, he commences a rambling puerile romance of chivalry, entitled the Rhyme of Sir Thopas, which promises to be an interminable story of knight-errant adventures, combats with giants, dragons, and enchanters, and is written in the exact style and metre of the Trouvère narrative poems—the only instance of this versification being employed in the Canterbury Tales. He goes on gallantly “in the style his books of chivalry had taught him,” and, like Don Quixote, “imitating, as near as he could, their very phrase,” but he is suddenly interrupted, with many expressions of comic disgust, by the merry host

“ ‘No mor of this, for Goddes dignite !’
 Quod our Hoste, ‘for thou makest me
 So very of thy verray lewednesse,
 That, al so wisly God my soule blesse,
 Myn eeres aken for thy drafty speche.
 Now such a rym the devel I byteche !
 This may wel be rym dogrel,’ quod he.”

There can be no doubt that the poet took this ingenious method of ridiculing and caricaturing the Romance poetry, which had at this time reached the lowest point of effeteness and commonplace. Chaucer then, who wanted to work in an essay on prudence that he had translated from the French, offers to tell “a litel thinge in prose,” and commences the long allegorical tale of Melibæus and his wife Prudence, in which, though the matter is often tiresome enough, he shows himself as great a master of prose as of poetry. Indeed it would be difficult to find, anterior to Hooker, any English prose so vigorous, so harmonious, and so free from pedantry and affectation as that of the great Father of our Literature

“The morning-star of song, who made
His music heard below,
Dan Chaucer, the first warbler, whose sweet breath
Preluded those melodious bursts, that fill
The spacious times of great Elizabeth
With sounds that echo still.”

The other prose tale is narrated by the Parson, who, being represented as a somewhat simple and narrow-minded though pious and large-hearted pastor, characteristically refuses to indulge the company with what can only minister to vain pleasure, and proposes something that may tend to edification, “moralité and vertuous matiere,” and commences a long and very curious sermon on the Seven Deadly Sins, their causes and remedies—a most interesting specimen of the theological literature of the day. It is divided and subdivided with all the painful minuteness of scholastic divinity, but it breathes throughout a noble spirit of evangelical piety, and in many passages attains great dignity of expression.

Besides these two Canterbury Tales, Chaucer wrote in prose a translation of Boethius’ De Consolatione, and an incomplete astronomical work On the Astrolabe, addressed to his son Lewis, in 1391. Another prose work, The Testament of Love, has been erroneously ascribed to him.

The general plan of the Canterbury Tales, a number of detached stories connected together by their being narrated by a troop of imaginary pilgrims, is similar to the method so frequently employed in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and of which we find examples in the Decameron of Boccaccio, the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles and a multitude of similar collections of stories. The idea may have come originally from the East, the very artificial plan of the Thousand and One Nights being not altogether dissimilar, in which the stories of the inexhaustible princess Shahrazad are inserted one within the other, like a set of Chinese boxes. Chaucer’s plan however, must be allowed to be infinitely superior to that of Boccaccio, whose ten accomplished young gentlemen and ladies assemble in their luxurious villa to escape from the terrible plague, the magnificent description of which forms the Introduction, and which was then, in sad reality, devastating Florence. Boccaccio’s interlocutors being all nearly of the same age and social condition, for they are little else but repetitions of the graceful types of Dioneo and Fiammetta, it was impossible to make their tales correspond to their characters as Chaucer’s do, independently of the shock to the reader’s sense of propriety in finding these elegant voluptuaries willing away, with stories generally of very doubtful morality, the hours of seclusion in which they find a cowardly and selfish asylum during a most frightful national calamity.

§ 10 Chaucer rendered to the language of his country a service in some respects analogous to that which Dante rendered to that of Italy. He harmonized, regulated, and made popular the still discordant elements of the national speech. The difficulty of reading and understanding him has been much exaggerated. The principal rule that the student should keep in mind is that the French words, so abundant in his writings, had not yet been so modified, by changes in their orthography and pronunciation, as to become anglicized, and are therefore to be read with their French accent, and secondly, that the final e which terminates so many English words was not yet become an e mute, and is to be pronounced as a separate syllable, as love, hope, lové, hopé, and finally, the past termination of the verb ed is almost invariably to be made a separate syllable. The grammar belongs to a transition stage between the highly-inflected Anglo-Saxon grammar and that of modern English, which is almost devoid of inflections, it retains the two forms of adjective, definite and indefinite, the en termination of the infinitive of the verb and the prefix t or y of the past participle (yfalle, irrone, German gefallen, geronnen), together with other details of the earlier grammatical system

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

A.—THE PREDECESSORS OF GOWER, AND CHAUCER.

By the middle of the fourteenth century the spirit of patriotism evoked by Edward III., and the influence of the continental Renaissance, were united to call forth a vigorous national literature. Its chief product, as in most similar cases, was poetry, but the earliest works in prose that can be properly called English belong to the same age. In A.D. 1356, Mandeville dedicated his Travels to Edward III. In 1362 Parliament was first opened by a speech in English, Chaucer had begun to write, and Gower had exchanged the French and Latin of his earlier works for his mother tongue. That meeting of different influences, referred to in the text, may be illustrated by the fact that the last great hero of chivalry, the Black Prince, and Occam (see p. 22, b), the last and greatest of the English schoolmen, lived in the same century with Chaucer, the father of English poetry, and Wicliffe, the herald of the Reformation. The new literature may be distinguished from that of the two preceding centuries of transition (though it is difficult to draw the precise line of demarcation) by its substance as well as its form. While the language has become so like modern English that it can be read with tolerable ease, by pronouncing syllables which are now mute allowing for the retention of some inflexional forms, especially in the pronouns and verbs, and taking the trouble to learn the meaning of a few words now obsolete, the subjects are no longer borrowed entirely from the monkish chroniclers or the Norman minstrels, and those so borrowed are treated with the independence of native genius. These characteristics are first fully seen in Chaucer, and in a less degree in Gower in proportion to his far less commanding genius, but these two had several precursors in England, while a vigorous native literature grew up in the Anglo-Saxon parts of Scotland. ADAM DAVIE and RICHARD ROLLE (d. 1349), or Richard of Hampole, near Doncaster, writers of metrical paraphrases of Scripture, and other religious pieces, belong properly to the Old English period, the former being the only English poet named in the reign of Edward II. Richard Rolle also wrote, in the Northumbrian dialect, a poem called the Pricks of Conscience, in seven books, and nearly 10 000 lines. It was published by Dr Morris, 1863. The first poet of any merit known to us by name is JACQUES DE MINOT (about A.D. 1352). His poems were discovered by Tyrwhitt, in 1775 and printed by Ritson in 1796 (reprinted in 1825) with an introduction on the reign and wars of Edward III. They celebrate ten victories of that king in his wars with France and Scotland, except that the first gives an account of the battle of Bannockburn (A.D. 1314), as an introduction to that of Halidon Hill (A.D. 1333) and others by which it was avenged. The last the taking of Guisnes (A.D. 1362) gives an approximate date for the author, who may however of course have written the other poems nearer the events. Equal in spirit to the best of our heroic ballads they have more sustained power and more finished composition. Their language is a border dialect, near akin to the Scotch. It is quite intelligible, when a few obsolete words and constructions are mastered. Among their varied measures we meet with the animated double triplet, familiar in the poems of Scott. In Minot's poems rhyme is regularly employed, while the frequent alliterations not only remind us of the principle of Anglo-Saxon composition, but prove how much the popular ear still required that artifice.

There is another famous poem of the same age, constructed by a mixture of alliteration and rhythmical accent, with out rhyme, the alliteration being stricter than that of the Anglo-Saxons themselves. This is the Vision of Piers Ploughman, or rather the Vision of William concerning Piers (or Peter) Ploughman, an allegory of the difficulties in the course of human life kindred in conception to Bunyan's great work and in its day scarcely less popular. Its prevalent spirit is that of satire aimed against abuses and vices in general but in particular against the corruptions of the church, from a moral (though not doctrinally) point of view closely resembling that of the later Puritans with whom it was a great favourite. Its second cant consists of one of 2000 lines (17 couplets) in seven or eight sections with that of Doctel Doctel and Doctel each couplet has two principal accents, with a considerable number as to the number of syllables. The alliteration falls on the accented syllables in each couplet, and is the same of the first line and on the first in the second line (and sometimes on the second). As these peculiarities can only be understood by an example, we give the opening of the poem, which also shows where the scene of the vision is laid, among the Malvern Hills (the passage is quoted with the modernized spelling and explanations of Professor Craik) —

"In a summer season,
When soft was the sun
I shoop me into shrouds"
As I a shoop I were;
In habit as a hermit
Unkely of werkes,
Went I lode in this world
Wonders to hear
As I on a May mornynge
On Malvern hilla,
Me boyl a ferly fl
Of fairy me thought."

This opening marks probably the early residence of the poet. The third couplet, with other internal evidence, points to his having been a priest. The date of the first cast of this poem is fixed by his allusions to the treaty of Brétigny, in 1360, and to the great tempest of January 15th, 1362, of which he speaks as of a recent event. Tradition ascribes the work to a certain ROBERT LANGLANDE, but the writer says he was called "Longe Wille." He often alludes to his great poverty, and he lived in London and in Bristol. His acquaintance with ecclesiastical literature agrees with the supposition that he was a church man, and he was evidently familiar with the Latin poems ascribed to Walter de Maup. The great interest of his work is its unquestionable reflection of the popular sentiment of the age. Langlande is as intensely national as Chaucer, but, while the latter freely avails himself of the forms introduced by the Anglo-Norman literature, the former makes a last attempt to revive those of the Anglo-Saxon. This effort combined with his rich humour and unsparing satire, gained him unbounded popularity with the common people. The author recast his poem twice so that we have three versions of it. The first and shortest, or A text, is of the date of 1362, the second or B text, the best of the three and more than double the length of A may be dated 1377 the third or C text, about 1380. The author's other work, Richard the Redeless, against Rich. II. is unfinished. Prof Skene has edited all A for the Early English Text Society, and part of B for the Clarendon Press. — Langlande had numerous imitators. The Credde of Piers Ploughman a work of the same school, and often

"Put myself into clothe,
Probably a vagabond friar Wonder

1 Shepherd.
6 And ascribed to the same author, is supposed to have been written about twenty or thirty years later than the Fiscon. It is more serious in its tone, and more in harmony with the religious views of Wicliffe. The Complaint of Piers Ploughman is found in a volume of political and satirical songs in the Rolls Series. These political poems concur with Gower's Vox Clamantis to give us a vivid impression of the evils which provoked the Lancastrian revolution.

English Prose Literature was formerly said to begin with SIR JOHN DE MANDEVILLE, who is said to have been born at St Alban's about A.D. 1300, and to have left England for the East in 1322. But 'the latest authority on the subject, Mr. E. B. Nicholson, states that a comparison of all the best MSS. decides that the English version of Mandeville's Travels, was unquestionably the work of a translator. He gives reasons for doubting whether Mandeville was a real person at all, and for believing that the book was originally written in French under a feigned name by the physician called Jehan de Bornogolne, who is said, in an early edition of it, to have met Mandeville first at Cairo and again at Liege. The book professes to be a record of Mandeville's travels in Palestine, Egypt, Persia, India, Tartary, and China. But Colonel Yule has shown that, excepting perhaps as regards Egypt and the Levant generally, the travels were a mere adaptation of previous works, and that the author had never visited the distant countries which he describes. The work, in its English dress, is now chiefly interesting as probably the earliest example, on a large scale, of English prose. The English of Mandeville's translator is straightforward and unadorned, and probably a fair example of the spoken language of the day. As compared with Robert of Gloucester, it shows a great increase of French words. No work of the age was more popular. It exists in a large number of MSS. The earliest printed edition, in English, is that of Wynkyn de Worde, Westminster, 1499, 8vo., but an Italian translation, by Pietro de Cornaro, had been previously printed at Milan, 1480, 4to. The standard English edition is that printed at London, 1724, 8vo., and reprinted, with an Introduction, Notes, and Glossary, by Mr. Halliwell, Lond. 1839, 8vo.

The translation of the Latin Polychronicon of Ralph Higden (see p. 23), by JOHN DE TREVISA, vicar of Berkeley, completed in the year 1385, is chiefly interesting as having been printed by Caxton, 1482, with an additional book bringing down the narrative from 1357 to 1460. It has also been lately printed in the Rolls Series. It is a curious proof of the change which a single century made in the language, that Caxton thought it necessary "somewhat to change the rude and old English, that is to wit, certain words which in these days be neither used nor understood." Several other translations, made by Trevisa from the Latin exist only in MS.

The great Scottish Poet of this age, JOHN BARBOUR, archdeacon of Aberdeen (b. about A.D. 1316, d. A.D. 1396), was rather a contemporary than a precursor of Chaucer, like whom he deserves to rank as the father of a national literature. His Brue, in 13,000 rhymed octosyllable lines, is a chronicle of the adventures of King Robert I., of very high merit. The lowland Scottish dialect was formed under exactly the same influences as the English, from which it differed rather less than in the present day. Barbour also paid several visits to England, and studied at Oxford in his mature age. He wrote a Troy Book, of which we have parts in MS., and a long collection of Lives of Saints, in a Cambridge MS. now printing in Germany. Before this time there are hardly any names in Scottish literature, except the schoolman, MICHAEL SCOT, who resided abroad, and was scarcely known at home, except by his fabulous reputation as a wizard, THOMAS LERMOYR, the Rhymer, of Erildonne, erroneously called the author of the romance of Sir Tristram, and the Latin chronicler, JOHN OF FORDUN, a canon of Aberdeen, whose Scotti-chronicon contains the legendary and historical annals of his country to the death of David I. The later and less celebrated contemporary of Barbour, ANDREW WINTOUN (b. about A.D. 1350, d. after 1420), prior of Lochleven, wrote a metrical chronicle, in nine books, of Scottish and general history. BLIND HARRY, the Minstrel, belongs to the following century.

B—JOHN GOWER

The transition made in our language and literature about the middle of the fourteenth century cannot be better illustrated than by the writings of John Gower, the contemporary and friend of Chaucer, and the author of three great poetical works: the first in French, the second in Latin, and the third in English. Gower is assumed to have been somewhat older than Chaucer, as the old writers generally name him first, he survived him by eight years, Chaucer having died in A.D. 1400, and Gower in A.D. 1408. But the precedence must be awarded to Chaucer not only for the vast superiority of his genius, but as the earlier writer in English. It may be questioned whether Gower would have written in English at all, except in conformity to the taste created by Chaucer. Their early friendship is evinced by Chaucer's dedication of Troilus and Creseide to Gower by a title which became a fixed epithet of the latter poet —

"O MORAL GOWER! this booke I direct
To thee, and to the philosophical Strode,
To vouchsafe there need is to correct
Of your benignities and scales good."

And the continuance of their friendship (in spite of conjectures founded on insufficient evidence) is attested by the compliment paid to Chaucer in Gower's Confessio Amantis (finished in 1393), where Venus greets Chaucer

"As my disciple and my poete," and after speaking of "the ditties and songes glad," composed "in the floures of his youth" for her sake, and of which

"The land fulfilled is ever all," exhorts him to employ his old age in writing his "Testament of Love."

Two of the Canterbury Tales those of the Man of Law and the Wife of Bath, were no doubt derived by both Gower and his great contemporary from a common source.

Caxton made Gower a native of Gower land in South Wales and Leland claimed him as a member of the family of Gower of Sittenham in Yorkshire from which are sprung the noble houses of Sutherland and Ffiesmere. But Sir Harris Nicolas and others have proved from existing deeds and from the comparison of seals with the arms on Gower's tomb, that the poet was an esquire of Kent and probably of the same family as Sir Robert Gower of Winton (Winton) and Kentwell in Suffolk, who died in or before A.D. 1340 and whose daughter and coheirress Joan conveyed the manor of Kentwell to John Gower (the poet) on June 23rd, 1363. From this and similar evidence it appears that Gower was sprung from a family of knightly rank, and that he possessed estates in Kent, in Suffolk and probably in Essex, though he lived much in London, and apparently in close connection with the court. There is no ground for the common statement that he followed the legal profession. About the year 1400 he speaks of himself as both old and blind. His will still exists, made on the 15th of August, 1408 and proved by his widow, Agnes, on the 24th of October following, so that he must have died between those two dates. There can be little doubt that his wife was the same as the Agnes Groundsall whose marriage to John Gower at St. Mary Magdalen's, Southwark, on the 28th of January, 1397, is recorded in the register of William of Wykeham, preserved at Winchester. If so, the poet married in his old age. His will leaves it doubtful whether he had issue. He lies buried, according to his own directions, in St. Mary Overy's (now St. Saviour's), Southwark, of which church he is said to have been a benefactor beneath a splendid canopyed tomb, bearing his arms and effigy the head resting on his three volumes, the wall within the three arches being painted with figures of Charity, Mercy and Pity. The story of his having been a fellow student with Chaucer, either at Oxford or Cambridge, is as unfounded as most of Leland's other statements about him, but his works furnish proof of his having received the best education his age could bestow and of his command of the languages then in use.

Gower's three great works were the Speculum Meditantis in French, the Vox Clamantis, in Latin, and the Confessio Amantis in English.

(1) The Speculum Meditantis is now entirely lost, the short French poem which Warton describes under the title being an entirely different work. It was a collection of precepts on chastity, enforced by examples. But there are still extant Fifty French Ballads by Gower in a MS. belonging to the Duke of Sutherland and edited by the late duke for the Roxburghe Club, in 1818. "They are," says Pauli (Introduct. Essay p. xxvi), "tender in sentiment, and not unrefined with regard to language and form, especially if we consider that they are the work of a foreigner. They treat of Love in the manner introduced by the Provençal poets, which was afterwards generally adopted by those in the north of France. A few specimens cannot fail to give a favourable idea of Gower's skill and expression." These were about the last works of any importance written in the Anglo-Norman French, which was now so fully regarded as a foreign language that Gower apologizes for his French, saying, "I am English," while he gives as a reason for using the language, that he was addressing his ballads.

"Al Universitè de tout le monde."

Some verses addressed to Henry IV., after his accession, prove that Gower continued to write in French to the end of his life.

(2.) Of Gower's great Latin poem, the Vox Clamantis, Dr Pauli gives the following account —

Soon after the rebellion of the commons in 1381 [under Richard II.], an event which made a great impression on his mind, he wrote that singular work in Latin distichs called Vox Clamantis, of which we possess an excellent edition by the Rev H O Coxe, printed for the Roxburghe Club, in 1850. The name, with an allusion to St. John the Baptist, seems to have been adopted from the general clamour and cry then abroad in the country. The greater bulk of the work, the date of which its editor is inclined to fix between 1383 and 1384, is rather a moral than an historical essay, but the first book describes the insurrection of Wat Tyler in an allegorical disguise, the poet having a dream, on the 11th of June, 1381, in which men assume the shape of animals. The second book contains a long sermon on fatalism, in which the poet shows himself no friend to Wicliffe's tenets, but a zealous advocate for the reformation of the clergy. The third book points out how all orders of society must suffer for their own vices and demerits, in illustration of which he cites the example of the secular clergy. The fourth book is dedicated to the cloistered clergy and the nuns, the fifth to the military, the sixth contains a violent attack on the lawyers, and the seventh subjoins the moral of the whole represented in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, as interpreted by Daniel." (Introd. Essay, p. xxix.) There are also some smaller Latin poems, in Leonine hexameters, among them one addressed to Henry IV., in which the poet laments his blindness.

(3.) Gower's latest poem, the Confessio Amantis, was written in English, with a running marginal commentary in Latin, something like that to the Ancient Mariner of Coleridge. Its composition seems to be due to the success of Chaucer. We again quote from Dr Pauli — "The exact date of the poem has not been ascertained but there is internal evidence, in certain copies, that it existed in the year 1392-3. As this point involves a question of grave importance with respect to the author's behaviour and position in the political events of the day, it will be necessary to enter more fully into the subject. He unquestionably issued two editions of the work, which, however, as will be distinctly seen in the present edition, vary from each other only at the commencement and at the end, the one being dedicated to King Richard II., the other to his cousin, Henry of Lancaster, earl of Derby. In the king's copy the poet describes at length how he came rowing down the Thames at London one day, and how he met King Richard who, having invited him to step into the royal barge, commanded him to write a book upon some new matter. In that addressed to Henry he says, that the book was finished, the year sixteenth of King Richard (A.D. 1392-3) an important fact which has been hitherto overlooked by all writers on the subject, including even Sir H. Nicolas (Life of Chaucer, p. 39) who states that Gower did not dedicate his work to Henry until he had ascended the throne." Having shown that the dedication was made when Henry was not yet king, or even Duke of Lancaster, but Earl of Derby—a title which he bore in 1392-3 — Pauli proceeds — "The one version abounds in expressions of the deepest loyalty towards his sovereign, for whose sake he intends to write some new thing in English, the other mentions the year of the reign of King Richard II., is full of attachment to Henry of Lancaster, and purports to appear in English for England's sake." The inference from all this is that Gower, seeing the fatal tendency of Richard's course, early attached himself to Henry of Lancaster, from whom there is still extant a record of his receiving a collar in 1394 (probably in acknowledgment of the dedication of his poem), and whom he more than once addresses with affection and respect in his minor pieces. Hence the commencement of the Confessio Amantis would fall before 1396, when Richard came of age and began his arbitrary government. Hence also the omission of the compliment to Chaucer at the end of the poem, in the edition inscribed to Henry, may be explained by motives of policy without inferring any personal alienation.

"with whom my heart is of accord."

The Prologue is in the same strain of dissatisfaction with the existing order of things, which pervades the Vox Clamantis; and the poet comforts himself with the same resource, the divine government of the world, as revealed in the vision of Nebuchadnezzar. Yet how little he shares the opinions of Wicliffe is proved by his reference to

"This new secte of Iollardie."

Pauli gives the following outline of the work—"The poem opens by introducing the author himself, in the character of an unhappy lover in despair smitten by Cupid's arrow. Venus appears to him, and, after having heard his prayer, appoints her priest called Genius, like the mystagogue in the Picture of Cebes, to hear the lover's confession. This is the frame of the whole work, which is a singular mixture of classical notions principally borrowed from Ovid's Ars Amandi, and of the purely mediæval idea, that as a good Catholic the unfortunate lover must state his distress to a father confessor. This is done in the course of the confession, with great regularity and even pedantry—all the passions of the human heart, which generally stand in the way of love, being systematically arranged in the various books and subdivisions of the work. After Genius has fully explained the evil affection, passion or vice under consideration, the lover confesses on that particular point, and frequently urges his boundless love for an unknown beauty, who treats him cruelly, in a tone of affectation which would appear highly ridiculous in a man of more than sixty years of age, were it not a common characteristic of the poetry of the period. After this profession, the confessor opposes him, and exemplifies the fatal effects of each passion by a variety of apposite stories, gathered from many sources. At length, after a frequent and tedious recurrence of the same process, the confession is terminated by some final injunctions of the priest—the lover's petition in a strophic poem addressed to Venus—the bitter judgment of the goddess, that he should remember his old age and leave off such fooleries,

"For loves lust and lockes here
In chambre accorded neuer more"— his cure from the wound caused by the dart of love, and his absolution, received as if by a pious Roman Catholic.

"The materials for this extensive work [more than 30 000 lines], and the stories inserted as examples for and against the lover's passion, are drawn from various sources. Some have been taken from the Bible, a great number from Ovid's Metamorphoses which must have been a particular favourite with the author, others from the mediæval histories of the siege of Troy, of the feats of Alexander the Great—from the oldest collection of novels, known under the name of the Gesta Romanorum, chiefly in its form as used in England—from the Pantheon and Speculum Regum of Godfrey of Villerbo from the romance of Sir Lancelot and the Chronicles of Cassiodorus and Isidorus" (Introductory Essay, pp. xxxiii. xxxiv.) There is also a vast amount of alchemical learning from the Almagest and an exposition of the pseudo-Aristotelian philosophy of the middle ages. The author's fancy lies almost buried under the mass of his learning and his laborious composition shows none of Chaucer's humour, or passion, or love of nature. In the language of the new school of poetry, to which Chaucer's genius had given birth, Gower embodies most of the faults of the romance writers. Still he has his merits. "The vivacity and variety of his short verses evince a correct ear and a happy power, by the assistance of which he enhances the interest in a tale, and frequently terminates it with satisfaction to the reader" (W. W. Lloyd in Singer's Shakespeare, vol. iv. p. 261.) The Saxon element is as conspicuous in his language as in Chaucer's, but he uses a larger number of French words, as might have been expected from his early habits of composition. The frequent want of skill in the construction of his sentences shows that it was no easy task for him to write so long a work in English. There are some forms peculiar to him as I sigh for I rare and nought for not. He seldom uses alliteration. We have a long chain of testimony to Gower's popularity from his own age to that of Shakespeare, who speaks of him thus—

"To sing a song that old was sung
From ashes ancient Gower is come
Assending man a instruction,
To glad our ear and please our eyes."
(Introduction)

The Confessio Amantis was first printed by Caxton Lond. 1483 fol (the British Museum has two copies of this rare work) and by T. Berthelette Lond. 1532, fol reprinted 1554 fol (both in black letter). None of the modern editions deserve mention in comparison of that by Dr Reinhold Pauli, Lond. 1857 3 vols., 8vo., whose Introductory Essay contains all that is known as the poet and his works.

C.—WICLIFFE AND HIS SCHOOL

The revolution effected by Chaucer in poetry was accompanied and aided by an entirely new development of religious literature, which, besides its higher fruits, rendered a similar service to our prose literature. The new liberty of thought, which found expression in popular literature, showed itself also in a sifting of ecclesiastical pretensions, which led to a direct appeal to Scripture, and the reforming teachers satisfied this demand by translating the Bible into the mother tongue. In the other Protestant countries of Europe, the revival of national literature has been connected with a similar work, and, if the German Bible of Luther and the Danish version of 1550, exerted a more powerful influence over the respective languages than the Wicliffite translations, one chief reason is that they appeared after the invention of printing, by which art they were immediately and indefinitely multiplied. In England, this great work is ascribed to JOHN DE WICLIF, WICLIFFE, or WICLIFFE (b. about A.D. 1324, d. A.D. 1384). He was born at Wicliffe, near Richmond, in Yorkshire, studied at Oxford, became the priest of Fylingham, in Lincoln, and successively Master and Warden of Balliol College and Canterbury Hall, Oxford. He began early to attack the corruptions of the Church, and after his deposition from the latter post by Archbishop Langham, and the Pope's rejection of his appeal, he gave all his energies to the work of reform, both by his writings and by theological lectures at Oxford. For a long time he was not only unmolested, but was regarded as a champion of the Anglican Church. In 1374 he was a member of a commission sent to Avignon, which obtained concessions from the Pope on the question of induction into benefices. He was rewarded by the crown with a prebend at Worcester, and the vicarage of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire, which he held till his death, being secured from the storm of persecution, which soon arose, by the protection of the king's son, John of Gaunt. It was in the retirement of Lutterworth after he had been driven from his chair at Oxford,* that Wicliffe, aided by his friends and disciples, undertook the work of Bible translation. Their version was the basis of that of Tyndale, as the latter was of the Authorized Versions of 1535 (Cover-dale's) and 1611 (King James's, which is still in use), but three centuries and a half elapsed before the original translation of the New Testament, and nearly five centuries before the whole, appeared in print. The New Testament was edited by the Rev John Lewis, 1731, fol., by the Rev H. H. Baker, 1810, 4to, and in Bagster's English Hexapla, 1841 and 1846, 4to. The Old Testament has only lately been published, in the splendid edition of the Rev J. Forshall and Sir Frederick Madden, Oxf. 1850, 4 vols. 4to. The authorship of the several parts has long been the subject of discussion. According to the latest editors, the Old Testament and Apocrypha, from Genesis to Ezechiel (in the order of the LXX), was translated by a priest named HENEROND, and the rest of the Old Testament and Apocrypha, as well as the whole of the New Testament, by Wicliffe. The whole work was revised, in a second edition, by PURVEY, who has left us a very interesting essay on the principles of translation. The first version seems to have been completed about A.D. 1380, and the edition of Purvey before 1390, so that this English Bible was generally circulated, so far as the jealousy of the church would permit, by the end of the fourteenth century. Its excellence is to be ascribed to two chief causes, the religious sensibility of the translators, whose spirit was absorbed in their work, and the simple vocabulary and structure of the language, which presented itself newly formed to their hand. Translated as it was from the Vulgate, it naturalized, chiefly in a Latin form, a large stock of religious terms, almost confined before to theologians and at the same time enlarged and modified them. Above all, by preserving the uniformity of diction and grammar, suited to the sacred dignity of the work, and which is not found in nearly so high a degree in Wicliffe's own treatises,† it laid the foundation of that religious or sacred dialect, which has contributed to secure dignity and earnestness as prevailing characters of our common speech. While satires of the type of Piers Ploughman gratified the popular disgust at the corruptions in high places, the newly-opened well spring of truth taught them the cure for these evils, and their eager reception of both classes of works enriched their language as well as influenced their thoughts.

* Regular professorships not being yet established, Wicliffe taught at Oxford by that right which, though now dormant, is still inherent, as their names imply in the Degrees of Doctor and Magister.

† Wicliffe's English Works have been published, part by the Clarendon Press, 3 vols. the rest by the Early English Text Society 1880. The Clarendon Press has also published cheap editions of Purvey's New Testament and part of his Old Testament.

CHAPTER III.

FROM THE DEATH OF CHAUCER TO THE AGE OF ELIZABETH
A D 1400—1558

1 Slow progress of English literature from Chaucer to the age of Elizabeth Introduction of printing by CAXTON Improvement of prose. § 2 Scottish literature in the 15th century KING JAMES I, DUNBAR, GAWIN DOUGLAS, HENRYSON, BLIND HARRY § 3 Reign of Henry VII sterile in literature HENRY VIII, SIR THOMAS MORE § 4 Religious Literature Translations of the Bible, Book of Common Prayer, LATIMER, FOXE.
§ 5 Chroniclers and Historians LORD BERNERS' Froissart, FABYAN, HALL § 6 Philosophy and Education WILSON'S Logic, SIR JOHN
CHEKE, ROGER ASCHAM'S Schoolmaster and Taxophilus § 7 Poets
SKELTON, BARCLAY and HAWES, WYATT and SURREY § 8 Ballads of the 15th and 16th centuries their sources, metre, and modes of circulation Modern collections by Percy, Scott, &c Influence on the revival of romantic literature. Ballads of the Scottish borders and of Robin Hood

§ 1 THE progress of English Literature, inaugurated in so splendid a manner by the genius of Chaucer, though uninterrupted, was for a long time comparatively slow Many social and political causes contributed to retard it for a time, or rather to accumulate the nation's energies for that glorious intellectual burst which distinguishes the Age of Elizabeth, making that period the most magnificent in the history of the English people, if not in the annals of the human race. The causes just alluded to were the intestine commotions of the Wars of the Roses, the struggle between the dying energies of Feudalism and the nascent liberties of our municipal institutions, and the mighty transformation resulting from the Reformation

In point of splendour, fecundity, intense originality and national spirit, none of the most brilliant epochs in the history of mankind can be considered as superior to the Elizabethan In universality of scope and in the influence it was destined to exert upon the thoughts and knowledge of future generations, no other epoch can be brought into comparison with it. Neither the age of Pericles nor that of Augustus in the ancient world, nor those of the Medici and of Louis XIV in modern history, can be regarded as approaching in importance to that period which, independently of a multitude of brilliant but inferior luminaries, produced the Prince of Poets and the Prince of Philosophers—William Shakspeare and Francis Bacon

But the interval between the end of the fourteenth century, and the latter part of the sixteenth, though destitute of any names comparable for creative energy to that of Chaucer, was a period of great literary activity. The importation into England of the art of printing, first exercised among us by CAXTON, who was himself a useful and laborious author, and who died in 1491, unquestionably tended to give a more regular and literary form to the productions of that age, the increase in the number of printed books seems in particular to have been peculiarly efficacious in generating a good prose-style, as well as in enlarging the circle of readers and extending the influence of popular intellectual activity, as for example by disseminating the habit of religious and political discussion. Thus Mandeville, regarded as one of the founders of prose writing in England, and who, at the period of Chaucer, gave to the world the curious description of his travels and adventures in many lands,* was followed by CHIEF JUSTICE FORTESCUE (fl. 1430-1470), who, besides his celebrated Latin work "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," also wrote one in English on "The Difference between an Absolute and Limited Monarchy" †

§ 2 But the most brilliant names which occupy the beginning of this interval are those of Scotsmen. JAMES I (1394-1437), who was taken prisoner when a child (1405) and carefully educated at Windsor, must be regarded as a poet who does equal honour to his own country and to that of his captivity. This accomplished prince was the author of a collection of love-verses under the title of the King's Quhair (i.e. Quire or Book), written in the purest English and breathing the romantic and elegant grace which the immense popularity of Petrarch had at that time made the universal pattern throughout Europe. His own national dialect, too, was that of the Lowland Scots, then and long after the language of literature, of courtly society, and of theology, and by no means to be regarded as the mere patois or provincial dialect which it has become since the union of the two crowns has destroyed the political independence of Scotland. In it James composed a number of songs and ballads of extraordinary merit, recounting with much humour his own amorous adventures, some, unfortunately, of a character rather too warm for the delicacy of modern times. This intellectual and patriotic prince was assassinated in 1437 at Perth, by the nobles, among whom his own uncle was a chief conspirator, to revenge the king's concessions to the people. Besides King James, Scotland produced about this time several poets of great merit, the chief of whom are

* For an account of Mandeville see p. 51

† Sir John Fortescue was originally a Lancastrian. He accompanied Henry VI into exile, was afterwards taken prisoner at the battle of Tewkesbury in 1471, and was attainted. He obtained his pardon by acknowledging the title of Edward IV.

WILLIAM DUNBAR (about 1465-1520), and GAWIN or GAVIN DOUGLAS, Bishop of Dunkeld (1474-1522), the former a truly powerful and original genius, and the second a voluminous and miscellaneous poet, whose example tended much to regularize and improve the national dialect, and to enrich the national literature. Among Dunbar's numerous poetical compositions we must in particular specify his wild allegorical conception of "The Dance of the Seven Deadly Sins," a fantastic and terrible impersonation, with the intense reality of Dante and the picturesque inventiveness of Callot. Gawin Douglas is now chiefly remembered as the translator of Virgil into Scottish verse, and in both this and his original compositions the reader will be struck by the much greater preponderance of French and Latin words in the dialect of Scotland than in contemporary English writings. This is partly to be attributed to the close political connexion maintained by Scotland with France, with which country she generally sided out of hostility to England, and partly, no doubt, to a kind of pedantic affectation, a sort of Scottish estilo culto, like the Gongorism of the Spaniards. ROBERT HENRYSON (d. about 1500), a monk or schoolmaster of Dunfermline, wrote, in imitation of Chaucer, the Testament of Faerie Crescide, and the beautiful pastoral of Robin and Maryne (in Percy's Reliques). Another Scottish poet, known under the appellation of BLIND HARRY or HARRY THE MINSTREL, but concerning the details of whose life nothing accurate has been discovered, wrote, in long rhymed couplets, a narrative of the exploits of the second great national hero, William Wallace. This work is not destitute of vigorous and picturesque passages. BARBOUR and the other writers of the fourteenth century have been already mentioned (p. 51).

§ 3 The reign of Henry VII, as might have been expected from the sombre character of that politic prince, was by no means favourable to literary activity, but Henry VIII was possessed of much of the learning of his age, and even distinguished himself by his controversial writings against Luther. The title of "Defender of the Faith," by which the Pope recompensed this sceptred polemic, has been ever since retained in the style of English sovereigns—a singular example of the vicissitudes of names. The great and good chancellor Sir Thomas More, the poets Skelton, Wyatt, and Surrey, belong to this memorable reign. Of the three last we shall speak among the poets. SIR THOMAS MORE (1478-1535) is unquestionably one of the most prominent intellectual figures of this reign, whether as statesman, polemic, or man of letters. The ardent attachment which More felt to the Catholic religion, and which he so often testified by acts of persecution, contrary to his gentle and genial character, he firmly maintained when himself persecuted and in the presence of a cruel and ignominious death. His philosophical romance of the Utopia, written in Latin, is a striking example of the extreme freedom of speculative and political discussion, exercised not only with impunity but even with approbation under the sternest tyranny. The fundamental idea of this work was borrowed from the Atlantis of Plato. It is one of the earliest of many attempts to give, under the form of a voyage to an imaginary island, the theory of an ideal republic, where the laws, the institutions, the social and political usages, are in strict accordance with a philosophical perfection. England has been peculiarly fertile in these sports of political fancy. Bacon also left an unfinished sketch of an imaginary republic, and the Oceana of Harrington is a similar attempt to realize the theory of a perfectly happy and philosophic government.*

§ 4. Parallel with the improvement of general literature, and indeed in no small measure connected with it, must be noted the very general diffusion of religious controversy connected with the doctrines of the Reformation, and the dissemination of English translations of the Scriptures. TYNDALE and COVERDALE, the former of whom was burned near Antwerp in 1536, and the latter made Bishop of Exeter about the middle of the same century, gave to the world the first portions, and the two together the whole, of the sacred writings in an English version, and the compilation of the English Book of Common Prayer in the reign of Edward VI combined with the diffusion of the Scriptures in the English language to furnish the people with models of the finest possible style—grave and dignified without ostentation, vigorous and intelligible without vulgarity. The Liturgy itself was little else but a translation, with some few omissions and alterations, from the Latin Mass-book of the Catholic Church, but the simple and majestic style of the version, as well as that preserved in the English translation of the Bible, has endowed the Anglican Church with the noblest religious diction possessed by any nation in the world. It was formed at the critical period in the history of our native tongue when the simplicity of the ancient speech was still fresh and living, and yet when the progress of civilization was sufficiently advanced to adorn that ancient element with the richness and expressiveness of a more polished epoch. The singular felicity of these circumstances has had an incalculable effect on the whole character of our language and literature, and has preserved to the English tongue the force and picturesqueness of the fifteenth century, while not excluding the refinements of the nineteenth. Nor is it possible that the majestic style of our older writers can ever become obsolete, while the noble and massive language of our Bible and Prayer-Book continues to exert—as it probably ever will—so immense an influence on the modes of thinking and speaking of all classes of the population. Many of our ancient preachers and controversialists too, like good old HUGH LATIMER, burned as a heretic by Mary in 1555, and the chronicler of the Protestant Martyrs, JOHN FOXE, who died in 1587, contributed, in writings which, though sometimes rude and unadorned, are always fervent, simple, and idiomatic, to disseminate among the great mass of the people not only an ardent attachment to Protestant doctrines, but a habit of religious discussion and consequently a tendency to intellectual activity.

* Of Sir Thomas More's English works the most remarkable, on account of its style, is his Life of Edward V, which Mr Hallam pronounces to be "the first example of good English language, pure and perspicuous, well-chosen, without vulgarisms or pedantry."

§ 5 Independently of purely religious discussion the period anterior to the reign of Elizabeth was not barren of literary productions of more general interest. LORD BERNERS, governor of Calais under Henry VIII, translated into the picturesque and vigorous English of that day the Chronicle of Froissart, that inexhaustible storehouse of chivalrous incident and mediæval detail. The translation is not only remarkable for fidelity and vivacity, but the archaism of Berners' language, by preserving to the modern English reader the quaintness of the original, produces precisely the same impression as the picturesque old French.

It is curious to trace the gradual transformation of historical literature. Its first and earliest type, in the ancient as well as the modern world, is invariably mythical or legendary, and the form in which it then appears is universally poetical. The legend, by a natural transition, gives way to the chronicle or regular compilation of legends, and the chronicle becomes, after many ages of civilization, the mine from whence the philosophical historian extracts the rude materials for his work. As the detached legendary or ballad episodes of Homer verge into the chronicle-history, so fresh in its infantine simplicity, of Herodotus, or the old rude Latin ballads into the chronicle-history of Livy, and as these in their turn generate the profound philosophical reflections of Thucydides or Tacitus, so in the parallel department of modern literature in England, we find the fabulous British legends combining themselves in the Monastic and Trouvère chronicles, and these again generating the prosaic but useful narratives from which the modern historian draws the materials for his pictures and reflections. In the minute and gossiping pages of such writers as old RABYAN (d 1512), who was an alderman and sheriff of London, and EDWARD HALL (d 1547), who was a judge in the Sheriff's Court of the same city, we find the transition from the poetical, ballad, or legendary form of history. Their writings, though totally devoid of philosophical system or general knowledge, and though exhibiting a complete want of critical discrimination between trifling and important events, are extremely valuable, not only as vast storehouses of facts which the modern historian has to sift and classify, but as monuments of language and examples of the popular feeling of their time. In England these chronicles wear a peculiar bourgeois air, and were indeed generally, as in the case of the former of these writers, the production of worthy but not very highly-cultivated citizens. Mixed with much childish and insignificant detail, which however is not without its value as giving us an insight into the life and opinions of the age, we find an abundant store of facts and pictures, invaluable to the modern and more scientific historian.*

§ 6 Among numerous works on philosophy and education (which now takes its place as a branch of literature) THOMAS WILSON'S Treatise of Logic and Rhetoric, published in 1553; must be regarded as a work far superior in originality of view and correctness of literary principle to anything that had at that time appeared in England or elsewhere, relative to a subject of the highest importance; and the writings of Sir JOHN CHEKE (1514-1557) not only rendered an inestimable service to philology by laying the foundation of Greek studies in the University of Cambridge, where he was professor, but tended powerfully to regulate and improve the tone of English prose. The excellent precepts given by Wilson and Cheke concerning the avoidance of pedantic and affected expressions in prose, and in particular their ridicule of the then prevailing vices of alliteration and exaggerated subtlety of antithesis, were exemplified by the grave and simple propriety of their own writings. To the same category as the preceding writers mentioned will belong ROGER ASCHAM (1515-1568), the learned and affectionate preceptor of Elizabeth and the unfortunate Jane Grey. His treatise entitled the Schoolmaster and the book called Toxophilus, devoted to the encouragement of the national use of the bow, are works remarkable for the good sense and reasonableness of the ideas, which are expressed in a plain and vigorous dignity of style that would do honour to any epoch of literature. The plans of teaching laid down in Ascham's Schoolmaster have been revived in our own day as an antidote to shallow novelties, and his advocacy of the bow has been more than carried out by the modern rifle.

* The earliest English Chronicle is John de Trevisa's translation of Higden's 'Polychronicon,' with a continuation by Caxton down to 1460, which is noticed on p. 51. Next comes the metrical chronicle of John Harding, coming down to the reign of Edward IV (See p. 68). Then follow the Chronicles of Fabyan and Hall, mentioned in the text. Fabyan's Chronicle, which he called the Concordance of Histories, begins with the fabulous stories of Brute the Trojan, and comes down to his own time. Hall's Chronicle, first printed by Grafton in 1548, under the title of The Union of the Two Noble and Illustrious Families of York and Lancaster, gives a history of England under the houses of York and Lancaster, and of the reigns of Henry VII and Henry VIII.

§ 7 But though the popular literature of England in the reign of Henry VIII naturally took, from the force of contemporary circumstances, a polemical, controversial, or philosophical tone, and writers busied themselves chiefly about those great religious questions which were then exciting universal interest, there were poets who cannot be passed over by one desirous of forming an idea of the intellectual character of that momentous period of transformation JOHN SKELTON, the date of whose birth is unknown, but who died in 1529, was undoubtedly a man of considerable classical learning He is spoken of by Erasmus, who passed some time in England, where he was received with warm hospitality by More, and even read lectures before the University of Cambridge, as "litterarum Anglicarum decus et lumen." He belonged to the ecclesiastical profession, was rector of Diss in Norfolk, and incessantly alludes in his writings to the honour of the laurel which he had received from Oxford, but whether this indicates a specific personal distinction, conferred upon him alone, or merely an academical degree, is not quite clearly established He appears also to have enjoyed the privilege of wearing the King's colours or livery, and to have been to a certain degree the object of court favour but there is reason to believe that he was not remarkable for prudence or regularity of conduct His poetical productions, which are tolerably voluminous, may be divided into two very marked and distinct categories, his serious and comic or satiric writings The former, which are either eulogistic poems addressed to patrons or allegorical disquisitions in a grave, lofty, and pretentious strain of moral declamation, will be found by the modern reader, who may be bold enough to examine them, insupportably stiff, tiresome, and pedantic, exhibiting, it is true, considerable learning, an elevated tone of ethical disquisition, and a pure and sometimes vigorous English style, when the poet can free himself from the trammels of Latinizing pedantry but they are destitute of invention and grace These poems, however, were in all probability much admired at a time when, English literature being as yet in its infancy, readers as well as writers thought more of borrowed than original conceptions, and placed learning—which was of course admired in proportion to its rarity—higher than invention. But it is in his comic and satirical writings that Skelton is truly original, he struck out a path in literature, not very high it is true, but one in which he had no predecessors and has found no equals. He engaged, with an audacity and an apparent impunity which now appear equally inexplicable, in a series of the most furious attacks upon the then all-powerful favourite and minister Wolsey and in the whole literature of libels and pasquades there is nothing bolder and more sweeping than these invectives They are written in a peculiar short doggerel measure the rhymes of which, recurring incessantly, and sometimes repeated with a rapidity that almost takes away the reader's breath, form an admirable vehicle for violent abuse, invariably couched in the most familiar language of the people. He has at once perfectly described and exemplified the character of his "breathlease rhymes" in the following passage —

" For though my ryme be ragged, Tattered and jagged,
Rudely rune-beaten,
Rusty and mooth-eaten,
If ye take wel therewith
It hath in it some pith "

All that is coarse, quaint, odd, familiar, in the speech of the commonest of the people, combined with a command of learned and pedantic imagery almost equal to the exhaustless vocabulary of Rabelais, is to be found in Skelton, and his writings deserve to be studied, were it only as an abundant source of popular English. In one strange extravaganza, entitled "The Tunning of Elnour Rummyng," he has described the attractions of the browst of a certain alewife, and the furious eagerness of the women of the neighbourhood to taste the barley-bree of Dame Rummyng, who is said to have been a real person and to have kept an alehouse at Leatherhead, in Surrey. Elnour and her establishment, and her thirsty customers, are painted with extraordinary humour, and with a vast fecundity of images, some of which are so coarse as to exceed all bounds of moderation and even of decency. Of the humour, knowledge of low life and force of imagination displayed there can be but one opinion. Another very strange pleasantry of this humorist is the Reke of the Sparrow, a sort of dirge or lamentation on the death of a tame sparrow, the favourite of a young lady who belonged to a Convent. The bird was unfortunately killed by a cat, and after devoting this cat in particular and the whole race of cats in general to eternal punishment in a sort of humorous excommunication, the poet proceeds to describe a funeral service performed, for the repose of Philip Sparrow's soul, by all the birds, in which we have a parody of the various parts of the Catholic funeral ritual. In this work, as well as in most of Skelton's writings, we find Latin and French freely intermingled with his nervous and popular English, and this singularly heightens the comic effect. Skelton's purely satiric productions are principally directed against Wolsey, and against the Scottish king and nation, over whose fatal defeat at Flodden the railing satirist exults in a manner unworthy of a generous spirit. His principal attacks upon Wolsey are to be found in the poems entitled the Booke of Colin Clout, Why Come Ye not to Court, and the Bouge of Court.

Two poets, who flourished nearly at the same time, Stephen Hawes and Alexander Barclay, deserve mention for the influence they exerted on the intellectual character of their age, though their writings have fallen into neglect. STEPHEN HAWES (fl 1509), the elder of the two, whom Warton describes as the "only writer deserving the name of a poet in the reign of Henry VII," was a favourite of that monarch, and the author of the Pastime of Pleasure, a long and in many passages a striking allegorical poem in the versification of old Lydgate. ALEXANDER BARCLAY, who lived a little later under Henry VIII and died at an advanced age, at Croydon, in Surrey, in 1552, translated into English verse Sebastian Brandt's once-celebrated satire of the Ship of Fools, an epitome of the various forms of pedantry and affectation*. In the writings of both we see the rapid development of flexibility and harmony of English versification, the approach to that consummate perfection which was at no long period to be attained by Spenser and Shakspeare, under the influence, particularly in the former case, of the enlightened imitation of Italian metrical melody. How rapid this progress in taste and refinement really was, may be deduced from an examination of the poems of SIR THOMAS WYATT (the elder) and the EARL OF SURREY, who were nearly contemporaries in their lives and early deaths. The former was born in 1503 and died in 1542, the second, one of the most illustrious members of the splendid house of Howard, was born in 1517 and beheaded, under a false and absurd charge of high treason, by Henry VIII in 1547. Both these nobles were men of rare virtues and accomplishments, Wyatt the type of the wit and statesman, and Surrey of the gallant cavalier, and both enjoyed a high popularity as poets. In their works we plainly trace the Italian spirit, and the style of their poems, though not free from that amorous and metaphysical casuistry which the example of Petrarch long rendered so universal throughout Europe, is singularly free from harshness of expression and that uncouthness of form which is perceptible in the earlier attempts of English poetry.

Surrey may justly be regarded as the first English classical poet. He was the first who introduced blank verse into our English poetry, which he employed in translating the second and fourth books of Virgil's Æneid. "Surrey," says Mr Hallam, "did much for his own country and his native language. His versification differs very considerably from that of his predecessors. He introduced a sort of involution into his style, which gave an air of dignity and remoteness from common life. It was, in fact, borrowed from the licence of Italian poetry, which our own idiom has rejected. He avoids pedantic words, forcibly obtruded from the Latin, of which our earlier poets, both English and Scots, had been ridiculously fond. The absurd epithets of Hoccleve, Lydgate, Dunbar, and Douglas are applied equally to the most different things, so as to show that they annexed no meaning to them. Surrey rarely lays an unnatural stress on final syllables, merely as such, which they would not receive in ordinary pronunciation, another usual trick of the school of Chaucer. His words are well chosen and well arranged." Wyatt is inferior to Surrey in harmony of numbers and elegance of sentiment. Their "Songs and Sonnettes" were first collected and printed at London by Tottel, in 1557, in his Miscellany, which was the first printed poetical miscellany in the English language.

* Brandt was a learned civilian of Basel, and published in 1494 a satire in German with the above title.

§ 8 I cannot better conclude this transitional or intercalary Chapter than by making a few remarks on a peculiar class of compositions in which England is unusually rich, which are marked with an intense impress of nationality, and which have exerted, on modern literature in particular, an influence whose extent it is impossible to overrate. These are our national Ballads, produced, it is probable, in great abundance during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and in many instances traceable to the "North Countree," or the Border region between England and Scotland. This country, as the scene of incessant forays from both sides of the frontier during the uninterrupted warfare between the two countries, was naturally the theatre of a multitude of wild and romantic episodes, consigned to memory in the rude strains of indigenous minstrels. No country indeed (excepting Spain, in the admirable romances which commemorate the long struggle between the Christians and the Moors, and the collection containing the cycle of the Cid) possesses anything similar in kind or comparable in merit to the old ballads of England. They bear the marks of having been composed, somewhat like the Rhapsodies of the old Ionian bards from which the mysterious personality whom we call Homer derived at once his materials and his inspiration, by rude wandering minstrels. Such men—probably often blind or otherwise incapacitated from taking part in active life—gained their bread by singing or repeating them. These poets and narrators were a very different class from the wandering troubadours or jongleurs of Southern Europe and of France, and living in a country much ruder and less chivalric, though certainly not less warlike than Languedoc or Provence, their compositions are imitable for simple pathos, fiery intensity of feeling, and picturesqueness of description. In every country there must exist some typical or national form of versification, adapted to the genius of the language and to the mode of declamation or musical accompaniment generally employed for assisting the effect. Thus the legendary poetry of the Greeks naturally took the form of the Homeric hexameter, and that of the Spaniards the loose asonante versification, as in the ballads of the Cid, so well adapted to the accompaniment of the guitar. The English ballads, almost without exception, affect the iambic measure of 12 or 14 syllables, rhyming in couplets, which however naturally divide themselves, by means of the casura or bause, into stanzas of four lines, the rhymes generally occurring at the end of the second and fourth verses. This form of metre is found predominating throughout all those interesting relics, and was itself, in all probability, a relic of the old long unrhymed alliterative measure, examples of which may be seen in the Vision of Piers Plowman, of which some account is given on p 50. The breaking up of the long lines into short hemistichs, to which I have just alluded, may have been originally nothing but a means for facilitating the copying of the lines into a page too narrow to admit them at full length and the readiness with which these lines divide themselves into such hemistichs may be observed by a comparison with the long metre of the old German Nibelungen Lied, each two lines of which can be easily broken up into a stanza of four, the rhymes being then confined, as in the English ballads, to the 2nd and 4th lines.

Written or composed by obscure and often illiterate poets, these productions were frequently handed down only by tradition from generation to generation. It is to the taste and curiosity, perhaps only to the family pride, of collectors, that we owe the accident by which some of them were copied and preserved, the few that were ever printed being destined for circulation only among the poorest class, were confided to the meanest typography and to flying sheets, or broad-sides, as they are termed by collectors. Vast numbers of them—perhaps not inferior to the finest that have been preserved—have perished for ever. The first considerable collection of these ballads was published, with most agreeable and valuable notes, by Bishop THOMAS PERCY in 1765, and it is to his example that we owe, not only the preservation of these invaluable relics, but the immense revolution produced, by their study and imitation, in the literature of the present century. It is no exaggeration to say that the old English ballads had the greatest share in bringing about that immense change in taste and feeling which characterizes the revival of romantic poetry, and that the relics of the rude old moss-trooping rhapsodists of the Border in a great measure generated the admirable inspirations of Walter Scott. Constructed, like the Homeric rhapsodies or the Romances of Spain, upon a certain regular model, these ballads, like the productions just mentioned, abound in certain regularly recurring passages, turns of expression and epithets. These must be regarded as the mechanical or received aids to the composer in his task, but these common-places are incessantly enlivened by some stroke of picturesque description, some vivid painting of natural objects, some burst of simple heroism, or some touch of pathos Among the oldest and finest of these works I may cite "the grand old ballad" of the Battle of Otterburne, Chevy Chase, the Death of Douglas, all commemorating some battle, foray, or military exploit of the Border. The class of which the above are striking specimens, bear evident marks, in their subjects and the dialect in which they are composed, of a Northern, Scottish, or at least Border origin it would be unjust not to mention that there exist large numbers, and those often of no inferior merit, which are distinctly traceable to an English—meaning a South British—source To this class will belong the immense cycle or collection of ballads describing the adventures of the famous outlaw Robin Hood, and his "merry men" This legendary personage is described in such a multitude of episodes, that he must be considered a sort of national type of English character Whether Robin Hood ever actually existed, or whether, like William Tell, he be merely a popular myth, is a question that perhaps no research will ever succeed in deciding but the numerous ballads recounting his exploits form a most beautiful and valuable repertory of national tradition and national traits of character In the last-mentioned class of ballads, viz those of purely English origin, the curious investigator will trace the resistance opposed by the oppressed class of yeomen to the tyranny of Norman feudalism, and this point has been turned to admirable account by Walter Scott in his romance of Ivanhoe, in those exquisitely-delimited scenes of which Robin Hood, under the name of the outlaw Locksley, is the hero In these compositions we see manifest traces of the rough vigorous spirit of popular, as contra-distinguished from aristocratic, feeling They commemorate the hostility of the English people against their Norman tyrants and the bold and joyous sentiment which prevails in them is strongly contrasted with the lofty and exclusive tone pervading the Trouvère legends

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

A.—MINOR POETS

From the death of Chaucer there is a dreary blank in the history of English poetry The first writer who deserves mention is

THOMAS OCCLEVE (fl. 1420), a lawyer in the reign of Henry V But he hardly deserves the name of a poet, as his verses are feeble and stupid. Very few of his poems have been printed.

JOHN LYDGATE (fl. 1430) is a writer of greater merit. He was a monk of Bury, in Suffolk, he travelled into France and Italy, and was well acquainted with the literature of both countries He wrote a large number of poems, of which one of the most celebrated is a translation of Boccaccio's Fall of Princes, which he describes as a series of Tragedies His two other larger works are, the Story of Thebes translated from Statius, and the History of the Siege of Troy Gray formed a high opinion of his poetical powers "I pretend not," he says, "to set him on a level with Chaucer, but he certainly comes the near est to him of any contemporary writer I am acquainted with. His choice of expression, and the smoothness of his verse, far surpass both Gower and Occleve. He wanted not art in raising the more tender emotions of the mind."

JOHN HARDING (fl. 1470) wrote in verse a Chronicle of England, coming down to the reign of Edward IV., to whom he dedicated the work. The poetry is wretched and deserves only the attention of the antiquary.

THE SCOTTISH POETRY occupies a higher place than the English in the fifteenth and the first half of the sixteenth centuries. BARRON and WYATTON belong to the fourteenth century, and are spoken of in the Notes and Illustrations to the preceding chapter (p. 51). They are followed by JAMES I., DUNBAR, GAWIN DOUGLAS, HENRYSON, and BLIND HARRY mentioned in the text (pp. 57, 58). To these should be added SIR DAVID LINDSAY (1490-1557), the Lyon King at Arms, and the friend and companion of James V. His poems are said to have contributed to the Reformation in Scotland. In his satires he attacked the clergy with great severity "But in the ordinary style of his versification he seems not to rise much above the prosaïc and tedious rhymers of the fifteenth century. His descriptions are as circumstantial without selection as theirs, and his language, partaking of a ruder dialect is still more removed from our own." (Hallam.)

It has been remarked above (see p. 65) that Surrey and Wyatt's poems were published in Tottel's Miscellany which was the first printed poetical miscellany in the English language. Among the other contributors to this collection, though their names are not mentioned were SIR FRANCIS BERRY the nephew of Lord Berners the translator of Froissart, and one of the brilliant ornaments of the court of Henry VIII., GEORGE BOLEYN, Viscount Rochford the brother of Anne Boleyn beheaded in 1536, THOMAS, LORD VAUGHAN, Captain of the Island of Jersey under Henry VIII., some of whose poems are also printed in the collection called the 'Paradise of Dainty Devices' (see p. 88) and who is described by Puttenham in his Art of Poesie as 'a man of much facility in vulgar makings,' and NICHOLAS GRIMALD (about 1520-1563), a lecturer at Oxford, whose initials N. G., are attached to his "Songs" in Tottel's Miscellany. He was a learned scholar, and translated into English some of the Latin and Greek classics.

To this period, rather than to that of Elizabeth belongs THOMAS TUSSEN (1527-1580), one of the earliest of our didactic poets, who was born at Rivenhall in Essex, was educated at Cambridge, and passed two years at court under the patronage of William, Lord Paget. He afterwards settled as a farmer at Cattiwade in Suffolk, where he wrote his work on Husbandry, of which the first edition appeared in 1557, under the title of "A Hundreth Good Pointes of Husbandrie." He practised farming in other parts of the country, was a singing man in Norwich cathedral, and died poor in London. His work, after going through four editions, was published in an enlarged form in 1577, under the title of Five Hundred Pointes of Good Husbandrie, united to as many of Good Huswiferie. It is written in familiar verse and "is valuable as a genuine picture of the agriculture the rural arts, and the domestic economy and customs of our industrious ancestors." (Warton.)

B.—MINOR PROSE WRITERS.

One of the chief prose writers of the fifteenth century was PEECOCK (fl. 1450), bishop of Exeter, and afterwards of Chester. Though he wrote against the Lollards, his own theological views were regarded with suspicion and he was in 1457, obliged to recant, was deprived of his bishopric, and passed the rest of his life in a conventual prison. His principal work, entitled the Repressor of over much blamyng of the Clergy, appeared in 1449. There is an excellent edition of this work by C. Babington, 1803. With respect to its language Mr. Marsh observes that, "although, in diction and arrangement of sentences, the Repressor is much in advance of the chroniclers of Peacock's age, the grammar, both in accident and syntax is in many points nearly where Wicliffe had left it, and it is of course in these respects considerably behind that of the contemporary poetical writers. Thus, while these latter authors, as well as some of earlier date employ the objective plural pronoun them and the plural possessive pronoun their, Peacock writes always hem for the personal and her for the possessive pronoun. These pronominal forms soon fell into disuse and they are hardly to be met with in any English writer of later date than Pecoek With respect to one of them, however—the objective hem for them—it may be remarked that it has not become obsolete in colloquial speech to the present day; for in such phrases as I said 'em, I told 'em, and the like, the pronoun em (or 'em) is not, as is popularly supposed, a vulgar corruption of the full pronoun them, which alone is found in modern books, but it is the true Anglo-Saxon and old English objective plural, which, in our spoken dialect, has remained unchanged for a thousand years "

SIR THOMAS MALORY (fl. 1470), the compiler and translator of the Morte Arthur, or History of King Arthur, printed by Caxton in 1485 Caxton, in his preface, says that Sir Thomas Malory took the work out of certain books in French and reduced it into English It is a compilation from some of the most popular romances of the Round Table. The style deserves great praise. See also p 25, b

JONAS FISHER, (1459-1535), bishop of Rochester, put to death by Henry VIII, along with Sir Thomas More. Besides his Latin works he wrote some sermons in English.

SIR THOMAS ELYOT (d. 1546) an eminent scholar in the reign of Henry VIII, by whom he was employed in several embassies He shares with Sir Thomas More the praise of being one of the earliest English prose writers of value. His principal work is The Governor, published in

1531, a treatise upon education, in which he deprecates the ill treatment to which boys were exposed at school at this period

JOHN LEECH (1506-1552), the eminent antiquary, was educated at St Paul's School London, and at Oxford and Cambridge. He received several ecclesiastical preferments from Henry VIII., who also gave him the title of the King's Antiquary Besides his Latin works he wrote in English his Itinerary, giving an account of his travels, a work still of great value for English topography

GEORGE CAVENDISH (d 1567), not Sir William, as frequently stated, was gentleman usher to Cardinal Wolsey, and wrote the life of the Cardinal, from which Shakespeare has taken many passages in his Henry VIII

JOHN BFILENDIE (d 1550), archdean of Moray, in the reign of James V, deserves mention as one of the earliest prose writers in Scotland His translation of the Scottish History of Boethius, or Holcins (Hocce) was published in 1577

JONAS HAIR (1495-1563) bishop of Ossory in Ireland, was the author of several theological works and of some dramatic interludes on sacred subjects (see p 118) But the work by which he is best known is in Latin, containing an account of illustrious writers in Great Britain from Japhet to the year 1550

CHAPTER IV.

THE ELIZABETHAN POETS (INCLUDING THE REIGN OF JAMES I)
A.D 1558—1625.

§ 1 Characteristics of the Elizabethan age of Literature § 2 The less-known writers of this period GASCOIGNE, TURRERVILLE, THOMAS SACKVILLE Lord Buckhurst § 3 EDMUND SPENSER his personal history, the Shepherd's Calendar, his friendship with Harvey and Sidney, favoured by Leicester and Elizabeth, disappointments at court, residence in Ireland, misfortunes, and death § 4 Analysis and criticism of the Faery Queen brilliancy of imagination, defects of plan, allusions to persons and events § 5 Detailed analysis of the Second Book, or the Legend of Temperance § 6 Versification of the poem, adaptation of the language to the metre, Spenser's boldness in dealing with English § 7 Character of Spenser's genius his minor works § 8 SIR PHILIP SIDNEY his accomplishments and heroic death his Sonnets, Arcadia, and Defence of Poesy § 9 Other leading Poets of the age —(i.) DANIEL, (ii.) DRAYTON, (iii.) SIR JOHN DAVIES, (iv.) JOHN DONNE, (v.) BISHOP HALL, English Satire. § 10 Minor Poets PHINEAS and GILES FLETCHER CHURCHYARD, the Jesuit SOUTHWELL, FAIRFAX, the translator of Tasso

§ 1 THE Age of Elizabeth is characterized by features which cause it to stand alone in the literary history of the world. It was a period of sudden emancipation of thought, of immense fertility and originality, and of high and generally diffused intellectual cultivation. The language, thanks to the various causes indicated in the preceding chapters, had reached its highest perfection, the study and the imitation of ancient or foreign models had furnished a vast store of materials, images and literary forms, which had not yet had time to become common-place and over-worn. The poets and prose writers of this age, therefore, united the freshness and vigour of youth with the regularity and majesty of manhood, and nothing can better demonstrate the intellectual activity of the epoch than the number of excellent works which have become obsolete in the present day, solely from their merits having been eclipsed by the glories of a few incomparable names, as those of Spenser in romantic and of Shakspeare in dramatic poetry. It will be my task to give a rapid sketch of some of the great works thus "darkened with the excess of light."

§ 2 The first name is that of GEORGE GASCOIGNE (1530-1577) who, as one of the founders of the great-English school of the drama

as a satirist, as a narrative and as a lyric poet, enjoyed a high popularity for art and genius. His most important production, in point of length, is a species of moral or satiric declamation entitled the Steel Glass, in which he inveighs against the vices and follies of his time. It is written in blank verse, and is one of the earliest examples of that kind of metre, so well adapted to the genius of the English language, and in which, independently of the drama, so many important compositions were afterwards to be written. The versification of Gascoigne in this work, though somewhat harsh and monotonous, is dignified and regular, and the poem evinces close observation of life and a lofty tone of morality. His career was a very active one, he figured on the brilliant stage of the court, took part in a campaign in Holland against the Spaniards, and has commemorated some of the unfortunate incidents of this expedition in a poem in seven-lined stanzas, entitled The Fruits of War, and many of his minor compositions are well deserving of perusal. He was an example of a type of literary men which abounded in England at that period, in which the active and contemplative life were harmoniously combined, and which brought the acquisitions of the study to bear upon the interests of real life.

Nearly contemporary with this poet was GEORGE TURBERVILLE (1530-1594), whose writings exhibit a less vigorous invention than those of Gascoigne. He very frequently employed a peculiar modification of the old English ballad stanza which was extremely fashionable at this period. The modification consists in the third line, instead of being of equal length to the first, viz. of six syllables, containing eight. It must not, however, be understood from this that Turberville did not employ a great variety of other metrical arrangements. The majority of his writings consist of love epistles, epitaphs, and complimentary verses.

A poet whose writings, of a lofty, melancholy, and moral tone, undoubtedly exerted a great influence at a critical period in the formation of the English literature, was THOMAS SACKVILLE, Lord Buckhurst (1536-1608), a person of high political distinction, having filled the office of Lord High Treasurer. It was for his children that Ascham wrote the Schoolmaster. He projected, and himself commenced, a work entitled A Mirror for Magistrates, which was intended to contain a series of tragic examples of the vicissitudes of fortune, drawn from the annals of his own country, serving as lessons of virtue to future kings and statesmen, and as warnings of the fragility of earthly greatness and success. Sackville composed the Induction (Introduction) of this grave and dignified work, and also the first legend or complaint, in which are commemorated the power and the fall of the Duke of Buckingham, favourite and victim of the tyrannical Richard III. The poem was afterwards continued by other writers in the same style, though generally with a perceptible diminution of grandeur and effect. Such collections of legends or short poetical biographies, in which celebrated and unfortunate sufferers were introduced, bewailing their destiny, or warning mankind against crime and ambition, were frequent in literature at an earlier period. Chaucer's Monk's Tale, and the same poet's Legend of Good Women, are in plan and character not dissimilar. Nay, the origin of such a form of composition may be traced even to the vast ethical collection of the Gesta Romanorum, if not to a still higher antiquity, for the Heroides of Ovid, though confined to the sufferings of unhappy love, form a somewhat similar gallery of examples. The Mirror for Magistrates is written in stanzas of seven lines, and exhibits great occasional power of expression, and a remarkable force and compression of language, though the general tone is gloomy and somewhat monotonous. Some of the lines reach a high elevation of sombre picturesqueness, as these, of old age

"His scalp all pilled, and he with eld forlore, His withered list still knocking at death's door," which is strikingly like what Chaucer himself would have written.*

§ 3 A period combining a scholarlike imitation of antiquity and of foreign contemporary literature, principally that of Italy, with the force, freshness, and originality of the dawn of letters in England, might have been fairly expected, even à priori, to produce a great imaginative and descriptive work of poetry. The illustrious name of EDMUND SPENSER (1553-1599) occupies a place among the writers of England similar to that of Ariosto among those of Italy, and the union in his works—and particularly in his greatest work, the Faery Queen—of original invention and happy use of existing materials, fully warrants the unquestioned verdict which names him as the greatest English poet intervening between Chaucer and Shakespeare. His career was brilliant but unhappy. Born in 1553, a cadet of the illustrious family whose name he bore, though not endowed with fortune, he was educated at the University of Cambridge, where he undoubtedly acquired an amount of learning remarkable even in that age of solid and substantial studies. He is supposed, after leaving the University, to have been compelled to perform the functions of domestic tutor in the North of England, and to have gained his first fame by the publication of the Shepherd's Calendar, a series of pastorals divided into twelve parts or months, in which, as in Virgil's Bucolics, under the guise of idyllic dialogues, his imaginary interlocutors discuss high questions of morality and state, and pay refined compliments to illustrious personages. In these eclogues

* For a further account of the Mirror for Magistrates, see Notes and Illustrations (A).

Spenser endeavoured to give a national air to his work, by painting English scenery and the English climate, by selecting English names for his rustic persons, and by infusing into their language many provincial and obsolete expressions. The extraordinary superiority, in power of thought and harmony of language, exhibited by the Shepherd's Calendar, immediately placed Spenser among the highest poetical names of his day, and attracted the favour and patronage of the great. The young poet had been closely connected, by friendship and the community of tastes and studies, with the learned Gabriel Harvey—a man of unquestionable genius, but rendered ridiculous by certain literary hobbies, as, for example, by a mania for employing the ancient classical metres, founded on quantity, in English verse, and he for some time infected Spenser with his own freaks. Through Harvey, Spenser acquired the notice and favour of the accomplished Sidney, and it was at Penshurst, the fine mansion of the latter, that he is supposed to have revised the Shepherd's Calendar, which he dedicated, under the title of the Poet's Year, to “Maister Philip Sidney, worthy of all titles, both of Chivalry and Poesy.” Sidney, in his turn, recommended Spenser to Dudley Earl of Leicester, and the powerful favourite brought the poet under the personal notice of Elizabeth herself. The great queen, surfeited as she was with all the refinements of literary homage, certainly had not, among the throng of poets that filled her court, a worshipper whose incense arose before her altar in richer or more fragrant clouds, but the poet, in his court career, naturally exposed himself to the hostility of those who were the enemies of his protectors, and there are several traditions which relate the disappointments experienced by Spenser at the hands of the great minister Burleigh, whose influence on the mind of his mistress was too firmly established to be seriously shaken by the Queen's attachment to her favourites. Spenser has left us a gloomy picture of the miseries of courtly dependence. The poet appears to have been occasionally employed in unimportant diplomatic services, but on the nomination of Lord Grey de Wilton as Deputy or Lieutenant of Ireland, Spenser accompanied him to that country as secretary, and received a grant of land not far from Cork, which he was to occupy and cultivate. This estate had formed part of the domains of the Earls of Desmond, and had been forfeited or confiscated by the English Government. Spenser resided several years at Kilcolman Castle, during which time he exercised various important administrative functions in the government of the then newly-subjugated country. It was during his residence in Ireland that he composed the most important of his works, among which the first place is occupied by his great poem of the Faëry Queen. About twelve years after his first establishment in the province of Munster, the flame of revolt, communicated from the great rebellion called Tyrone's Insurrection, which had been raging in the neighbouring province of Ulster, spread to the region which surrounded Spenser's retreat. He had probably rendered himself hateful to the half-savage Celtic population whom the English colonists had ejected and oppressed; indeed the very curious little work entitled A View of the State of Ireland, in which he has described the curious manners and customs of the indigenous race, indicates plainly enough that the poet shared the prejudices of his race and position. Kilcolman Castle was attacked and burned by the insurgents. Spenser and his family escaped with difficulty, and with the loss not only of all they possessed, but with the still more cruel bereavement of a young child, which was left behind and perished in the house. Completely ruined, and overwhelmed by so tragic an affliction, the poet returned to London, where he is reported to have died in the greatest poverty, forgotten by the court and neglected by his patrons, in 1599. He was, however, followed to the grave with the unanimous admiration of his countrymen, who bewailed in his death the loss of the greatest poet of his age. He was buried with great pomp in Westminster Abbey, near the tomb of Chaucer.

§ 4 Spenser's greatest work, The Faëry Queen, is a poem the subject of which is chivalric; allegorical, narrative, and descriptive, while the execution is in a great measure derived from the manner of Ariosto and Tasso. It was originally planned to consist of twelve books or moral adventures, each typifying the triumph of a Virtue, and couched under the form of an exploit of knight-errantry. The hero of the whole action was to be the mythical Prince Arthur, the type of perfect virtue in Spenser, as he is the ideal hero in the vast collection of mediæval legends in which he figures. This fabulous personage is supposed to become enamoured of the Faery Queen, who appears to him in a dream, and arriving at her court in Fairy-Land he finds her holding her annual festival during twelve days. Upon these twelve days the occasions arise of the adventures intended to be related in the several books of the poem, each of these adventures being undertaken by some knight of the court of Gloriana, Queen of the land of Faëry. The First Book relates the expedition of the Red-Cross Knight, who is the allegorical representative of Holiness, while his mistress Una represents true Religion, and the action of the knight's exploit shadows forth the triumph of Holiness over the enchantments and deceptions of Heresy. The Second Book recounts the adventures of Sir Guyon, or Temperance, the Third those of Britomartis—a female champion—or Chastity. It must be remarked that each of these books is sub-divided into twelve cantos, consequently that the poem, even in the imperfect form under which we possess it, is extremely voluminous.

The three first books were published separately in 1590, and dedicated to Elizabeth, who rewarded the delicate flattery which pervades innumerable allusions in the work with a pension of 50*l.* a year. After returning to Ireland Spenser prosecuted his work, and in 1596 he gave to the world three more books, namely, the Fourth, containing the Legend of Cambell and Triamond, allegorizing Friendship, the Fifth, the Legend of Artegall, or of Justice, and the Sixth, that of Sir Calidore, or Courtesy. Thus half of the poet's original design was executed. What progress he made in the six remaining books it is now impossible to ascertain. There are traditions which assert that this latter portion was completed, but that the manuscript was lost at sea, while the more probable theory is that Spenser had not time to terminate his extensive plan, but that the dreadful misfortunes amid which his life was closed prevented him from completing his design. The fragment consisting of two cantos of Mutability was intended to be inserted in the legend of Constancy, one of the books projected. The vigour, invention, and splendour of expression that glow so brightly in the first three books, manifestly decline in the fourth, fifth, and sixth, and it is perhaps no matter of regret that the poet never completed so vast a design, in which the very nature of the plan necessitated a monotony that not all his fertility of genius could have obviated. We may apply to the Faëry Queen the paradox of Hesiod—"the half is more than the whole." In this poem are united and harmonized three different elements which at first sight would appear irreconcilable, for the skeleton or framework of the action is derived from the feudal or chivalric legends, the ethical or moral sentiment from the lofty philosophy of Plato, combined with the most elevated Christian purity, and the form and colouring of the language and versification is saturated with the flowing grace and sensuous elegance of the great Italian poets of the Renaissance. The principal defects of the Faëry Queen, viewed as a whole, arise from two causes apparently opposed, yet resulting in a similar impression on the reader. The first is a want of unity, involving a loss of interest in the story, for we altogether forget Arthur, the nominal hero of the whole, and follow each separate adventure of the subordinate knights. Each book is therefore, intrinsically, a separate poem, and excites a separate interest. The other defect is the monotony of character inseparable from a series of adventures which, though varied with inexhaustible fertility, are all, from their chivalric nature, fundamentally similar, being either combats between one knight and another, or between the hero of the moment and some supernatural being—a monster, a dragon, or a wicked enchanter. In these contests, however brilliantly painted, we feel little or no suspense, for we are beforehand nearly certain of the victory of the hero, and even if this were otherwise.

the knowledge that the valiant champion is himself nothing but the impersonation of some abstract quality or virtue, would be fatal to that interest with which we follow the vicissitudes of human fortunes. Hardly any degree of genius or invention can long sustain the interest of an allegory, and where the intense realism of Bunyan has only partially succeeded, the unreal phantasmagoria of Spenser's imagination, brilliant as it was, could not do other than fail. The strongest proof of the justice of these remarks will be found in the fact that those who read Spenser with the intensest delight are precisely those who entirely neglect the moral lessons typified in his allegory, and endeavour to follow his recital of adventures as those of human beings, giving themselves voluntarily up to the mighty magic of his unequalled imagination. Another result flowing from the above considerations is, that Spenser, though extremely monotonous and tiresome to an ordinary reader, who determines to plod doggedly through two or three successive books of the Faëry Queen, is the most enchanting of poets to him who, endowed with a lively fancy, confines his attention to one or two at a time of his delicious episodes, descriptions or impersonations. Independently of the general allegorical meaning of the persons and adventures, it must be remembered that many of these were also intended to contain allusions to facts and individuals of Spenser's own time, and particularly to convey compliments to his friends and patrons. Thus Gloriana, the Faëry Queen herself, and the beautiful huntress Belphebe, were intended to allude to Elizabeth, Sir Artegall, the Knight of Justice, to Lord Grey, and the adventures of the Red-Cross Knight shadow forth the history of the Anglican Church. In all probability a multitude of such allusions, now become obscure, were clear enough, when the poem first appeared, to those who were familiar with the courtly and political life of the time, but the modern reader, I think, will little regret the dimness in which time has plunged these allusions, for they only still further complicate an allegory which of itself often detracts from the charm and interest of the narrative.

§ 5 As a specimen of Spenser's mode of conducting his allegory, I will give here a rapid analysis of the Second Book, or the Legend of Temperance. In Canto I the wicked enchanter, Archimago, meeting Sir Guyon, informs him that a fair lady, whom the latter supposes to be Una, but who is really Divesa, has been foully outraged by the Red-Cross Knight. Guyon, led by Archimago, meets the Red-Cross Knight, and is on the point of attacking him, when the two champions recognize each other, and, after courteous conference, part. Sir Guyon then hears the despairing cry of a lady, and finds Amoria, newly stabbed, lying beside a knight (Sir Mordant), and holding in her lap a babe with his hands stained by its mother's blood. After relating her story, the lady dies. Canto II describes

Sir Guyon's unsuccessful attempts to wash the babe's bloody hands. He then finds his steed gone, and proceeds on foot to the Castle of Golden Mean, where dwell also her two sisters, Elissa and Perissa—Too Little and Too Much—with their knights Canto III. describes the adventures of the Boaster, Bragadocchio, who has stolen Guyon's steed, but who is ignominiously compelled to give it up, and is abandoned by Belphebe, of whom this canto contains a description, of consummate beauty In Canto IV Guyon delivers Phaon from the violence of Furor and the malignity of the hag Occasion Canto V describes the combat of Guyon with Pyrochles, who unbinds Fury, and is then wounded by him, and Atin flies to obtain the aid of Cymochles Canto VI gives a most rich and exquisite picture of the temptation of Guyon by the Lady of the Idle Lake. In Canto VII is contained the admirable description of the Cave of Mammon, who tempts Sir Guyon with riches The VIIIth Canto depicts Guyon in his trance, disarmed by the sons of Acrates, and delivered by Arthur. Canto IX describes the House of Temperance inhabited by Alma. This is a most ingenious and beautifully developed allegory of the human body and mind, each part and faculty being typified Canto X. gives a chronicle of the ancient British kings down to the reign of Gloriana, or Elizabeth In the XIth canto the Castle of Temperance is besieged, and delivered by Arthur. The XIIth and last canto of this book describes the attack of Guyon upon the Bower of Bliss, and the ultimate defeat of Acrasia or Sensual Pleasure From this very rough and meagre analysis, which is all that my limits will permit, the reader may in some measure judge of the conduct of the fable in Spenser's great poem

§ 6 The versification of the work is a peculiar stanza, based upon the ottava rima so universally employed by the romantic and narrative poets of Italy, and of which the masterpieces of Tasso and Ariosto furnish familiar examples To the eight lines composing this form of metre, Spenser's exquisite taste and consummate ear for harmony induced him to add a ninth, which, being of twelve instead of, as in the others, ten syllables, winds up each phrase with a long, lingering cadence of the most delicious melody. I have already observed how extensively the forms of Italian versification—as in the various examples of the sonnet and the heroic stanza—had been adopted by the English poets, and I have insisted, particularly in the case of Chaucer, on the skill with which our language, naturally rude, monosyllabic and unharmonious, had been softened and melodized till it was little inferior, in power of musical expression, to the tongues of Southern Europe None of our poets is more exquisitely and uniformly musical than Spenser Indeed the sweetness and flowingness of his verse is sometimes carried so far as to become cloying and enervated. The metre he employed being very complicated, and necessitating a frequent recurrence in each stanza of similar rhymes—namely, four of one ending, three of another, and two of a third—he was obliged to take considerable liberties with the orthography and accentuation of the English language. In doing this, in giving to our metallic northern speech the flexibility of the liquid Italian, he shows himself as unscrupulous as masterly. By employing an immense mass of old Chaucerian words and provincialisms, nay even by occasionally inventing words himself, he furnishes his verse with an inexhaustible variety of language, but at the same time the reader must remember that much of the vocabulary of the great poet was a dialect that never really existed. Its peculiarities have been less permanent than those of almost any other of our great writers.

§ 7 The power of Spenser's genius does not consist in any deep analysis of human passion or feeling, in any skill in the delineation of character, but in an unequalled richness of description, in the art of representing events and objects with an intensity that makes them visible and tangible. He describes to the eye, and communicates to the airy conceptions of allegory, the splendour and the vivacity of visible objects. He has the exhaustless fertility of Rubens, with that great painter's sensuous and voluptuous profusion of colour. Among the most important of his other poetical writings, I must mention his Mother Hubbard's Tale, his Daphnaida and Astrophel, idyllic elegies on the death of Lady Howard and Sir Philip Sydney, all his Amoretti, or love poems, and, above all, his beautiful Epithalamium, or Marriage-Song on his own nuptials with the "fair Elizabeth." This is certainly one of the richest and chastest marriage-hymns to be found in the whole range of literature, combining warmth with dignity, the intensest passion with a noble elevation and purity of sentiment. Here, too, as well as in innumerable passages of the Faëry Queen, do we see the influence of that lofty and abstract philosophical idea of the identity between Beauty and Virtue, which he borrowed from the Platonic speculations.

§ 8 The name of SIR PHILIP SIDNEY (1554-1586) occurs so frequently in the literary history of this age, and that illustrious man exerted so powerful an influence on the intellectual spirit of the epoch, that our notice of the age would be incomplete without some allusion to his life, even did not the intrinsic merit of his writings give him a place among the best poets and prose-writers of the time. He united in his own person almost all the qualities that give splendour to a character, natural as well as adventitious—nobility of birth, beauty of person, bravery, generosity, learning, and courtesy. He was almost the beau idéal of the courtier, the soldier, and the scholar. The jewel of the court, the darling of the people, and the liberal and judicious patron of arts and letters, his early and heroic death gave the crowning grace to a consummate character. He was born in 1554, and died at the age of thirty-two (October 7, 1586), of a wound received in the battle of Zutphen, fought to aid the Protestants of the Netherlands in their heroic struggle against the Spaniards. His contributions to the literature of his country consist of a small collection of Sonnets, remarkable for their somewhat languid and refined elegance, and the prose romance, once regarded as a manual of courtesy and refined ingenuity, entitled The Arcadia. Judging only by its title, many critics have erroneously regarded this work as a purely pastoral composition, like the Galatea of Cervantes, the Arcadia of Sannazzaro, and the multitude of idyllic romances which were so fashionable at that time, but the narrative of Sidney, though undoubtedly written on Spanish and Italian models, is not exclusively devoted to pastoral scenes and descriptions. A great portion of the work is chivalric, and the grace and animation with which the knightly pen of Sidney paints the shock of the tourney, and the noble warfare of the chase, is not surpassed by the luxurious elegance of his pastoral descriptions. In the style we see perpetual traces of that ingenious antithetical affectation which the imitation of Spanish models had rendered fashionable in England, and which became at last a kind of Phébus or modish jargon at the court, until it was ultimately annihilated by the ridicule of Shakspeare, just as Molière destroyed the style précieux which prevailed in his day in France. One charming peculiarity of Sidney is the pure and elevated view he takes of the female character, and which his example powerfully tended to disseminate throughout the literature of his day. This alone would be sufficient to prove the truly chivalrous character of his mind. The story of the Arcadia, though occasionally tiresome and involved, is related with considerable skill, and the reader will be enchanted, in almost every page, with some of those happy thoughts and graceful expressions which he hesitates whether to attribute to the felicity of accident or to a peculiar delicacy of fancy. Sidney also wrote a small tract entitled A Defence of Poesy, in which he strives to show that the pleasures derivable from imaginative literature are powerful aids not only to the acquisition of knowledge, but to the cultivation of virtue. He exhibits a peculiar sensibility to the power and genius so often concealed in rude national legends and ballads.

§ 9 The epoch which I am endeavouring to describe was fertile in a class of poets, not perhaps attaining to the highest literary merit, but whose writings are marked by a kind of solid and scholarlike dignity which will render them permanently valuable.

(1) Such was SAMUEL DANIEL (1562-1619), whose career seems to have been tranquil and happy, and who enjoyed among his contemporaries the respect merited not only by his talents, but by a regularity of conduct then sufficiently rare among poets who, like Daniel were connected with the stage. His works are tolerably voluminous and all bear the stamp of that grave vigour of thought and dignified evenness of expression which, while it seldom soars into sublimity or penetrates deep into the abysses of passion, is never devoid of sense and reflection. His most celebrated work is The History of the Civil Wars, a poem on the Civil Wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, in that peculiar style of poetical narrative and moral meditation the example of which had been set by Sackville's Mirror for Magistrates, and which was at this time a favourite type among the literary men of England. Daniel's poem is in eight books, in stanzas of eight lines, and the talents of the writer struggle in vain against the prosaic nature of the subject, for Daniel closely adheres to the facts of history, which he can only occasionally enliven by a pathetic description or a sensible and vigorous reflection. His language is exceedingly pure, limpid, and intelligible. The poem entitled Musophilus is an elaborate defence of learning, cast into the form of a dialogue. The two interlocutors, Musophilus and Philocosmus, pronounce, in regular and well-turned stanzas, the usual arguments which the subject suggests. Many of Daniel's minor poems, as his Elegies, Epistles, Masques, and Songs, together with his contributions to the dramatic literature of the day, justify the reputation which he possessed. Good sense, dignity, and an equable flow of pure language and harmonious versification, are the qualities which posterity will acknowledge in his writings. He is said to have succeeded Spenser to the post of poet laureate.

(ii) A poet somewhat similar in general character to Daniel, but endowed with a much greater originality, was MICHAEL DRAYTON (1563-1631), a voluminous writer. His longest and most celebrated productions were the topographical and descriptive poem entitled Polyolbion, in thirty cantos or songs, The Barons' Wars, England's Heroical Epistles, The Battle of Agincourt, The Muses' Elysium, and the delicious fancies of The Court of Fairy. The Polyolbion is a minute poetical itinerary of England and Wales, in which the affectionate patriotism of the writer has enumerated—county by county, village by village, hill by hill, and rivulet by rivulet—the whole surface of his native land, enlivening his work as he goes on by immense stores of picturesque legend and the richest profusion of allegory and personification. It is composed in the long-rhymed verse of twelve syllables, and is, both in design and execution, absolutely unique in literature. The notes attached to this work, in which Drayton was assisted by "that gulf of learning," the incomparable Selden, are a wonderful mass of curious erudition. Drayton has described his country with the painful accuracy of the topographer and the enthusiasm of a poet, and the Polyolbion will ever remain a most interesting monument of industry and taste. In The Barons' Wars Drayton has described the principal events of the unhappy reign of Edward II. The poem is composed in the stanza of Ariosto, which Drayton, in his preface, selects as the most perfect and harmonious, and the merits and defects of the work may be pretty accurately characterized by what has been said above concerning Daniel's poem on a not dissimilar subject. The Heroical Epistles are imagined to be written by illustrious and unfortunate personages in English history to the objects of their love. They are therefore a kind of adaptation of the plan of Ovid to English annals. It was quite natural that a poet so fertile as Drayton, who wrote in almost every form, should not have neglected the Pastoral, a species of composition at that time in general favour. His efforts in this department are certainly not inferior to those of any of his contemporaries, not even excepting Spenser himself, while in this class of his writings, as well as in his inimitable fairy poems, Drayton has never been surpassed. In the series entitled The Muses' Elysium, consisting of a series of nine idyls, or Nymphals, as he calls them, and above all in the exquisite little mock-heroic of Nymphidia, everything that is most graceful, delicate, quaint, and fantastic in that form of national superstition—almost peculiar to Great Britain—the fairy mythology, is accumulated and touched with a consummate felicity. The whole poem of Nymphidia is a gem, and is almost equalled by the Epithalamium in the VIIIth Nymphal, on the marriage of "our Tita to a noble Fay." It is interesting to trace the use made of these graceful superstitions in the Midsummer Night's Dream and the Merry Wives of Windsor.

(iii.) The vigorous versatility of the age, founded on solid and extensive acquirements, is well exemplified in the poems of SIR JOHN DAVIES (1570-1626), a learned lawyer and statesman, and Chief Justice of Ireland, who has left two works of unusual merit and originality, on subjects so widely different that their juxtaposition excites almost a feeling of ludicrous paradox. The subject of one of them, Nosce Teipsum, is the proof of the immortality of the soul, that of the other, entitled Orchestra, the art of dancing. The language of Davies is pure and masculine, his versification smooth and melodious, and he seems to have communicated to his metaphysical arguments in the first poem, something of the easy grace and rhythmical harmony of the dance, while he has dignified and elevated the comparatively trivial subject of the second by a profusion of classical and learned allusions.* The Nosce Teipsum, pub-

* On the Nosce Teipsum, Mr Hallam remarks—"Perhaps no language can produce a poem, extending to so great a length, of more condensation of thought, or in which fewer languid verses will be found. Yet, according to some definitions, the Nosce Teipsum is wholly unpoetical inasmuch as it shows lished in 1599, is written in four-lined stanzas of heroic lines, a measure which was afterwards honoured by being taken as the vehicle of one of Dryden's early efforts, but Dryden borrowed it more immediately from the Gondibert of Davenant. The Orchestra is composed in a peculiarly-constructed stanza of seven lines, extremely well adapted to express the ever-varying rhythm of those dancing movements which the poet, by a thousand ingenious analogies, traces throughout all nature.

(iv) The unanimous admiration of contemporaries placed the genius of JOHN DONNE (1573-1631), Dean of St. Paul's, in one of the foremost places among the men of letters of his day. His life, too, full of vicissitudes, and his devotion of great and varied powers, first to scholastic study and retirement, then to the service of the state in active life, and last to the ministry of the Church, by familiarizing him with all the phases of human life, furnished his mind with rich materials for poetry of various kinds. When entering upon the career of the public service, as secretary to the Treasurer Lord Ellesmere, he made a secret marriage with the daughter of Sir George Moor, a lady whom he had long ardently loved, and the violent displeasure of whose family involved Donne in severe persecution. Though distinguished in his youth for wit and gaiety, he afterwards, under deep religious conviction, embraced the clerical profession, and became as remarkable for intense piety as he had previously been for those accomplishments which had made him the Pico di Mirandola of his age. The writings of Donne are very voluminous, and consist of love verses, epigrams, elegies, and, above all, satires, which latter department of his works is that by which he is now principally remembered. As an amatory poet he has been justly classed by Johnson among the metaphysical poets—writers in whom the intellectual faculty obtains an enormous and disproportionate supremacy over sentiment and feeling. These authors are ever on the watch for unexpected and ingenious analogies, an idea is racked into every conceivable distortion, the most remote comparisons, the obscurest recesses of historical and scientific allusion, no passion and little fancy. If it reaches the heart at all, it is through the reason. But since strong argument, in terse and correct style, fails not to give us pleasure in prose, it seems strange that it should lose its effect when it gains the aid of regular metre to gratify the ear and assist the memory. Lines there are in Davies which far outweigh much of the descriptive and imaginative poetry of the last two centuries, whether we estimate them by the pleasure they impart to us, or by the intellectual vigour they display. Experience has shown that the faculties peculiarly deemed poetical are frequently exhibited in a considerable degree, but very few have been able to preserve a perspicuous brevity without stiffness or pedantry (allowance made for the subject and the times), in metaphysical reasoning, so successfully as Sir John Davies"—(Lit.

are ransacked to furnish comparisons and illustrations which no reader can suggest to himself, and which, when presented to him by the perverse ingenuity of the poet, fill him with a strange mixture of astonishment and shame, like the distortions of the postur-master or the tricks of sleight-of-hand. It is evident that in this cultivation of the odd, the unexpected, and the monstrous, the poet becomes perfectly indifferent to the natural graces and tender colouring of simple emotion, and in his incessant search after epigrammatic turns of thought, he cares very little whether reason, taste, and propriety be violated. This false taste in literature was at one time epidemic in Spain and Italy, from whence in all probability it infected English poets, who have frequently rivalled their models in ingenious absurdity. The versification of Donne is singularly harsh and tuneless, and the contrast between the ruggedness of his expression and the far-fetched ingenuity of his thought adds to the oddity of the effect upon the mind of the reader, by making him contrast the unnatural perversion of immense intellectual activity with the rudeness and frequent coarseness both of the ideas and the expression. In Donne's Satires, of which he wrote seven, and in his Epistles to friends, we naturally find less of this portentous abuse of intellectual legerdemain, for the nature of such compositions implies that they are written in a more easy and colloquial strain, and Donne has occasionally adapted, with great felicity, the outlines of Horace and Juvenal to the manners of his own time and country. Pope has translated some of Donne's Satires into the language of his own time, under the title of 'The Satires of Dr John Donne, Dean of St Paul's, versified.'

(v) But the real-founder of Satire in England, if we are to judge by the relative scope and completeness of his works in this department, was JOSEPH HALL (1574-1633), Bishop of Norwich, a man equally remarkable for the learning, dignity, and piety with which he fulfilled his pastoral functions, and the heroic resignation with which he supported poverty and persecution when deprived of them. He produced six books of Satires, under the title of Virgidemiarum (i.e. a harvest or collection of rods, a word modified from the similar term Vindemiarum, vintage), which form a complete collection, though they were not all published at the same time, the first three books, quaintly entitled by their author toothless Satires, having appeared in 1597, while a student at Cambridge, and the latter three, designated biting Satires, two years afterwards. Some of these excellent poems attack the vices and affectations of literature, and others are of a more general moral application. For the vivacity of their images, the good sense and good taste which pervades them, the abundance of their illustrations, and the ease and animation of the style, they are deserving of high admiration. Read merely as giving curious pictures of the manners and society of the day, they are very interesting in themselves, and throw frequent light on obscure passages of the contemporary drama. Hall, like Juvonal, often employs a peculiar artifice which singularly heightens the pungency of his attacks, viz that of making his secondary allusions or illustrations themselves satirical. Some of these satires are extremely short, occasionally consisting of only a few lines. His versification is always easy, and often elegant, and the language offers an admirable union of the unforced facility of ordinary conversation with the elevation and conciseness of a more elaborate style.*

§ 10 Space will permit only a rapid allusion to several secondary poets who adorned this period, so rich in variety and vigour. The two brothers, PHINEAS FLETCHER and GILES FLETCHER, who lived, approximately, between the years 1584 and 1650, and who were connected by blood with their great contemporary the dramatist, produced, the former one of those long elaborate allegorical works which had been so fashionable at the beginning of the century, and in which science called in the aid of fiction, as in the case of Davies's poem on the Immortality of the Soul. This was The Purple Island, a minute description of the human body, with all its anatomical details, which is followed by an equally searching delineation of the intellectual faculties. Giles Fletcher's work is Christ's Victory and Triumph, in which, as in his brother's production, we see evident traces of the rich and musical diction, as well as of the lofty and philosophical tone, of the great master of allegory, Spenser. With a mere notice of the noble religious enthusiasm that prevails in the writings of CHURCHYARD, and of the unction and truly evangelical resignation of the unfortunate Jesuit SOUTHWELL, and a word of praise to the faithful and elegant translation of Tasso by FAIRFAX, I must conclude the present chapter †

* To Donne and Hall should be added the name of JOHN MARSTON, the dramatic poet, as one of the chief satirists of the Elizabethan era. In 1599 he published three books of Satires, under the title of The Scourge of Villany.

† For a fuller account of these poets, see Notes and Illustrations (B)

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

A.—THE MIRROR FOR MAGISTRALS. (See p. 71)

The history of this work, which is the most important poem in English literature between Surrey and Spenser and which was very popular in its day deserves a few words. It was projected, as stated above (p. 71), by Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, about the year 1567, and its plan was to give an account of all the illustrious but unfortunate characters in English history from the conquest to the end of the fourteenth century. The poet descends, like Dante into the infernal regions, conducted by Sorrow Sackville HUNNIS (fl. 1550) one of the gentlemen of Queen Elizabeth's chapel and the author of some moral and religious poems printed separately.

WILLIAM WARNER (1558-1609) a native of Oxfordshire, an attorney of the Common Pleas, and the author of Albion's England, first published in 1586 and frequently reprinted. This poem, which is written in the fourteen syllable line is a history of England from the Deluge to the reign of James I. It supplanted in popular favour the Urrour for Magistrates. The style of the work was much admired in its day, and Meres, in his Wits Treasurie says, that by Warner's pen the English tongue was "mightily enriched and gorgeously invested in rare ornaments and resplendent habiliments." The tales are chiefly of a merry cast, and many of them indecent.

THOMAS WATSON (1560-1592) the author of some sonnets, which have been much admired.

JOSHUA SYLVESTER (1563-1618) a merchant, who translated The Divine Weeks and Works of the French poet Du Bartas, and obtained in his day the epithet of the Silver-tongued. The work went through seven editions, the last being published in 1611. It was one of Milton's early favourites.

ARTHUR BROOKE (ob. 1663) the author of The Tragical History of Romeo and Juliet published in 1562, a metrical paraphrase of the Italian novel of Bandello on which Shakspeare founded his tragedy of Romeo and Juliet. Brooke's poem is one of considerable merit.

ROBERT SOUTHWELL (1560-1695) born in Norfolk, of Catholic parents, educated at Douay, became a Jesuit, and returned to England in 1584 as a missionary. He was arrested in 1592, and was executed at Tyburn in 1596 on account of his being a Romish priest, though not involved in any political plots. His poems breathe a spirit of religious resignation, and are marked by beauty of thought and expression. Ben Jonson said that Southwell 'had so written that piece of his, The Burning Babe, he (Jonson) would have been content to destroy many of his.'

THOMAS STORER (1597-1604) of Christ Church Oxford, the author of a poem on The Life and Death of Thomas Wolsey Cardinal published in 1599 in which he followed closely Cavendish's Life of Wolsey.

NICHOLAS BERTON (1568-1624?) the author of a considerable number of poems, and a contributor to a collection called England's Helicon published in 1600 which comprises many of the fugitive pieces of the preceding twenty years. Sidney Raleigh Lodge Marlowe Greene are among the other contributors to this collection.

FRANCIS DAVISON (1575-1619) the son of the secretary Davison deserves mention as the editor and a contributor to the Poetical Phætopody published in 1602, and often reprinted. Like England's Helicon it is a collection of poems by various writers.

GEORGE CHAPMAN (1577-1631) not a dramatic poet, but most celebrated for his translation of Homer, which preserves much of the fire and spirit of the original. The Iliad is in the fourteen-syllable verse so common in the Elizabethan era. "He would have made a great epic poet," says Charles Lamb "if indeed, he has not abundantly shown himself to be one for his Homer is not so properly a translation as the stories of Achilles and Ulysses rewritten. The earnestness and passion which he has put into every part of these poems would be incredible to a reader of more modern translations." Chapman was born at Hatching Hill, in Hertfordshire. His life was a prosperous one, and he lived on intimate terms with the great men of his day.

EDWARD VERE, EARL OF OXFORD (1534-1604) the author of some verses in the Paradise of Dainty Devises. He sat as Great Chamberlain of England upon the trial of Mary Queen of Scots.

HENRY CONSTABLE (1568?-1601?) was celebrated for his sonnets published in 1592 under the name of Diana. It is conjectured that he was the same Henry Constable who, for his zeal in the Catholic religion, was long obliged to live in a state of banishment.

SIR FULKE GREVILLE, LORD BROOKE (1554-1628), a friend of Sir Philip Sidney, was made Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a peer in 1621. He died by the stab of a revengeful servant, in 1628. His poems are a Treatise on Humane Learning, a Treatise of Wars, a Treatise of Monarchy, a Treatise of Religion and an Inquisition upon Fame and Fortune. He also wrote two tragedies, entitled Alaham and Mustapha, neither of which was ever acted being written after the model of the ancients, with choruses, &c. Scatchey remarked that Dryden appeared to him to have formed his tragic style more upon Lord Brooke than upon any other ancient.

SAMUEL ROWLANDS (d. 1631), whose history is quite unknown, except that he was a prolific pamphleteer in the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. Campbell remarks that "his descriptions of contemporary follies have considerable humour. I think he has afforded in the story of Smug and Smith a hint to Butler for his apologue of vicarious justice. In the case of the brethren who hanged a 'poor weaver that was bed rid,' instead of the cobbler who had killed an Indian,

Not out of malice, but mere zeal,
Because he was an infidel.
Hudibras, Part II Canto II. l. 420 "

SIR JOHN HARRINGTON (1561-1612), born at Kelston near Bath, in Somersetshire and celebrated as the first English translator of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso published in 1591. Harrington also wrote a book of epigrams, and several other works. His father John Harrington (1534-1582) was the author of some poems published in the "Nugæ Antiquæ." He was imprisoned in the Tower under Queen Mary, for holding a correspondence with Elizabeth.

EDWARD FAIRFAX (fl. 1600), the translator of Tasso's Jerusalem, was a gentleman of fortune. The first edition was published in 1600 and was dedicated to Queen Elizabeth. This translation is much superior to that of Ariosto by Sir John Harrington. "It has been considered as one of the earliest works in which the obsolete English which had not been laid aside in the days of Sackville, and which Spenser affected to preserve, gave way to a style not much differing, at least in point of single words and phrases, from that of the present day." But this praise, adds Mr Hallam, is equally due to Daniel, to Drayton, and to others of the later Elizabethan poets. The first five books of Tasso had been previously translated by CAREW in 1594. This translation is more literal than that of Fairfax, but far inferior in poetical spirit.

THOMAS LODGE (1556-1625?), also a physician and a dramatic poet, was born in Lincolnshire, was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and first appeared as an author about 1580. Ten of Lodge's poems are contained in the "English Helicon," published in 1600. To his prose work entitled Rodolinde Fupheus Golden Legacie (1590), Shakespeare was indebted for the plot and incidents of his drama, As you like it. For his dramatic works, see p. 131.

THOMAS CAREW (1589-1639) a poet at the court of Charles I., where he held the office of gentleman of the Privy-chamber and server in ordinary to the king. His poems, which are mostly short and amatory, were greatly admired in their day. Campbell remarks that "the want of boldness and expansion in Carew's thoughts and subjects excludes him from rivalry with great poetical names, nor is it difficult, even within the narrow pale of his works, to discover some faults of affectation, and of still more objectionable dullness. But among the poets who have walked in the same limited path he is pre-eminently beautiful, and deservedly ranks among the earliest of those who gave a cultivated grace to our lyrical strains."

SIR HENRY WOTTON (1569-1639) a distinguished diplomatist in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. He was secretary to the Earl of Essex but upon the apprehension of his patron he left the kingdom. He returned upon the accession of James, and was appointed ambassador to Venice. Later in life he was appointed Provost of Eton, and took several orders. His principal writings were published in 1651 under the title of Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, with a memoir of his life by Isaac Walton. His literary reputation rests chiefly upon his poems. His Florentis of Architecture were long held in esteem. The Reliquiæ also contain several other prose works.

RICHARD BARNFIELD (b. 1574) educated at Brasenose College, Oxford wrote several minor poems, distinguished by elegance of versification. His ode "As it fell upon a day" which was reprinted in the "English Helicon" under the signature of "Ignoto," in 1600, had been falsely attributed to Shakespeare in a volume entitled "The Passionate Pilgrim" (1599).

RICHARD CORBETT (1582-1635), bishop of Oxford, and afterwards of Norwich, celebrated as a wit and a poet in the reign of James I. His poems were first collected and published in 1617. The best known are his Journey into France and his Farewell to the Fairies. They are lively and witty.

SIR JOHN BEAUMONT (1582-1628), elder brother of Francis Beaumont the dramatist, wrote in the heroic couplet a poem entitled Bosworth Field, which was published by his son in 1629.

PHILIP FLETCHER (1584-1650), and his younger brother, GILES FLETCHER mentioned in the text (p. 84), deserve a fuller notice, and we cannot do better than quote Mr Hallam's discriminating critic-him respecting them "An ardent admiration for Spenser inspired the genius of two young brothers Phineas and Giles Fletcher. The first, very soon after the queen's death, as some allusions to Lord Essex seem to denote, composed though he did not so soon publish, a poem entitled The Purple Island. By this strange name he expressed a subject more strange, it is a minute and elaborate account of the body and mind of man. Through five cantos the reader is regaled with nothing but allegorical anatomy in the details of which Phineas seems tolerably skilled, evincing a great deal of ingenuity in diversifying his metaphors, and in presenting the delineation of his imaginary island with as much justice as possible to the allegory without obtruding it on the reader's view. In the sixth canto he rises to the intellectual and moral faculties of the soul, which occupy the rest of the poem. From its nature it is insuperably wearisome, yet his language is often very poetical, his versification harmonious, his invention fertile. . . . Giles Fletcher brother of Phineas, in Christ's Victory and Triumph though his subject has not all the naïveté that might be desired, had a manifest superiority in its choice. Each uses a stanza of his own, Phineas one of seven lines, Giles one of eight. This poem was published in 1610. Each brother alludes to the work of the other which must be owing to the alterations made by Phineas in his Purple Island, written probably the first, but not published, I believe, till 1633. Giles seems to have more vigour than his elder brother but less sweetness, less smoothness and more affectation in his style. This, indeed, is deformed by words neither English nor Latin but simply barbarous, such as clamping eblazon, deprostrate, purpured glitterand, and many others. They both bear much resemblance to Spenser, Giles sometimes ventures to cope with him even in celebrated passages, such as the description of the Cavo of Despair. And he has had the honour in turn, of being followed by Milton, especially in the first meeting of our Saviour with Satan in the Paradise Regained. Both of these brothers are deserving of much praise, they were endowed with minds eminently poetical and not inferior in imagination to any of their contemporaries. But an injudicious taste, and an excessive fondness for a style which the public was rapidly abandoning, that of allegorical personification prevented their powers from being effectively displayed.

SCOTTISH POETS

SIR ALEXANDER SCOTT (fl. 1562) wrote several amatory poems, which have procured him the title of the Scottish Anacreon.

SIR RICHARD MAITLAND (1496-1586), more celebrated as a collector of the poems which bear his name than as an original poet, but his own compositions are marked by good taste.

ALEXANDER MONTGOMERY, the author of an allegorical poem called The Cherry and the Slae, published in 1597, which long continued to be a favourite and the metre of which was adopted by Burns.

ALEXANDER HUME (d. 1609) a clergyman published in 1599 a volume of Hymns or Sacred Songs.

KING JAMES VI published in 1584 a volume of poetry entitled Rayes of a Prentice in the Divine Art of Poetrie, with the Revelis and Cautelis to be pursued and avoided.

EARL OF ANCRUM (1578-1654) wrote some sonnets of considerable merit.

GEORGE BUCHANAN (1506-1562) celebrated for his Latin version of the Psalms is spoken of among the prose writers (p. 110).

DR. ARTHUR JOHNSTON (1587-1641) also celebrated for his Latin version of the Psalms, was born near Aberdeen studied medicine at Padua, and was appointed physician to Charles I. He died at Oxford. According to the testimony of Mr Hallam, Johnston's Psalms, all of which are in the elegiac metre, do not fall short of those of Buchanan, either in elegance of style or correctness of Latinity. Johnston also wrote several other Latin poems.

EARL OF STRALING (1580-1640) published in 1637 a collation of his works entitled Recreations with the Muses consisting of heroic poems and tragedies of no great merit, but Campbell observes that "there is elegance of expression in a few of his shorter pieces." One of his tragedies is on the subject of Julius Cæsar.

WILLIAM DRUMMOND of Hawthornden (1585-1640), the most distinguished of the Scottish poets of this era, was the friend of Ben Jonson and Drayton. Jonson visited him in Hawthornden in 1619. His best poems are his sonnets, which Mr Hallam describes as "polished and elegant free from conceit and bad taste in pure unblemished English."

CHAPTER V

THE NEW PHILOSOPHY AND PROSE LITERATURE IN THE REIGNS OF ELIZABETH AND JAMES I.

A D 1558—1625

- § 1 Introduction § 2 Chroniclers STOW, HOLLINSHED, SPEED § 3 SIR
WALTER RALEIGH § 4 Collections of Voyages and Travels HAKLUYT, PURCHAS, DAVIS § 5 The English Church HOOKER'S Ecclesiastical
Polity § 6 Life of LORD BACON § 7 Services of Bacon the scholastic philosophy § 8 History of previous attempts to throw off the yoke of the scholastic philosophy § 9 Bacon's Instauratio Magna § 10 First and Second Books De Augmentis Scientiarum and the Novum
Organon the Inductive Method § 11 Third Book Silva Silvarum collection and classification of facts and experiments remaining books § 12 Estimate of Bacon's services to science § 13 His Essays and other English writings § 14 BURTON'S Anatomy of Melancholy LORD HER-BERT OF CHIFFRURY § 15 THOMAS HOBBS

§ 1 THE principal object of the present chapter is to trace the nature and the results of that immense revolution in philosophy brought about by the immortal writings of Bacon. It will, however, be unavoidable, in accordance with the chronological order generally adopted in our work, to sketch the character of other authors, of great though inferior importance, who flourished at the same time. Of the general intellectual character of the Age of Elizabeth, something has already been said: it may be observed that much of the peculiarly practical character which distinguishes the political and philosophical literature of this time is traceable to the general laicising of the higher functions of the public service, and is not one of the least valuable results of the Protestant Reformation. The clergy had no longer the monopoly of that learning and those acquirements which during the Catholic ages secured them the monopoly of power and the vigorous personal character of the great queen combined with her jealousy of dictation to surround her throne with ministers chosen for the most part among the middle classes of her people, and to whom she accorded unshaken confidence, while she never allowed them to obtain any of that undue influence which the weaknesses of the woman experienced from unworthy favourites like Leicester and Essex. Such men as Burleigh, Walsingham, and Sir Thomas Smith belong to a peculiar type and class of statesmen, and their administration, though less brilliant and dramatic than might be found at other periods of our history, was incontestably more wise and patriotic than can easily be paralleled

§ 2 In the humble but useful department of historical chronicles a few words must be said on the labours of JOHN STOW * (1525-1605) and RAPHAEL HOLLINSHED (d 1580), the former of whom, a London citizen of very slight literary pretensions, devoted the whole of his long life to the task of collecting materials for numerous chronicles and descriptions of London. The latter undertook a somewhat similar work, though intended to commemorate the history of England generally. From Hollinshed, it may be remarked, Shakspeare drew the materials for many of his half-legendary, half-historical pieces, such as Macbeth, King Lear, and the like; and it is curious to observe the mode in which the genius of the great poet animates and transfigures the flat and prosaic language of the old chronicler, whose very words he often quotes textually. Striking examples of this will be found in Henry V and Henry VI.

§ 3 The most extraordinary and meteor-like personage in the literary history of this time is SIR WALTER RALEIGH (1552-1618), the brilliancy of whose courtly and military career can only be equalled by the wonderful variety of his talents and accomplishments, and by the tragic heroism of his death. He was born in 1552, and early attracted the favour of Elizabeth by an act of romantic gallantry, which has furnished the theme of a famous anecdote, and, both by his military exploits and his graceful adulation, he long maintained possession of her capricious favour. He highly distinguished himself in the wars in Ireland, where he visited Spenser at Kilcolman, and was consulted by the great poet on the Faëry Queen, and no less as a navigator and adventurer in the colonization of Virginia and the conquest of Guiana. He is said to have first introduced the potato and the use of tobacco into England. On the accession of James I he seems to have been, though without the least grounds, involved in an accusation of high treason connected with the alleged plot to place the unfortunate Arabella Stuart upon the throne, and he was confined for many years in the Tower under sentence of death. Proposing a new expedition to South America, he was allowed to undertake it, but, it proving unsuccessful, the miserable king, in order to gratify the hatred of the Spanish court, which Raleigh's exploits had powerfully excited, allowed him to be executed under the old sentence in 1618. During his imprisonment of twelve years Raleigh devoted himself to literary and scientific occupations, he produced, with the aid of many learned friends, among whom Jonson was one, a History of the World, which will ever be regarded as a masterpiece of English prose. The death of few illustrious men has been accompanied by so many traits of heroic simplicity as that of Raleigh.*

* Stow's chief works are a Summary of English Chronicles, first published in 1565, his Annals in 1573, and his Survey of London in 1598. To the names of Stow and Hollinshed should be added that of JOHN SPEED (1552-1629), who published in 1614 A History of Great Britain from the earliest times to the reign of James I.

§ 4 The immense outburst of intellectual activity which renders the middle of the sixteenth century so memorable an epoch in the history of philosophy, was not without a parallel in the rapid extension of geographical knowledge. England, which gave birth to Bacon, the successful conqueror of new worlds of philosophical speculation, was foremost among the countries whose bold navigators explored unknown regions of the globe. Innumerable expeditions, sometimes fitted out by the state, but far more generally the undertakings of private speculation, exhibited incredible skill, bravery, and perseverance in opening new passages for commerce, and in particular in the endeavour to solve the great commercial and geographical problem of finding a north-west passage to the eastern hemisphere. The commercial rivalry between England and Spain, and afterwards between England and Holland, generated a glorious band of navigators, whose exploits, partaking of the double character of privateering and of trade, laid the foundation of that naval skill which rendered England the mistress of the seas. Drake, Frobisher, Dayies, Raleigh, were the worthy ancestors of the Nelsons, Cooks, and Franklins. The recital of their dangers and their discoveries was frequently recorded by these hardy navigators in their own simple and picturesque language, and the same age that laid the foundation of the naval greatness of our country, produced also a branch of our literature which is neither the least valuable nor the least characteristic—the narration of maritime discovery. HAKLUYT (1553-1616), PURCHAS (d. 1628), and DAVIS (d. 1605) have given to posterity large collections of invaluable materials concerning the naval adventure of those times. The first two authors were merely chroniclers and compilers, the third was himself a famous navigator, the explorer of the Northern Ocean, and gave his name to the famous strait which serves as a monument of his glory. The language in all these works is simple, grave, and unadorned, the narrative, in itself so full of the intensest dramatic excitement, has the charm of a brave old seaman's description of the toils and dangers he has past, and the tremendous dangers so simply encountered with such insignificant means are painted with a peculiar mixture of professional sang-froid and childlike trust in Providence. The occasional acts of cruelty and oppression, which are to be mainly attributed to a less advanced state of civilization, are more than redeemed by the indomitable courage and invincible perseverance of these illustrious navigators.

* Raleigh's History comes down only to the Second Macedonian War. Respecting its style, Hallam remarks that "there is little now obsolete in the words of Raleigh, nor, to any great degree, in his turn of phrase, the periods, where pains have been taken with them, show that artificial structure which we find in Sidney and Hooker—he is less pedantic than most of his contemporaries, seldom low, never affected."

§ 5 Among the various Christian sects generated by the great break-up of the Catholic Church at the Reformation, the Anglican confession appears to occupy nearly a central position, equidistant from the blind devotion to authority advocated by the Romish communion, and the extreme abnegation of authority proclaimed by the Calvinistic theologians. The Church of England is essentially a compromise between opposite extremes, and it is perhaps to this moderation that it owes its solidity and its influence. It is unquestionably this moderation which recommended it to so reasonable and practical a people as the English. On its first appearance on the stage of history it was exposed to the most violent hostility and persecution at the hands of the ancient faith which it had supplanted, but no sooner had it become firmly established as the dominant and official religion of the state, than it was exposed to attacks from the very opposite point of the theological compass, attacks under whose violence it temporarily succumbed. The Catholic persecutions of Mary's reign were followed by the gradually increasing hostility of Puritanism, which had been insensibly acquiring more and more power from the middle of the reign of Elizabeth. The great champion of the principles of Anglicanism against the encroachments of the Genevan school of theology was RICHARD HOOKER (1553-1600), a man of evangelical piety and of vast learning, sprung from the humblest origin, and educated in the University of Oxford. He was for a long time buried in the obscurity of a country parsonage, but his eloquence and erudition obtained for him the eminent post of Master of the Temple in London, where his colleague in the ministry, Walter Travers, propounded doctrines in church government which, being similar to those of the Calvinistic confession, were incompatible with Hooker's opinions. The mildness and modesty of Hooker's character, rendering controversy and disputation insupportable to him, urged him to implore his ecclesiastical superior to remove him from his place, and restore him to the more congenial duties of a country parish. and it was here that he executed that great work which has placed him among the most eminent of the Anglican divines, and among the best prose-writers of his age. The title of this work is A Treatise on the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, and its object is to investigate and define the fundamental principles upon which is founded the right of the Church to the obedience of its members, and the duty of the members to pay obedience to the Church. But, though the principal object of this book is to establish the relative rights and duties of the Anglican Church in particular, and to defend its organization against the attacks of the Roman Catholics on the one hand and the Calvinists on the other, Hooker has dug deep down into the eternal granite on which are founded all law, all obedience, and all right, political as well as religious. The Ecclesiastical Polity is a monument of close and cogent logic, supported by immense and varied erudition, and is written in a style so free from pedantry, so clear, vigorous, and unaffected, as to form a remarkable contrast with the generality of theological compositions, then generally overloaded with quotation and deformed by conceits and antithesis. It is to be regretted that this excellent work was never finished by the author, or, at least, if finished, has not descended to us as Hooker intended it to do, for the Sixth Book is supposed, though certainly the composition of the same author, to be a fragment of a quite different work.

§ 3 The political life of FRANCIS BACON (1561-1626) forms, with his purely intellectual or philosophical career, a contrast so striking that it would be difficult to find, in the records of biographical literature, anything so vividly opposed. He was the son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, long a favourite and trusted minister of Queen Elizabeth, in whose service he held the high office of Keeper of the Great Seal. Sir Nicholas was a fair specimen of that peculiar class of able statesmen with whom that great sovereign surrounded her administration, a type which we find repeated in Burleigh, Walsingham, Ellesmere, and Smith—men of great practical knowledge of the world, of powerful though not perhaps inventive faculties, and of great prudence and moderation in their religious opinions, a point of much importance at a period when the recent Reformation in the Church had exposed the country to the agitations arising from theological disputes. Francis Bacon was the nephew of Burleigh, Sir Nicholas and the great Chancellor having married two sisters, and the boy gave earnest, from his tenderest childhood, of those powers of intellect and that readiness of mind which afterwards distinguished him among men. He was born in 1561, and received a careful education, completed at an age even for that time exceedingly early, in the University of Cambridge. He is said, even as a boy, to have shown plain indications of that inquiring spirit which carried him to the investigation of natural laws, and a gravity and presence of mind which attracted the attention of the Queen, and while studying at Cambridge it is reported that he was struck with the defects of the philosophical methods, founded upon the scholastic or Aristotelian system, then universally adopted in the investigations of science. Then, perhaps, first dawned upon his mind the dim outline of that great reformation in philosophy which he was afterwards destined to bring about. His father, who certainly intended to devote him to the public service, probably in the department of diplomacy, sent him to travel on the Continent, and a residence of about four years in France, Germany, and Italy, not only gave him the opportunity of acquiring a remarkable stock of political knowledge respecting the state and views of the principal European courts, but rendered him the still more valuable service of enlarging his knowledge of mankind, and making him acquainted with the state of philosophy and letters. He was recalled from the Continent by the death of his father in 1579, and found himself under the necessity of entering upon some active career. He appears to have felt that the natural bent of his genius inclined to the study of science, and he begged his kinsman and natural protector, Burleigh, to obtain for him the means of devoting himself to those pursuits. The Treasurer, however, who was jealous of his nephew's extraordinary abilities, which he feared might eclipse or at least interfere with the talents of his own son Robert, just then entering upon that brilliant career which he so long followed, treated Francis with great harshness and indifference, and insisted on his embracing the profession of the law. He became a student of Gray's Inn, and that wonderful aptitude, to which no labour was too arduous and no subtlety too refined, very soon made him the most distinguished advocate of his day, and an admired teacher of the legal science. The jealousy of his kinsmen the Cecils, both father and son, appears to have veiled itself, in some degree perhaps unconsciously, under the pretext that Bacon was a flighty and bookish young man, too fond of projects and theories to be likely to become a useful servant of the State. But the countenance which was refused to Bacon by his uncle and cousin, he obtained from the generous and enthusiastic friendship of Essex, who used all his influence to obtain for his friend the place of Solicitor-General, and when unsuccessful in this attempt, consoled him for the disappointment by the gift of a considerable estate. During this period of his life Bacon continued to rise rapidly, both in professional reputation as a lawyer, and in fame both for philosophy and eloquence. He sat in the House of Commons, and gave evidence not only of his unequalled powers as a speaker, but also of that cowardly and interested subservience to the Court which was the great blot upon his glory, and the cause of his ultimate disgrace. There is nothing in the whole range of history more melancholy than to trace this sublime intellect truckling to every favourite who had power to help or to hurt, and betraying in succession all those to whom self-interest for the moment had attached him. After submitting, with a subserviency unworthy of a man of the least spirit, to the haughty reproaches of the Cecils, he abandoned their faction for that of Essex, whom he flattered and betrayed. On the unhappy Earl's trial for high treason, in consequence of his rantic conspiracy and revolt, Bacon, though he certainly felt for his benefactor as warm an attachment as was compatible with a mean and servile nature, not only abandoned his former friend, but volunteered with malignant eagerness among the foremost ranks of his enemies, and employed all his immense powers, as an advocate and a pamphleteer, to precipitate his ruin and to blacken his memory. Bacon was not in fact a malignant man—he was a needy, flexible, unscrupulous courtier, and showed in his after career the same ignoble readiness to betray the duties of the judge as he now did in forgetting the obligations of the friend.

On the death of Elizabeth, and the transfer of the crown to James I in 1603, Bacon, who had been gradually and steadily rising in the service of the State, attached himself first to Cary the ignoble favourite of that prince, and afterwards to Carr's successor, the haughty Buckingham. He had been knighted at the coronation, and at the same time he married Alice Barnham, a young lady of considerable fortune, the daughter of a London alderman. He sat in more than one parliament, and was successively made Solicitor-General, Attorney-General, and at last, in 1617, Lord-Keeper, and in 1618, Lord High Chancellor of England, and Baron Verulam, to which title was added, three years afterwards, the higher style of Viscount St Albans. Though the whole of his public career was stained with acts of the basest servility and corruption, it is not un instructive to mention that Bacon was one of the last, if not the very last, ministers of the law in England to employ and to defend the application of torture in judicial procedure. Bacon occupied the highest office of justice during four years, and exhibited, in the discharge of his great functions, the wisdom and eloquence which characterized his mind, and the servility and meanness which disgraced his conduct, and on the assembling of Parliament in 1621, the House of Commons, then filled with just indignation against the unsupportable abuses, corruptions, and monopolies countenanced by the Government, ordered a deliberate investigation into various acts of bribery of which the Chancellor was accused. The King and the favourite, though ready to do all in their power to screen a criminal who had always been their devoted servant, were not bold enough to face the indignation of the whole country, and the investigation was allowed to proceed. It was carried on before the House of Lords, and it resulted in his conviction, on the clearest evidence, of many acts of gross corruption as a judge *. Independently of the cases thus proved, it cannot be doubted that there must have existed numerous others which were not inquired into. Bacon himself fully confessed his own guilt, and in language which under other circumstances would have been profoundly pathetic, threw himself on the indulgence of his judges. The sentence, though it could not be otherwise than severe, was evidently just. It condemned him to be deprived of his place as Chancellor, to pay a fine of 40,000*l* (a sum, be it remarked, not amounting to half the sums he was supposed to have corruptly made), to be imprisoned during the King's pleasure in the Tower, to be ever after incapable of holding any office in the State, and to be incapacitated from sitting in Parliament or coming within twelve miles of the Court. In imposing so severe a punishment it must be recollected that Bacon's judges well knew that much of it would be mitigated, or altogether remitted, and the result showed how just were these anticipations. The culprit was almost immediately released from confinement, the fine was not only remitted by royal favour, but by the manner of its remission converted into a sort of protection of the fallen Chancellor against the claims of his importunate creditors, and he was speedily restored to the privilege of presenting himself at Court. There can be no doubt that James and his favourite had felt great reluctance in abandoning Bacon to the indignation of Parliament, and that they only did so in the conviction that any attempt to save their servant would not only have been inevitably unsuccessful, but must have involved the Government itself in odium, without in the least alleviating the lot of the guilty Chancellor.

* Many of the charges against Bacon, related in the text, have been proved by Mr Hepworth Dixon, in his 'Personal History of Lord Bacon,' to be unfounded.

The life of the fallen minister was prolonged for five years after his severe but merited disgrace, and these years were passed in intriguing, flattering, and imploring pecuniary relief in his distresses. During his whole life he had lived splendidly and extravagantly. His taste for magnificence in houses, gardens, and trains of domestics had been such as may generally be found in men of lively imagination, and it was to escape from the perpetual embarrassments which are the natural consequences of such tastes that he in all probability owed that gradual deadening of the moral sense, and that blunting of the sentiment of honour and self-respect, which was the original source of his crimes. Common experience shows with what fatal rapidity rises the flood of corruption in the human heart when once the first barriers are removed. Bacon's death took place, after a few days' illness, on the 9th April, 1626, and was caused by a cold and fever caught in travelling near London, and in part is attributed to an experiment which he tried, of preserving meat by means of freezing. He got out of his carriage, bought a fowl, and filled the inside of the bird with snow, when then lay thick upon the ground. In doing this he received a chill, which was aggravated by his being put into a damp bed at Lord Arundel's house near Highgate. Bacon was buried, by his own desire, by his mother's side in St. Michael's Church, St. Alban's, near which place was the magnificent seat of Gorbambury, constructed by himself. He had no children, and left his affairs involved in debt and confusion.

§ 7 In order to appreciate the services which Bacon rendered to the cause of truth and knowledge, and which have placed his name foremost among the benefactors of the human race, two precautions are indispensable. First we must form a distinct idea of the nature of the philosophical methods which his system of investigation supplanted for ever in physical research, and, secondly, we must dismiss from our minds that common and most erroneous imagination that Bacon was an inventor or a discoverer in any specific branch of knowledge. His mission was not to teach mankind a philosophy, but to teach them how to philosophise. A contrary supposition would be as gross an error as that of the clown who imagined that Newton was the discoverer of gravitation. The task which Bacon proposed to himself was loftier and more useful than that of the mere inventor in any branch of science, and the excellence of his method can be nowhere more clearly seen than in the instances in which he has himself applied it to facts which in his day were imperfectly known or erroneously explained. The most brilliant name among the ancient philosophers is incontestably that of Aristotle: the immensity of his acquirements, which extended to almost every branch of physical, political, moral, and intellectual research, and the powers of a mind unrivalled at once for grasp of view and subtlety of discrimination, have justly secured to him the very highest place among the greatest intellects of the earth: he was indeed, in the fullest sense,

“l maestro di color che sanno”

But the instrumental or mechanical part of his system, the mode by which he taught his followers that they could arrive at true deductions in scientific investigation, when falling into inferior hands, was singularly liable to be abused. That careful examination of nature, and that wise and cautious prudence in the application, to particular phenomena, of general formulas of reasoning, which are so perceptible in the works of the master, were very soon neglected by the disciples, who, finding themselves in possession of a mode of research which seemed to them to promise an infallible correctness in the results obtained, were led, by their very admiration for the genius of Aristotle, to leave out of sight his prudent reserve in the employment of his method. The synthetic mode of reasoning flatters the pride of human intellect by causing the truths discovered to appear the conquest made by its unassisted powers, and the great part played in the investigation by those powers renders the method peculiarly susceptible of that kind of corruption which arises from over-subtlety and the vain employment of words. Nor must we leave out of account the deteriorating influence of the various nations and epochs through which the ancient deductive philosophy had been handed down from the time of Aristotle himself till the days of Bacon, when its uselessness for the attainment of truth had become so apparent that a great reform was inevitable, had been indeed inevitable from a much more remote period. The acute, disputatious spirit of the Greek character had already from the very first commenced that tendency towards vain word-catching which was still further accelerated in the schools of the Lower Empire. It was from the schools of the Lower Empire that the Orientals received the philosophical system already corrupted, and the mystical and over-subtle genius of the Jewish and Arabian speculators added new elements of decay. It was in this state that the doctrines were received among the monastic speculators of the Middle Ages, and to the additional errors arising from the abstract and excessive refinements of the cloister were added those proceeding from the unfortunate alliance between the philosophical system of the Schools and the authority of the Church. The solidarity established between the orthodoxy of the Vatican and the methods of philosophy was indirectly as fatal to the authority of the one as ruinous to the value of the other. In this unhallowed union between physical science and dogmatic theology, the Church, by its arrogation to itself of the character of infallibility, put it out of its own power ever to recognise as false any opinion that it had once recognised as true, and theology being in its essence a stationary science, while philosophy is as inevitably a progressive one, the discordance between the two ill-matched members of the union speedily struck the one with impotence and destroyed the influence of the other. Independently, too, of the sources of corruption which I have been endeavouring to point out, the Aristotelian method of investigation, even in its pure and normal state, had been always obnoxious to the charge of infertility, and of being essentially stationary and unprogressive. The ultimate aim and object of its speculations was, by the attainment of abstract truth, to exercise, purify, and elevate the human faculties, and to carry the mind higher and higher towards a contemplation of the Supreme Good and the Supreme Beauty. The investigation of nature was merely a means to this end. Practical utility was regarded as a result which might or might not be attained in this process of raising the mind to a certain ideal height of wisdom, but an end which, whether attained or not, was below the dignity of the true sage. Now the aim proposed by the modern philosophy is totally different, and it follows that the methods by which that end is pursued should be as different. Since the time of Bacon all the powers of human reason, and all the energies of invention and research, have been concentrated on the object of improving the happiness of human life—of diminishing the sufferings, and increasing the enjoyments of our imperfect existence.

here below—of extending the empire of man over the realms of nature—in short, of making our earthly state, both physical and moral, more happy. This is an aim less ambitious than that ideal virtue and that impossible wisdom which were the aspiration of the older philosophy, but it has the advantage of being attainable, while the experience of twenty centuries had sufficiently proved that the lofty pretensions of the former system had been followed by no corresponding results; nay, that the incessant disputations of the most acute and powerful intellects during so many generations, not only had left the greatest and most vital questions where they had found them at first, but had degraded philosophy to the level of an ignoble legerdemain.

§ 8 Many attempts had been made, by vigorous and independent minds, long before the appearance of Bacon, to throw off the yoke of the scholastic philosophy, but that yoke was so rivetted with the shackles of Catholic orthodoxy, that the efforts, being made in countries and at epochs when the Church was all-powerful, could not possibly be successful. All they could do was to shake the foundations of an intellectual tyranny which had so long weighed upon mankind, and to prepare the way for its final overthrow. The Reformation, breaking up the hard-bound soil, opened and softened it so that the seeds of true science and philosophy, instead of falling upon a rock, brought forth fruit a hundredfold. Long and splendid was the list of the great and liberal minds who had revolted against the tyranny of the schools before the appearance of the New Philosophy. In the writings of that wonderful monk, the anticipator of his great namesake—in the controversy between the Nominalists and Realists—in the disputes which preceded the Reformation—the standard of revolt against the tyranny of the ancient system had been raised by a succession of brave and vigorous hands, and though many of these champions had fallen in their contest against an enemy entrenched in the fortifications of religious orthodoxy, and though the stake and the dungeon had apparently silenced them for ever, nevertheless the tradition of their exploits had formed a still-increasing treasury of arguments against orthodox tyranny. England, in the reign of Elizabeth and James I, was precisely the country, and a country precisely in the particular state, in which the great revolution in philosophy was possible, and it was a most providential combination of circumstances and qualities that was concentrated in Francis Bacon so as to make him, and perhaps him alone, the apostle of the new philosophical faith.

§ 9. The great object which Bacon proposed to himself, in proclaiming the advantages of the Inductive Method, was fruit. the improvement of the condition of mankind, and his object being different from that of the elder philosophers, the mode by which it was to be attained was different likewise. From an early age he had been struck with the defects, with the stationary and unproductive character of the Deductive Method, and during the whole of his brilliant, agitated, and, alas! too often ignominious career, he had constantly and patiently laboured, adding stone after stone to that splendid edifice which will enshrine his name when his crimes and weaknesses, his ambition and servility, shall be forgotten. His philosophical system is contained in the great work, or rather series of works, to which he intended to give the general title of Instauratio Magna, or Great Institution of True Philosophy. The whole of this neither was nor ever could have been executed by one man or by the labours of one age, for every new addition to the stock of human knowledge, would, as Bacon plainly saw, modify the conclusions, though it would not affect otherwise than by confirming the soundness, of the philosophical method he propounded. The Instauratio was to consist of six separate parts or books, of which the following is a short synoptical arrangement —

- I. Partitiones Scientiarum a summary or classification of all knowledge, with indications of those branches which had been more or less imperfectly treated.
- II. Novum Organum the New Instrument, an exposition of the methods to be adopted in the investigation of truth, with indications of the principal sources of human error, and the remedies against that error in future
- III. Phænomena Universi, sive Historia Naturalis et Experimentalis ad condendam Philosophiam a complete body of well-observed facts and experiments in all branches of human knowledge, to furnish the raw material upon which the new method was to be applied, in order to obtain results of truth
- IV Scala Intellectus, sive Filum Labyrinthi rules for the gradual ascent of the mind from particular instances or phenomena, to principles continually more and more abstract, and warnings against the danger of advancing otherwise than gradually and cautiously
- V Prodromi, sive Anticipationes Philosophiæ Secundæ, anticipations or forestallings of the New Philosophy, i. e. such truths as could be, so to say, provisionally established, to be afterwards tested by the application of the New Method.
- VI Philosophia Secunda, sive Scientia activa, the result of the just, careful, and complete application of the methods previously laid down to the vast body of facts to be accumulated and observed in accordance with the rules and precautions contained in the IInd and IVth parts

Let us compare the position of Bacon, with respect to science in general, to that of an architect invited to undertake the reconstruction of a palace, ancient and splendid, but which, in consequence of the lapse of time and the changes of the mode of living, is found to be in a ruinous or uninhabitable condition. What would be the natural mode of proceeding adopted by an enlightened artist under these circumstances? He would, I think, make it his first care to draw an exact plan of the edifice in its present state, so as to form a clear notion of the extent, the defects, and the conveniences of the building as it stands, and not till then would he proceed to the demolition of the existing edifice. He would next prepare such instruments, tools, and mechanical aids, as would be likely to render the work of construction more rapid, certain, and economical. Thirdly, he would accumulate the necessary materials. Fourthly, he would provide the ladders. Lastly, he would begin to build, but should the edifice be so vast that no human life would be long enough to terminate it, he would construct so much of it as would suffice to give his successors an idea of the general plan, style, and disposition of the parts, and leave it to be completed by future generations. It will easily, I think, be seen, how accurately the mode of proceeding in Bacon's great work corresponds with common sense and with the method followed by our imaginary architect. Bacon is the builder, the great temple of knowledge is the edifice, which the labours of our race have to terminate according to his plan.

§ 10 Let us now inquire what portion of this project Bacon was able to execute. The first portion, consisting of a general view of the state of science at his time, with an explanation of the causes of its sterility and unprogressiveness, was published in 1605, in an English treatise, bearing the title of The Proficiency and Advancement of Learning. This was afterwards much altered and extended, and republished in Latin, in 1623, under the title De Augmentis Scientiarum. The Novum Organum, the most important portion of Bacon's work, is that in which the necessity and the principles of the Inductive Method are laid down and demonstrated. It is, in short, the compendium of the Baconian logic. It was published, in Latin, in 1620. The fundamental difference between the method recommended by Bacon and that which had so long been adopted by philosophers, may, I think, be rendered clear by a comparison of the accompanying little diagrams:—

In the first of these the point A may be conceived to represent some general principle upon which depend any number of detached facts or phenomena B, C, D, E, F. Now let it be supposed that we are seeking for the explanation of one or all of these phenomena, or, in other words, desirous of discovering the law upon which they depend. It is obvious that we may proceed as the arithmetician proceeds in the solution of a problem involving the search after an unknown quantity or number, that is, we may suppose the law of nature to be so and so, and applying this law to one or all of the phenomena within our observation, see if it corresponds with them or not. If it does, we conclude, so far as our examination has extended, that we have hit upon the true result of which we are in search. If not, we must repeat the process, as the arithmetician would do in a like case, till we obtain an answer that corresponds with all the conditions of the problem. and it is evident, that the greater the number of separate facts to which we successfully apply our theoretical explanation, the greater will be the probability of our having hit upon the true one. Now this application of a pre-established theory to the particular facts or phenomena is precisely the signification of the word synthesis. It is obvious that the march of the mind in this mode of investigation is from the general to the particular—that is, in the direction of the arrow, or downwards—whence this mode of investigation is styled deduction, or a descent from the general law to the individual example. Similarly, the Aristotelian method has received the designation à priori, because in it the establishment of a theory, or at all events the provisional employment of a theory, is prior to its application in practice, just as in measuring an unknown space we previously establish a rule, as of a foot, yard, &c, which we afterwards apply to the space to be so determined. In the diagram all the elements are the same as in the preceding one, with the exception that here the process follows a precisely opposite direction—that is, from a careful comparison of the different facts, the mind travels gradually upwards, with slow and cautious advances, from bare phenomena to more general consideration, till at last it reaches some point in which all the phenomena agree, and this point is the law of nature or general principle, of which we were in search. As synthesis signifies composition, so analysis signifies resolution, and it is by a continual and cautious process of resolution that the mind ascends—in the direction marked by the arrow—from the particular to the general. This ascending process is clearly designated by the term induction, which signifies an ascent from particular instances to a general law, and the term à posteriori denotes that the theory, being evolved from the examination of the individual facts, is necessarily posterior or subsequent to the examination of those facts.

All human inventions have their good and their bad sides, their advantages and their defects and it is only by a comparison between the relative advantages and defects that we can establish the superiority of one system or mode of action over another. On contemplating the two methods of which I have just been giving a very rough and popular explanation, it will be at once obvious that the Deductive mode enables us, when the right theory has been hit upon, to arrive at absolute, or almost mathematical truth, while analysis, being dependent for its accuracy upon the number of phenomena which furnish the materials for our induction, can never arrive at absolute certainty, inasmuch as it is impossible to examine all the phenomena of a single class, and as while any phenomena remain unexamined, we never can be certain that the discovery of some new fact will not completely upset our conclusions. The utmost that we can arrive at, therefore, by this route, is a very high degree of probability—a degree which will be higher in proportion as it is founded upon a greater number of instances, and attained by a more careful process of sifting. But the nature of the human mind is such that it is practically incapable of distinguishing between a very high probability and an absolute certainty, at least the latter is able to produce upon the reason the same amount of conviction—in some cases, perhaps, even a greater amount—than even an absolute certainty. If we consider, therefore, the enormous number of chances against any given à priori deduction being the right one—for, as in an arithmetical problem, there can be only one correct solution, while the number of possible incorrect solutions is infinite—and observe that till all the possible phenomena have been submitted to the synthetic test we never can be sure that we have the right theory, we shall easily agree that the possible certainty of a theory is dearly bought when compared with the far greater safety of the analytical method of reasoning, which, keeping fast hold of nature at each step of its progress, has the possibility, nay even the certainty, of correcting its errors as they may arise.

The most important portion of the whole Instauratio is the Novum Organum, in which Bacon lays down the rules for the employment of Induction in the investigation of truth, and points out the origin and remedies of the errors which most commonly oppose us in our search. The earlier philosophers, and particularly Aristotle, assigning a great and almost unlimited efficacy in this research to the intellectual faculties alone, contented themselves with perfecting those logical formulas, among which the syllogism was the principal, by whose aid, as by the operation of some infallible instrument, they conceived that that result would assuredly be attained and gave rules for the legitimate employment of their syll pointing out the means of detecting and guarding against fallacies or irregularities in the expression of their reasoning Bacon went far deeper than this, and showed that the most dangerous and universal sources of human error have their origin, not in the illegitimate employment of terms, but in the weaknesses, the prejudices, and the passions of mankind, exhibited either in the race or the individual. He classifies these sources of error, which in his vivid picturesque language he calls Idols or false appearances, in four categories, the Idols of the Tribe, of the Den, of the Market-place, of the Theatre. Under the first he warns us against those errors and prejudices which are common to the whole human race, the tribe to which we all belong; the idols of the Den are those which arise from the particular circumstances of the individual, as his country, his age, his religion, his profession, or his personal character, the errors of the Market-place are the result of the universal habit of using terms the meaning of which we have either not distinctly agreed on, or which we do not clearly understand. These terms are used in the interchange of thought, as money is passed from hand to hand in the market, and we accept and transfer to others coins whose real value we have not taken the trouble to test. The idols of the Theatre are the errors arising from false systems of philosophy, which dress up conceptions in unreal disguises, like comedians upon the stage. We may compare the precautions of the older logic to that of a physician who should direct his efforts to the getting rid of the external efflorescence of a disorder, and should think his duty performed when he had purified the skin, though perhaps at the cost of driving in the disease and rendering it doubly dangerous. Bacon, like the more enlightened practitioner, sought out the deep-seated constitutional source of the malady, it is to that that he addresses his treatment, certain that when the internal cause is removed, the symptoms will vanish of themselves.

§ 11 Of the Third Book Bacon has given only a specimen, intended to show the method to be adopted in collecting and classifying facts and experiments, for in a careful examination of facts and experiments consists the whole essence of his induction, and in it are concealed the future destinies of human knowledge and power. Bacon contributed to this portion of the work a History of the Winds, of Life and Death, written in Latin, and a collection of experiments in Physics, or, as he calls it, Natural History, in English. This portion of the work is alone sufficient to show how small are Bacon's claims or pretensions to the character of a discoverer in any branch of natural science, and how completely he was under the influence of the errors of his day, but at the same time it proves the innate merit of his method, and the power of that mind which could legislate for the whole realm of knowledge, and for sciences yet unborn. To the English fragment he gives the title of Silva Silvarum, i. e. a collection of materials

The Fourth Book, Scala Intellectus, of which Bacon has given but a brief abstract, was intended to show the gradual march to be followed by induction, in ascending from the fact perceptible to the senses to principles which were to become more and more general as we advance, and the author's object was to warn against the danger of leaping abruptly over the intermediate steps of the investigation. Of the Fifth Book he wrote only a preface, and the Sixth was never commenced.

§ 12 Of the soundness and the fertility of Bacon's method of investigation, the best proof will be a simple and practical one: we have only to compare the progress made by humanity in all the useful arts during the two centuries and a half since induction has been generally employed in all branches of science, with the progress made during the twenty centuries which elapsed between Aristotle and the age of Bacon. It is no exaggeration to say that in the shorter interval that progress has been ten times greater than in the longer. That this progress is in any degree attributable to any superiority of the human intellect in modern times, is a supposition too extravagant to deserve a moment's attention. Never did humanity produce intellects more vast, more penetrating, and more active, I will not say than Aristotle himself, but than the series of great men who wasted their powers in abstract questions—which never could be solved, or in the sterile subtleties of scholastic disputation. We may remark, too, as a strong confirmation of the truth of what we are saying, that in those sciences which are independent of experiment, and proceed by the efforts of reasoning and contemplation alone—as theology, for instance, or pure geometry—the ancients were fully as far advanced as we are at this moment. The glory of Bacon is founded upon a union of speculative power with practical utility which were never so combined before. He neglected nothing as too small, despised nothing as too low, by which our happiness could be augmented, in him above all were combined boldness and prudence, the intensest enthusiasm, and the plainest common sense. He could foresee triumphs over nature far surpassing the wildest dreams of imagination, and at the same time warn posterity against the most trifling consequences that would proceed from a neglect of his rules. It is probable that Bacon generally wrote the first sketch of his works in English, but afterwards caused them to be translated into Latin, which was at that time the language of science, and even of diplomacy. He is reported to have employed the services of many young men of learning as secretaries and translators among these the most remarkable is Hobbes, afterwards so celebrated as the author of the Leviathan. The style in which the Latin books of the Instauratio were given to the world, though certainly not a model of classical purity, is weighty, vigorous, and picturesque.

§ 13 Bacon's English writings are very numerous, among them unquestionably the most important is the little volume entitled Essays, the first edition of which he published in 1597, and which was several times reprinted, with additions, the last in 1625. These are short papers on an immense variety of subjects, from grave questions of morals and policy down to the arts of amusement and the most trifling accomplishments, and in them appears, in a manner more appreciable to ordinary intellects than in his elaborate philosophical works, the wonderful union of depth and variety which characterises Bacon. The intellectual activity they display is literally portentous, the immense multiplicity and aptness of unexpected illustration is only equalled by the originality with which Bacon manages to treat the most worn-out and commonplace subject, such, for instance, as friendship or gardening. No author was ever so concise as Bacon, and in his mode of writing there is that remarkable quality which gives to the style of Shakspeare such a strongly-marked individuality, that is, a combination of the intellectual and imaginative, the closest reasoning in the boldest metaphor, the condensed brilliancy of an illustration identified with the development of thought. It is this that renders both the dramatist and the philosopher at once the richest and the most concise of writers. Many of Bacon's essays, as that immutable one on Studies, are absolutely oppressive from the power of thought compressed into the smallest possible compass. Bacon wrote also an Essay on the Wisdom of the Ancients, in which he endeavoured to explain the political and moral truths concealed in the mythology of the classical ages, and in this work he exhibits an ingenuity which Macaulay justly describes as almost morbid. An unfinished romance, The New Atlantis, which was intended to embody the fulfilment of his own dreams of a philosophical millennium, a History of Henry VII, and a vast number of state-papers, judicial decisions, and other professional writings. All these are marked by the same vigorous, weighty, and somewhat ornamented style which is to be found in the Instauratio, and are among the finest specimens of the English language at its period of highest majesty and perfection.

§ 14 In every nation there may be found a small number of writers who, in their life, in the objects of their studies, and in the form and manner of their productions, bear a peculiar stamp of eccentricity. No country has been more prolific in such exceptional individualities than England, and no age than the sixteenth century. There cannot be a more striking example of this small but curious class than old ROBERT BURTON (1576-1640), whose life and writings are equally odd His principal-work, the Anatomy of Melancholy which purported to be written by "Democritus, junior," is a strange combination of the most extensive and out-of-the-way reading-with just observation and a peculiar kind of grave saturnine humour The object of the writer was to give a complete monography of Melancholy, and to point out its causes, its symptoms, its treatment, and its cure: but the descriptions given of the various phases of the disease are written in so curious and pedantic a style, accompanied with such an infinity of quaint observation, and illustrated by such a mass of quotations from a crowd of authors, principally the medical writers of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, of whom not one reader in a thousand in the present day has ever heard, that the Anatomy possesses a charm which no one can resist who has once fallen under its fascination The enormous amount of curious quotation with which Burton has incrustated every paragraph and almost every line of his work has rendered him the favourite study of those who wish to appear learned at a small expense, and his pages have served as a quarry from which a multitude of authors have borrowed, and often without acknowledgment, much of their materials, as the great Roman feudal families plundered the Coliseum to construct their frowning fortress-palaces The greater part of Burton's laborious life was passed in the University of Oxford, where he died, not without suspicion of having hastened his own end, in order that it might exactly correspond with the astrological predictions which he is said, being a firm believer in that science, to have drawn from his own horoscope He is related to have been himself a victim to that melancholy which he has so minutely described, and his tomb bears the astrological scheme of his own nativity, and an inscription eminently characteristic of the man "Hic jacet Democritus, junior, cui vitam dedit et mortem Melancholia."

Our notice of the prose-writers of this remarkable period would be incomplete without some mention of LORD HERBERT OF CHERRBURY (1581-1633), who was remarkable as a theologian and also as an historian. He was a man of great learning and rare dignity of personal character, and was employed in an embassy to Paris in 1616. There he first published his principal work, the treatise De Veritate, an elaborate pleading in favour of deism, of which Herbert was one of the earliest partisans in England. He also left a History of Henry VIII, not published until after his death, and which is certainly a valuable monument of grave and vigorous prose, though the historical merit of the work is diminished by the author's strong partiality in favour of the character of the king Though maintaining the doctrines of a freethinker, Herbert gives indications of an intensely enthusiastic religious mysticism, and there is proof of his having imagined himself on more than one occasion the object of miraculous communications by which the Deity confirmed the doctrines maintained in his books

— § 15 — But in force of demonstration, and clearness and precision of language, none of the English metaphysicians have surpassed THOMAS HOBBS (1588-1679), who, however, more properly belongs to a later period. Hobbes was a man of extraordinary mental activity, equally remarkable, during the whole of a long literary career, for the power as for the variety of his philosophical speculations. The theories of Hobbes exerted an incalculable influence on the opinions, not only of English, but also of Continental thinkers, for nearly a century, and though that influence has since been much weakened by the errors and sophistries mingled in many of this great writer's works, in some important and arduous branches of abstract speculation, as for example in the great question respecting Free Will and Necessity, it is doubtful whether any later investigations have thrown any new light upon the principles established by him. He was born at Malmesbury in Wiltshire in 1588, was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and subsequently travelled abroad as private tutor to the Earl of Devonshire. On his return he became intimate with the most distinguished men of his day, through the influence of his patron the Earl of Devonshire. His first literary work, the translation of Thucydides, was published in the third year of the reign of Charles I, in 1628. He subsequently passed several years in Paris and Italy, and he was in constant communication with the most illustrious minds among his contemporaries, as with Descartes for example, with Galileo, and with Harvey. Though of extreme boldness in speculation, Hobbes was an advocate for high monarchical or rather despotic principles in government. His theory being that human nature was essentially ferocious and corrupt, he concluded that the iron restraint of arbitrary power could alone suffice to bridle its passions. This theory necessarily flowed from the fundamental proposition of Hobbes's moral system, viz that the primum mobile of all human actions is selfish interest. Attributing all our actions to intellectual calculation, and thus either entirely ignoring or not allowing sufficient influence to the moral elements and the affections, which play at least an equal part in the drama of life, Hobbes fell into a narrow and one-sided view of our motives which makes his theory only half true. He was a man whose reading, though not extensive, was singularly profound and in the various branches of science and literature which he cultivated we see that clearness of view and vigour of comprehension which is found in men of few books. The most celebrated work of this great thinker was the Leviathan (published in 1651), an argument in favour of monarchical government. The reasonings, however, will apply with equal force to the justification of despotism. But though the Leviathan is the best known of his works, the Treatise on Human Nature, and the Letter on Liberty and Necessity, are incontestably those in which the closeness of his logic and the purity and clearness of his style are most visible, and the correctness of his deductions least mingled with error. Two purely political treatises, the Elementa Philosophica de Cive, and De Corpore Politico,* are remarkable for the cogency of the arguments, though many of the results at which the author struggles to arrive are now no longer considered deducible from the premises. In the latter portion of his life Hobbes entered with great ardour upon the study of pure mathematics, and engaged in very vehement controversies with Wallis and others respecting the quadrature of the circle and other questions in which novices in those sciences are apt to be led away by the enthusiasm of imaginary discoveries. Hobbes has often been erroneously confounded with the enemies of religion. This has arisen from a misconception of the nature of his doctrines, which are indeed materialistic, but neither atheistic nor professedly in antagonism to the Christian theology. And, although the ethical principles of Hobbes are in his case partly the offspring of a cold and timorous moral disposition, the selfish theory of human actions, when divested of those limitations which confine the motive of self to those low and shortsighted views of interest with which it is generally associated, no more necessitates an immoral line of argument than any other system for clearing up the mysteries of our moral nature †

* These two treatises were published before the Leviathan, and were incorporated in the latter work.

† It may also be mentioned that Hobbes wrote, in 1672, at the age of 84, a curious Latin poem on his own life, and he also published in 1675, at the age of 87, a translation in verse of the Iliad and Odyssey. His Behemoth, or a History of the Civil Wars from 1640 to 1660, appeared in 1680, a few months after his death.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

MINOR PROSE WRITERS IN THE REIGNS OF ELIZABETH AND JAMES I.

WEBSTER PUTTENHAM, published in 1586 the Art of English Poetrie, a writer whom Mr Hallam considers the first who wrote a well measured prose.

RICHARD GRAPTON, a printer in the reigns of Henry VIII. and the three following sovereigns, is one of the early chroniclers. He wrote in prison, into which he was thrown for printing the proclamation of the succession of Lady Jane Grey to the throne, An Abbridgement of the Chronicles of England, published in 1562.

WILLIAM CECIL, LORD BURLEIGH (d. 1598), the celebrated statesman in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, wrote Precepts or, Directions for the well Ordering and Carriage of a Man's Life, addressed to his son Robert Cecil.

JOHN LELY, the author of the prose romance of Euphues, and GREENLAND and ASH, the authors of several pamphlets in prose are mentioned under the dramatists (p 129, 130)

GEORGE BUCHANAN (1506 1582), celebrated as an elegant Latin writer, was born at Killearn, in the county of Stirling, and was educated at the Universities of St. Andrews and Paris. He was appointed by the Earl of Murray tutor to the young King James VI. His chief work is a History of Scotland, which was published in 1582, under the title of Rerum Scotticarum Historia. His Latin version of the Psalms has been already mentioned (p. 88). He wrote in the Scottish dialect a work called Chamaleon to satirize Secretary Maitland of Lethington.

GEORGE SANDYS (1577-1643), known as a traveller and as a poet, was the youngest son of the Archbishop of York. His Travels in the East were very popular, and were repeatedly republished in the seventeenth century. His chief poetical production was a translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses.

WILLIAM LETHGOW (d. 1640), a native of Scotland, also celebrated as a traveller. He travelled nineteen years on foot in Europe, Asia, and Africa. The first edition of his Travels was published in 1614.

SIR JOHN HAYWARD (d. 1627), an historian, published in 1599 The First Part of the Life and Reign of Henry IV., dedicated to the Earl of Essex, a work which gave such offence to the queen that the author was thrown into prison. Hayward was subsequently patronised and knighted by James I. In 1613 he published The Lives of the three Norman Kings of England, William I., William II and Henry I., dedicated to Charles, Prince of Wales. He likewise wrote The Life and Reign of King Edward VI., with the beginning of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, which was published in 1630 after his death.

RICHARD KNOLLES (d. 1610), master of the free school at Sandwich, in Kent, published in 1610 a History of the Turks. Johnson in a paper in the Rambler, gives Knolles the superiority over all English historians. "He has displayed all the excellencies that narrative can admit. His style, though somewhat obscured by time and vitiated by false wit, is pure, nervous, elevated and clear. Nothing could have sunk this author into obscurity but the remoteness and barbarity of the people he relates." Mr Hallam thinks that Johnson has not too highly extolled Knolles's style and power of narration.

SAMUEL DANIEL, the poet, of whom we have already spoken (p 79), published in 1618 a History of England, from the Conquest to the Reign of Edward III. Mr Hallam remarks that, "this work is deserving of some attention on account of its language. It is written with a freedom from all stiffness, and a purity of style, which hardly any other work of so early a date exhibits. These qualities are indeed so remarkable that it would require a good deal of critical observation to distinguish it even from writings of the reign of Anne and where it differs from them (I speak only of the secondary class of works, which have not much individuality of manner), it is by a more select idiom, and by an absence of the Gallicism or vulgarity which are often found in that age. It is true that the merits of Daniel are chiefly negative, he is never pedantic, or antithetical, or low, as his contemporaries were apt to be, but his periods are ill constructed, he has little vigour or elegance, and it is only by observing how much pains he must have taken to reject phrases which were growing obsolete that we give him credit for having done more than follow the common stream of easy writing. A slight tinge of archaism and a certain majesty of expression, relatively to colloquial usage, were thought by Bacon and Raleigh congenial to an elevated style, but Daniel, a gentleman of the king's household, wrote as the court spoke, and his facility would be pleasing if his sentences had a less negligent structure. As an historian he has recourse only to common authorities, but his narration is finet and perspicuous, with a regular vein of good sense, more the characteristic of his mind, both in verse and prose, than very commanding vigour."

WILLIAM CAMDEN (1551 1623) the antiquary and historian, was head master of Westminster School, and endowed at Oxford the chair of history, which bears his name. His most celebrated work is in Latin, entitled Britannia, first published in 1586, giving a topographical description of Great Britain from the earliest times. He also wrote in Latin an account of the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

SIR HENRY SPELMAN (1562 1641) also an eminent antiquary, published in Latin various works upon legal and ecclesiastical antiquities, of which one of the principal is a History of the English Councils.

CHAPTER VI.

THE DAWN OF THE DRAMA

§ 1 Origin of the Drama. Earliest religious spectacles, called Mysteries or Miracles § 2 Plays, called Moralities BISHOP BALE § 3 Interludes JOHN HEYWOOD § 4 Pageants Latin Plays § 5 Chronicle Plays Bale's King John First English tragedies The tragedy of Gorboduc Other early tragedies § 6 First English comedies. Ralph Royster Doyster Gammer Gurton's Needle § 7 Actors Theatres Scenery and properties of the stage § 8 Dramatic authors usually actors § 9 Early English playwrights LYL, PEELE. KYD NASH GREENE LODGE § 10 CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE. § 11 Anonymous plays.

1. As the Drama is one of the most splendid and perhaps the most intensely national department of our literature, so its origin and development were peculiar, and totally different from anything to be found in the history of other European countries. It is only Spain and England among all the modern civilised nations, that possess a theatrical literature independent in its origin, characteristic in its form, and reflecting faithfully the features, moral, social, and intellectual, of the people among which it arose: and the nationality of Spain being strongly distinguished from that of England, it is natural that the Spanish drama should possess a character which, though like that of Britain, strongly romantic, should be very dissimilar in its type. It is possible to trace the first dim dawning of our national stage to a very remote period, to a period indeed not very far removed from the era of the Norman Conquest: for the custom of representing, in a rude dramatic form, legends of the lives of the Saints and striking episodes of Bible History seems to have been introduced from France, and to have been employed by the clergy as a means of communicating religious instruction to the rude population of the twelfth century. There exists the record of one of these religious spectacles, which received the name of Mysteries or Miracles, from the sacred nature of their subject and personages, having been represented in the Convent of Dunstable in 1119. It was called the Play of St. Catherine, and in all probability consisted of a rude dramatised picture of the miracles and martyrdom of that saint, performed on the festival which commemorated her death. In an age when the great mass of the laity, from the highest to the lowest, were in a state of extreme ignorance, and when the little learning that then existed was exclusively in the hands of ecclesiastics, it was quite natural that these, who were then the governing class, should employ so obvious an expedient for communicating some elementary religious instruction to the people, and by gratifying the curiosity of their rude hearers, extend and strengthen the influence of the Church. It is known that this play of St Catherine was performed in France, which is a sufficient proof that the custom of these representations was imported from abroad, but the great and rapid extension of these performances soon showed how well this mode of religious amusement accorded with the tastes and requirements of the times. Mysteries and Miracle-plays abound in the early literature of all the Catholic countries of Europe, Spain, Germany, France, Italy possess examples so abundant that a considerable library might be formed of these barbarous pieces and the habit of seeing them represented in public has certainly left very perceptible traces in mediæval literature and art. For example, the title, the subject, and the arrangement of Dante's immortal poem is closely connected with dramatic representations of Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise, which formed a common feature among the festivities of Florence. The Divine Comedy, the very name of which shows its relation to some theatrical performance, is nothing but a Miracle in a narrative form. These plays were composed and acted by monks, the cathedral was transformed for the nonce into a theatre, the stage was a species of graduated platform in three divisions rising one over the other, and placed near or over the altar, and the costumes were furnished by the splendid contents of the vestry of the church. It will appear natural enough, that on any of the high religious festivals, on the anniversary of any important religious personage or event, that personage or event should be represented in a visible form, with such details as either Scripture, legend, or the imagination of the author could supply. The childish and straightforward art of these old monkish dramatists felt no repugnance in following with strict literal accuracy every circumstance of the original narrative which they dramatised, and the simple faith of the ^{know} ^{and} ^{for} ^{his} ^{He} ^{has} ^{no} ^{impropriety} in the introduction of the most excellencies that narrative, the persons of the Trinity, angels, devils, saints style though somewhat ^{three} ^{platforms} into which the stage was divided and vitiated by false wit, is Earth, and Hell, and the dramatis personæ elevated and clear. Nothing sunk this author into obscurity that part of the stage which corresponded remoteness and barbarity of the ^{poes} absolutely necessary that some comic ^{relates}. Mr Hallam thinks that ^{and} to enliven the graver scenes, particularly ^{subject} of the Creation and the fall of Man, which occupied six days in the performance. Besides, the rude audience would have absolutely required some farcical or amusing episode. This comic element was easily found by representing the wicked personages, whether human or spiritual, of the drama as placed in ludicrous situations, or surrounded by ludicrous accompaniments. thus the Devil generally played the part of the clown or jester, and was exhibited in a light half terrific and half farcical. Nor were they contented with such drolleries as could be extracted from the grotesque gambols and often baffled machinations of Satan and his imps, or with the mixture of merriment and horror inspired by horns, and tails, and hairy howling mouths. the authors of these pieces introduced human buffoons, and the modern puppet-play of Punch, with his struggles with the Devil, is unquestionably a direct tradition handed down from these ancient miracles in which the Evil One was alternately the conqueror and the victim of the Buffoon, Jester, or Vice, as he was called.

Some idea may be formed of these ancient religious dramas from the titles of some of them which have been preserved, for the general reader is scarce likely to consult such of them as have been printed, though curious monuments of the faith and art of long-vanished ages. The Creation of the World, the Fall of Man, the story of Cain and Abel, the Crucifixion of Our Lord, the Massacre of the Innocents, the Deluge, besides an infinite multitude of subjects taken from the lives and miracles of the saints, such were the materials of these simple dramas. They are generally written in mixed prose and verse, and though abounding in anachronisms and absurdities both of character and dialogue, they sometimes contain passages of simple and natural pathos, and sometimes scenes which must have affected the spectators with intense awe and reverence. In an English mystery on the subject of the Deluge, a comic scene is produced by the refusal of Noah's wife to enter the Ark, and by the beating which justly terminates her resistance and scolding. But, on the other hand, a mystery on the subject of the Sacrifice of Isaac contains a dialogue of much pathos and beauty between Abraham and his son, and the whole action of the Mystery of the Holy Sacrament was capable of producing a strong impression in an age of childlike, ardent faith. These representations were got up with all the magnificence attainable, and every expedient was employed to heighten the illusion of the scene. Thus there is a tradition of a condemned criminal having been really crucified on the stage in a representation of the Passion of Our Lord, in the character of the Impenitent Thief. Very evident traces of the universality of these religious dramas may be found in the early works of sculpture and painting throughout Catholic Europe. Thus the practice of representing the Deity in the costume and ornaments of a Pope or a Bishop, which appears to us an absurdity or an irreverence, arose from such a personage being generally represented, on the rude stage of the miracle-play, in a dress which was then associated with ideas of the highest reverence and the innumerable anecdotes and apologues representing evil spirits as baffled and defeated by a very moderate amount of cunning and dexterity may easily have been generated by that peculiarity of Mediæval Christianity which pictures the wicked spirits, not as terrible and awful beings, but as mischievous goblins whose power was annihilated at the foundation of our faith.

§ 2 To trace the gradual changes which establish the affiliation of the regular drama of modern times to the early Mysteries of the twelfth century, is nothing else but to point out the steps by which the dramatic art, from an exclusively religious character acquired more and more of a lay or worldly spirit in its subjects and its personages. The Mysteries, once the only form of dramatic representation, continued to be popular from the eleventh to the end of the fourteenth century, nay, in some pastoral and remote corners of Europe, where the primitive faith glows in all its ancient ardour, and where the manners of the people have been little modified by contact with foreign civilisation, something very similar to the mysteries may be still seen even in the present day. In the retired valleys of Catholic Switzerland, in the Tyrol, and in some little-visited districts of Germany, the peasants still annually perform dramatic spectacles representing episodes in the life of Christ. The first stage in the process of laicising the drama was the substitution for the Miracle-play of another kind of representation, entitled a Morality. This species of entertainment seems to have been popular from about the beginning of the fifteenth century, and gradually supplanted the exclusively religious Mystery. It is quite evident that the composition as well as the representation of these pieces was far less exclusively in the hands of ecclesiastics, who thus began to lose that influence over the popular mind which they derived from their monopoly of knowledge. Perhaps, however, it would be a more legitimate explanation of this change to say, that the spread of civilisation among the laity, and the hostility which was gradually but rapidly undermining the foundations of Catholicism in England had contributed to put an end to that monopoly, for many of our early Moralities, though the production of Churchmen, as in the case of Bishop Bale, were the production of Churchmen strongly tainted with the unorthodox opinions of the early reformers. The subjects of these dramas, instead of being purely religious, were moral, as their name implies, and the ethical lessons were conveyed by an action and dramatis personæ of an abstract or allegorical kind. Thus, instead of the Deity and his angels, the Saints, the Patriarchs, and the characters of the Old and New Testament, the persons who figure in the Moralities are Every-Man—a general type or expression of humanity—Lusty Juventus—who represents the follies and weaknesses of youth—Good Counsel, Repentance, Gluttony, Pride, Avarice, and the like. The action was in general exceedingly simple, and the tone grave and doctrinal, though of course the same necessity existed as before for the introduction of comic scenes. The Devil was far too popular and useful a personage to be suppressed, so his battles and scoldings with the Vice, or Clown, were still retained to furnish forth “a fit of mirth.” Our readers may form some idea of the general character of these pieces by the analysis of one, entitled The Cradle of Security, the outline of which has been preserved in the narrative of an old man who had formed one of the audience in his early childhood. It was intended as a lesson to careless and sensual sovereigns. The principal personage is a King, who neglecting his high duties and plunged in voluptuous pleasures, is put to sleep in a cradle, to which he is bound by golden chains held by four beautiful ladies, who sing as they rock the cradle. Suddenly the courtiers are all dispersed by a terrible knock at the door, and the king, awaking, finds himself in the custody of two stern and tremendous figures, sent from God to punish his voluptuousness and vice. In a similar way the action of the Morality Lusty Juventus contains a vivid and even humorous picture of the extravagance and debauchery of a young heir, surrounded by companions, the Virtues and the Vices, some of whom endeavour in vain to restrain his passions, while others flatter his depraved inclinations. This piece also ends with a demonstration of the inevitable misery and punishment which follow a departure from the path of virtue and religion. It is impossible to draw any strong line of demarcation, either chronological or critical, between the Mystery and Morality. The one species imperceptibly melts into the other, though the general points of distinction are clear and obvious enough. The morality also had a strong tendency to partake of the character of the court masque, in which the Elements, the Virtues, the Vices, or the various reigns of nature were introduced either to convey some physical or philosophical instruction in the guise of allegory, or to compliment a king or great personage on a festival occasion. Of this class is Skelton’s masque, to which I have alluded in a former chapter, and to which he gave the title of Magnificence. A very industrious writer of these Moralities was BISHOP BALE (1495-1563), who will also be mentioned preserly (p 118) as one of the founders of our national drama.

§ 3 Springing from the Moralities, and bearing some genera resemblance to them, though exhibiting a still nearer approach to the regular drama, are the Interludes, a class of compositions in dialogue much shorter in extent and more merry and farcical in subject, which were exceedingly fashionable about the time when the great controversy was raging between the Catholic church and the Reformed religion in England. A prolific author of these grotesque and merry pieces was JOHN HEYWOOD, a man of learning and accomplishment but who seems to have performed the duties of a sort of jester at the court of Henry VIII. Heywood was an ardent Catholic, and the stage at that time was used by both religious parties to throw odium and ridicule upon the doctrines of their opponents, the Catholics delighting to bring forward Luther, Catherine de Bora and the principal figures among the reformers in a light at once detestable and ridiculous, and the Protestants returning the compliment by showing up the corruptions and vices of the Pope and the hierarchy. The Interludes being short, were, it is supposed, performed either in the entr'actes of the longer and more solemn Moralities, or represented on temporary stages between the intervals of the interminable banquets and festivities of those days.

§ 4. In the preceding rapid sketch of the dramatic amusements of our ancestors, I have endeavoured to give a general idea of these entertainments in their complete and normal form, that is when the action selected for the subject of the piece was illustrated with dialogue, and the exhibitor addressed himself to the ears as well as to the eyes of his audience. It must not be forgotten that both the subjects of the Mysteries and those of the Moralities were sometimes exhibited in dumb show. A scene of Holy Writ or some event in the life of a saint was represented in a kind of tableau vivant by disguised and costumed personages, and this representation was often placed on a sort of wheeled platform and exhibited continually during those long processions which formed the principal feature of the festivities of ancient times. These tableaux vivants were also introduced into the great halls during the elaborate banquets which were the triumphs of ancient magnificence and thus this species of entertainment is inseparably connected with those pageants so often employed to gratify the vanity of citizens, or to compliment an illustrious visitor. These pageants, whether simply consisting of the exhibition, on some lofty platform, in the porch or churchyard of a cathedral, in the Town Hall or over the city gate, of a number of figures suitably dressed, or accompanying their action with poetical declamation and music, necessarily partook in all the changes of taste which characterised the age. The Prophets and Saints who welcomed the royal stranger in the thirteenth century with barbarous Latin hymns, were gradually supplanted by the Virtues and allegorical rical qualities, and those in their turn, when the Renaissance had disseminated a universal passion for classical imagery, made way for the Cupids, the Muses, and other classical personages whose influence has continued almost to the literature of our own time. Such spectacles as I have just been alluding to, which were so common that the chronicles of every European nation are filled with records of them, were of course frequently exhibited at the Universities but in the hands of these bodies the shows naturally acquired a more learned character than they had elsewhere. It was almost universal in those times that the students should employ Latin on all official occasions. This was necessary, partly from the multitude of nations composing the body of the students, and who required some common language which they could all understand. Latin, therefore, was by a thousand different laws and regulations obligatory, and this occurred not only in the Universities, but also in many conventual and monastic societies. It was therefore natural that the public amusements of the University should partake of the same character. A large number of pieces, generally written upon the models of Terence and Seneca, were produced and represented at this time. In the great outbreak of revolt against the authority of scholasticism which preceded the Reformation, the return to classical models in dramatic composition was general, and Reuchlin boasted that he was the first to furnish the youth of Germany with comedies bearing some similarity to the masterpieces of Terence. The times of Elizabeth and James were peculiarly fertile in Latin dramas composed at the Universities, and these sovereigns, the first of whom was remarkably learned in an age of general diffusion of classical studies, while in the second erudition had degenerated into pedantry, were entertained by the students of Oxford and Cambridge with Latin plays.

§ 5 We have now traced the progress of the Dramatic art from its first rude infancy in England, and have seen how every step of that advance removed it farther and farther from a purely religious, and brought it closer and closer to a profane character. The last step of the progress was the creation of what we now understand under the term dramatic, viz, the scenic representation, by means of the action and dialogue of human personages, of some event of history or social life. As in the first appearance of this, the most perfect form which the art could attain, the influence of the great models of ancient literature must have been very powerful, dramatic compositions class themselves, by the very nature of the case, into the two great categories of Tragedy and Comedy, and even borrow from the classical models details of an unessential kind, as for example the use of the Chorus, which originally consisting of a numerous body of performers, was gradually reduced, though its Seneca enjoyed a most surprising reputation at the revival of letters. The dialogue of Gorboduc is in blank verse,* which is regular and carefully constructed, but it is totally destitute of variety of pause, and consequently is a most insufficient vehicle for dramatic dialogue. The sentence almost invariably terminates with the line, and the effect of the whole is insupportably formal and heavy, for no weight and depth of moral and political apophthegm, with which the work abounds, can compensate for the total want of life, of sentiment, and passion. Another work of a similar character is Damon and Pythias, acted before the Queen at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1566. This play, which is in rhyme, is a mixture of tragedy and comedy. Its author was RICHARD EDWARDS, the compiler of the miscellany called The Paradise of Dainty Devices (see p. 86). He also wrote Palamon and Arcite, the beautiful story so imitatively treated by Chaucer in The Knight's Tale and afterwards in Beaumont and Fletcher's romantic play The Two Noble Kinsmen. In 1578 was acted Promos and Cassandra, by GEORGE WHETSTONE, chiefly curious as having furnished the subject of Shakspeare's Measure for Measure. All these plays are marked by a general similarity of style and treatment, and belong to about the same period.

§ 6 In the department of Comedy the first English works which made their appearance very little anterior to the above pieces, offer a most striking contrast in their tone and treatment. It would almost seem as if the national genius, destined to stand unrivalled in the peculiar vein of humour, was to prove that while in tragic and sublime delineations it might encounter, not indeed superiors, but rivals,—in the grotesque, the odd, the laughable, it was to stand alone. The earliest comedy in the language was Ralph Roister Doister, written before the year 1553 by NICHOLAS UDALL (d. 1556), who for nine years executed the duties of Master of Eton College. This was followed, probably several years later, by Gammer Gurton's Needle, printed in 1575, composed by JOHN STIL, afterwards Bishop of Bath and Wells, and previously Master of St. John's and Trinity Colleges in Cambridge. This piece was probably acted by the students of the society over which the author presided, and was long considered to have been the earliest regular comedy in the English language, but it was afterwards established that the work of Udall preceded it by a short interval. Both these works are highly curious and interesting, not only as being the oldest specimens of the class of literature to which they belong, but in some measure from their intrinsic merit. There can be no question that the former comedy is far superior to the second it is altogether of a higher order, both in conception and execution. The action takes place in London, and the principal characters are a rich and pretty widow, her lover, and the friends and servants of her and her suitor, the foolish personage who gives the title to the play. This ridiculous pretender to gaiety and love, a young heir just put into possession of his fortune, is attended by one Merrygreek, a flatterer, who pretends to be his friend, and who leads his dupe into all sorts of absurd and humiliating scrapes, and the piece ends with the return of the favoured lover from a voyage which he had undertaken in a momentary pique. The manners represented are those of the middle class of the period, and the picture given of London citizen life in the middle of the sixteenth century is curious, animated, and natural. The language is lively, and the dialogue is carried on in a sort of loose doggerel rhyme, very well adapted to represent comic conversation. In general the intrigue of this drama is deserving of approbation, the plot is well imagined, and the reader's curiosity well kept alive. Gammer Gurton's Needle is a composition of a much lower and more farcical order. The scene is laid in the humblest rustic life, and all the dramatis personæ belong to the uneducated class. The principal action of the comedy is the sudden loss of a needle with which Gammer (Good Mother) Gurton has been mending the inexpressibles of her man Hodge, a loss comparatively serious, when needles were rare and costly. The whole intrigue consists in the search instituted after this unfortunate little implement, which is at last discovered by Hodge himself, on suddenly sitting down, sticking in the garment which Gammer Gurton had been repairing.

* Blank verse was first introduced by Lord Surrey in his translation of the Æneid (see p. 64). It was next used by Grimoald (see p. 68), who according to Warton, gave it "now strength, elegance, and modulation." Sackville was the third writer who employed it.

A comparison between these early comedies, and Gammer Gurton in particular, and that curious and interesting piece Maistre Pierre Pathelin, which is regarded as the first specimen of the French comic stage, would not be uninteresting. In both the transition from the sottie or farce to regular comedy is plainly perceptible, and it must be confessed that in the humorous delineation of character, as well as in probability and variety of incident, the French piece has decidedly the advantage. The form of the dialogue, being in both cases a sort of easy doggerel verse, little removed from the real language of the classes represented, has great similarity, though the French comedy is, as far as its diction is concerned, far more archaic and difficult to a modern French reader than the English of Gammer Gurton to an English one. This indeed may be generally remarked, that our language has undergone less radical changes in the space of time which has elapsed from the first appearance of literary productions among us than any of the other cultivated dialects of Europe.

§ 7 It will be inferred from what has been said respecting the custom of acting plays at Court, in the mansions of great lords, in the Universities, and in the Inns of Law that regular public theatres were not yet in existence. The actors were to a certain degree amateurs, and were frequently literally the domestics of the sovereign and the nobles, wearing their badges and liveries, and protected by their patronage. The line of demarcation between musical performers, singers, jugglers, tumblers, and actors, was for a long period very faintly traced. The Court plays were frequently represented by the children of the royal chapel, and placed, as the dramatic profession in general was for a long time, under the peculiar supervision of the Office of the Revels, which was obliged also to exercise the duties of a dramatic censor. These bodies of actors, singers, tumblers, &c, were frequently in the habit of wandering about the country, performing wherever they could find an audience, sometimes in the mansions of rural grandees, sometimes in the town-halls of provincial municipalities, sometimes in the courtyards of inns. Protected by the letters-patent and the livery of their master against the severe laws which qualified strollers as vagabonds, they generally began their proceedings by begging the countenance and protection of the authorities, and the accounts of the ancient municipal bodies, and the household registers of the great families of former times, abound in entries of permissions given to such strolling parties of actors, tumblers, and musicians, and of sums granted to them in recompense of their exertions. It is curious to remark that the amount of such sums seems to have been calculated less in reference to the talent displayed in the representation, than to the degree of respect which the grantors wished to show to the patron under whose protection the troop happened to be. This state of things, however, had existed long before, for in the accounts of the ancient monasteries we frequently meet with entries of gratuities given, not only to travelling preachers from other religious bodies, but even to minstrels, jugglers, and other professors of the arts of entertainment. Nothing was more easy than to transform the ancient hall of a college, palace, or nobleman's mansion into a theatre sufficiently convenient in the then primitive state of dramatic representation. The dais or elevated platform at the upper extremity was a stage ready-made, it was only necessary to hang up a curtain, and to establish a few screens covered with tapestry, to produce a scene sufficient for the purpose. When the performance took place in an inn, which was very common, the stage was established on a platform in the centre of the yard, the lower classes of spectators stood upon the ground in front of it, which custom is preserved in the designation parterre, still given by the French to the pit. The latter denomination is a record of the circumstance that in England theatrical representations after took place in cockpits. Indeed there at one time existed in London a theatre called the Cockpit, from the circumstance of its having been originally an arena for that sport. The ancient inns, as may be seen by many specimens still in existence, were built round an open courtyard, and along each story internally ran an open gallery, upon which opened the doors and windows of the small chambers occupied by the guests. In order to witness the performance the inmates had only to come out into the gallery in front of their rooms, and the convenience of this arrangement unquestionably suggested the principal features of construction when buildings were first specifically destined for scenic performances. The galleries of the old inns were the prototypes of the circles of boxes in our modern theatres.

But the taste for dramatic entertainments grew rapidly more general and ardent, and in the course of time, in many places, particularly in London, not only did special societies of professional actors begin to come into existence, but special edifices were constructed for their exhibitions. Indeed at one period it is supposed that London and its suburbs contained at least twelve different theatres, of various degrees of size and convenience. Of these the most celebrated was undoubtedly the Globe, for at that time each playhouse had its sign, and the company which performed in it were also the proprietors of a smaller house on the opposite, or London side of the Thames, called the Blackfriars, situated very nearly on the spot now occupied by the gigantic establishment of the 'Times' newspaper. The great majority of the London theatres were on the southern or Surrey bank of the Thames, in order to be out of the jurisdiction of the municipality of the City, which having been from a very early period strongly infected with the gloomy doctrines of Puritanism was violently opposed to theatrical entertainments, and carried on against the players and the playhouses a constant war, in which their opponents repelled the persecutions of authority with all the petulance of wit and caricature. Some of these theatres were cockpits or arenas for bull-baiting and bear-baiting, either transformed into regular playhouses, or alternately employed for theatrical and other spectacles; but the Globe, and probably others as well, were specifically erected for the purpose of the drama. They were all, however, very poor and squalid, as compared with the magnificent theatres of the present day, and retained in their form and arrangement many traces of the ancient model—the inn-yard. The building was octagon, and entirely uncovered, excepting over the stage, where a thatched roof protected the actors from the weather, and this thatched roof was, in 1613, the cause of the total destruction of the Globe, in consequence of the wadding of a chamber, or small cannon, lodging in it, fired during the representation of Shakspeare's Henry VIII. The boxes or rooms, as they were then styled, were of course arranged nearly as in the present day, but the musicians, instead of being placed, as now, in the orchestra, or space between the pit and the stage, were established in a lofty gallery over the scene

The most remarkable peculiarity of the ancient English theatres was the total absence of painted scenery, which in more recent times has been carried to such a height of artistic splendour and illusion. A few traverses, as they were called, or screens of cloth or tapestry, gave the actors the opportunity of making their exits and entrances, and in order to give the audience an idea of the place where the action was to be supposed, they employed the singularly primitive expedient of exhibiting a placard, bearing the name of Rome, Athens, London, or Florence, as the case might be. So exceedingly rude an expedient as this is the more singular as the English drama is remarkable for its frequent changes of scene. But though they were forced to content themselves with this very inartificial mode of indicating the place of the action, the details of the locality could be represented with a much more accurate imitation. Thus, if a bedroom were to be supposed, a bed was pushed forward on the stage, a table covered with bottles and tankards, and surrounded with benches, easily suggested a tavern, a gilded chair surmounted by a canopy, and called a state, gave the idea of a palace, an altar of a church, and the like. At the back of the stage was erected a permanent wooden construction, like a scaffold or a high wall, and this served for those innumerable incidents where one of the dramatis personæ is to overhear the others without being himself seen, and also represented an infinity of objects according to the requirements of the piece, such as the wall of a castle or besieged city, the outside of a house, as when a dialogue is to take place between one person at a window and another on the exterior. Thus in the admirable garden-scene of Romeo and Juliet, Juliet probably spoke either from the summit of this wall or from a window established in it, while Romeo stood on the ground outside. In the same way the "men of Angiers" spoke to the besieging English from the top of their wall, and the storming of Harfleur divided the action between Henry and his troops upon the stage and the defenders of the city upon the platform.

In those accessories to scenic illusion which in the language of the English stage are called properties, the old Elizabethan theatres were better provided than could have been expected, as may be seen from very curious lists of such articles which have accidentally descended to us from the ancient greenrooms. In point of costume very little attention was paid to chronological or national accuracy. The dramatis personæ of all ages and countries were in general habited in the dress of the period, this was fortunately a graceful, rich, and picturesque costume, and we may judge, from the innumerable philippics of divines and moralists against the luxury o' the actors, that a very considerable degree of splendour in theatrical dress was common. The employment of the contemporary costume in plays whose action was supposed to take place in Greece, Rome, or Persia, naturally led into gross anachronisms and absurdities, arming the assassins of Cæsar with Spanish rapiers, or furnishing Carthaginian senators with watches, but these anachronisms were not likely to strike in a very offensive manner the mixed and uncritical spectators of those times. It may indeed be said that the meagre material aids to the illusion of the scene which were then at the disposal of the dramatic author were in reality of the greatest service to the poetical and imaginative department of his art. Not being able to depend upon the scene-painter and the machinist, he was obliged to trust to his own resources, and to describe in words what could not be "oculis subjecta fideibus." It is to this circumstance that we owe those inimitable pictures of natural and artificial objects and scenery with which the dramas of this age are so prodigally adorned. Though the majority of the characters were clothed in the habit of the day, there were certain conventional attributes always associated with particular supernatural personages, such as angels, devils, ghosts, and so on. Thus "a robe for to goo invisibell" is one of the items in the lists of properties to which I have alluded above, and in all probability the spectral armour of the Ghost in Hamlet was to be found in the wardrobe of the ancient theatres. It appears that the dresses and properties belonged to persons who derived their livelihood from hiring these articles at a fixed price per night to the performers.

The curtain, that essential appendage to every theatre, is supposed to have opened perpendicularly in the middle, instead of being wound up and let down as at present, and besides this principal curtain there seem to have been others occasionally drawn so as to divide the stage into several apartments, and withdrawn to exhibit one of the characters as in a tent or closet.

The cost of admission to the theatres was small, and it was possible to secure the use of a private box or room, for it was then considered hardly proper for a lady to be present at the representations of the public theatres. It was certainly long before any of our sovereigns deigned to witness any of those performances. Whenever the monarch desired to see a play the actors were summoned to court, and the accounts of the chamberlain's office furnish abundant entries of the recompenses ordered to be distributed on such occasions among the performers. Several of the companies of actors were under the immediate patronage of the sovereign, of different members of the royal family and other great personages of the realm, they were bound to "exercise themselves industriously in the art and quality of stage-playing," in order to be always ready to furnish entertainment to their employer, and in return for these services they were protected against interlopers and rivals, and above all against the implacable hostility of the Puritanical municipality of London. It is perhaps to this circumstance that we may attribute the designation of Her Majesty's Servants, which our modern companies of actors still retain in their playbills, and the old custom of the actors at the end of the piece falling upon their knees and putting up a solemn prayer to Heaven in favour of the sovereign is perhaps commemorated in the words Vivat Regina, with which our modern playbills terminate. The usual hour of representation was anciently very early, in accordance with the habit of dining before midday, and the signal was given by the hoisting of a flag at the summit of the theatre, which remained floating during the whole performance.

The piece commenced with three flourishes of a trumpet, and at the third sounding, as it was called, the prologue was declaimed by a solemn personage whose regular costume was a long black velvet cloak. At the end of the piece, or occasionally perhaps between the acts, the clown or jester performed what was called a jig, a species of entertainment in which our ancestors seem to have delighted. This was a kind of comic ballad or declamation in doggerel verse, either really or professedly an improvisation of the moment, introducing any person or event which was exciting the ridicule of the day, and accompanied by the performer with tabor and pipe and with grotesque and farcical dancing. As the comic actors who performed the clowns and jesters, then indispensable personages in all pieces, tragic and comic, were allowed to introduce extemporary witacisms at their pleasure, they were probably a clever and inventive class, and the enormous popularity of several of them, as Tarlton, Kempe, and Armin, seems to prove that their drollery must have been intensely amusing.

During the representation of a deep tragedy the whole stage was sometimes hung with black, a very singular custom, to which innumerable allusions are made in our older pieces. On ordinary occasions the stage was strewn with rushes, as indeed were rooms generally in those days, and on these rushes, or on stools brought for the purpose, it was customary for the fine gentlemen to sit, amid the full business of the stage, displaying their splendid clothes, smoking clay-pipes, which was then the height of fashion, exchanging repartees and often coarse abuse with the audience before the curtain, and criticising in a loud voice the actors and the piece. In England, as in Spain, the companies of players have been generally, from time immemorial, private and independent associations. The property and profits of the theatre were divided into a number of shares, as in a joint-stock company, and the number of these shareholders being limited, whatever additional assistance the society required was obtained by engaging the services of hired men, who usually acted the inferior parts. Many bonds stipulating the terms of such engagements are in existence, and one of the conditions usually was that the actor so engaged should give his services at a fixed price, and should undertake to perform for no other company during the time specified in his engagement. These men had no right to any share in the profits of the society. That these profits were very considerable and constant, and that the career of an actor of eminence was often a very lucrative one, is abundantly proved, not only by the frequent allusions to the pride, luxury, and magnificence in dress of the successful performers, which are met with in the sermons, pamphlets, and satires of the day, but still more decisively by the wills left by many of these actors, specifying the large fortunes they sometimes accumulated by the practice of their art. Examples of this will be found in the cases of Shakespeare, and the great tragedian Burbage, and the well-known charitable institution (Dulwich College) due to the philanthropy and piety of Edward Alleyn.

It must never be lost sight of, by any one who wishes to form a clear notion of the state of the elder English drama, that the female parts were invariably acted by boys or young men. Women did not appear on the stage till about the time of the Restoration, and then, singularly enough, the earliest part acted by a female was the Desdemona of our great dramatist. This innovation was at first considered as something shocking and monstrous, but the evident advantages and propriety of the change soon silenced all opposition. The novelty itself first originated in Italy. We must not, however, imagine that because the parts of women were intrusted to male representatives they were necessarily ill performed. There are abundant proofs that some of the young actors who devoted themselves to this line of their art, attained by practice to a high degree both of elegance and pathos. They were often singing-boys of the royal chapel, and as long as their falsetto voice remained pure, not "cracked i' the ring," as Hamlet says, they were no unfit representatives of the graceful and beautiful heroines of Shakspeare, Ford, or Fletcher. The testimony of contemporaries proves that some of them, as for example the famous Kynaston, so admirably seized all the details of the characters they personated, that the illusion was complete, and they were no unworthy rivals of the great artists of those days. It is true that this custom of the female parts being acted by boys may have in some degree exaggerated that tendency to double entendre and indecent equivocal which has unfortunately been but too universally the vice of the stage. But even this objection will lose some of its weight when we reflect that the habitual appearance of women on the stage seems, so far from checking, absolutely to have aggravated the frightful profligacy and immorality which defiled the society and the literature of the country at the epoch of the Restoration, and which reached its highest intensity in compositions destined for the stage

§ 8 Perhaps the most remarkable peculiarity of the dramatic profession at this period of our literary history was the frequent combination, in one and the same person, of the qualities of player and dramatic-author. I do not mean to imply, of course, that all the actors of this splendid epoch were dramatists, but nearly all the dramatic authors were actors by profession. This circumstance must have obviously exerted a mighty influence in modifying the dramatic productions composed under such conditions—an influence not of course exclusively favourable, but which must have powerfully contributed to give to those productions that strong and individual character, that goût du terroir, which renders them so inimitable. It is evident that a dramatic writer, however great his genius, unacquainted practically with the mechanism of the stage, will frequently fail in giving to his work that directness and vivacity which is the essential element of popular success. Such a poet, writing in his closet under the influence not of scenic but of merely literary emotions, may produce admirable declamation, delicate anatomy of character, profound exhibition of human passion, but the most valuable element of scenic success, viz dramatic effect, may be entirely absent. This precious quality may be possessed by a writer with not a tithe of the genius of the former, and for the absence of this quality no amount of abstract literary merit can compensate. A striking example of this may be found in the French theatre. All the admirable qualities of Racine and Corneille have not been able to preserve their tragedies from comparative neglect as tragedies, i. e. in a theatrical point of view. As literary compositions they will always be studied and admired by every one who desires to make acquaintance with the higher qualities of the French language and poetry, but as tragedies, few persons can now witness their performance without experiencing a sensation of weariness which they may attempt to disguise, but which they certainly cannot escape. It has been the fashion to explain this by attributing it to changes in the manners and habits of society, but how happens it that the scenes of Molière always retain their freshness and vivacity? The reason is that Molière, himself a skilful actor, as well as an unequalled painter of that range of comic character which he has delineated, gave to his pieces the element of scenic effect, an element which will successfully replace the absence of much higher literary qualities, and which can be acquired only by the instinct of the stage. An immense majority of the dramatists of our Elizabethan theatre were actors, and this is why their writings are so often defiled by very gross faults of coarseness, violence, buffoonery, bombast, bad taste, and extravagance—such faults, in short, as were naturally to be expected from actor-authors writing in great haste, addressing themselves to a very miscellaneous public, and thinking not of future glory, but of immediate profit and success, but at the same time it is the reason why their writings, despite of all these, and even graver faults, invariably possess intense dramatic interest, and an effectiveness for the absence of which no purely literary merit can in any way compensate. But though professional actors, this brilliant constellation of writers, by a chance which has never been repeated in literary history, consisted of men of liberal and often learned education. Generally young men of strong passions, frequently of gentle birth, they in many cases left the university for the theatre, where they hoped to obtain an easy subsistence at a time when both writing for the stage and acting were well recompensed by the public, and where the joyous and irregular mode of life possessed such charms for ardent passions and lax morality. Their career was, in too many cases, a miserable succession of revelry and distress, of gross debauchery and ignoble privation, but the examples of many showed that prudence and industry would be rewarded in this career with the same certainty as in others, and the success of Burbage, Alleyn, and Shakspeare, can be put forward as the contrast to the debauched lives and miserable deaths of Marlowe, Greene, and Nash. This very irregularity of life, however, may have contributed to give to the works of this time that large spirit of observation, that universality of painting, which certainly distinguished them. The career of these men, at least in its commencement and general outlines, was the same. They attached themselves, in the double quality of actors and poets, to one of the numerous companies then existing, and in many instances began their literary labours by rewriting and rearranging plays already exhibited to the public, and which a little alteration could often render more suitable to the peculiar resources of the company. Having by this comparatively humble work of making rechauffés acquired skill and facility, the dramatic aspirant would bring out an original work, either alone or in partnership with some brother playwright, and in this way he would be fairly started as a writer. It was of course very much to the interest of a company of actors to possess an exclusive right to the services of an able or popular dramatist, and his productions, while they remained in manuscript, continued to be the exclusive property of the company. Thus the troops of actors had the very strongest motive for taking every precaution that their pieces should not be printed, publication instantly annihilating their monopoly, and allowing rival companies to profit by their labours, and this is the reason why comparatively so few of the dramas of this period, in spite of their unequalled merit and their great popularity, were committed to the press during the lives, at least, of their authors. It also explains the singularly careless execution of such copies as were printed, these having been given to the public in many cases surreptitiously, and in direct contravention to the wishes and interests of the author. It must be confessed that (in the sixteenth century in England theatrical writing was considered the very lowest branch of literature, if indeed it was regarded as literature at all. The profession of actor, though often profitable, and exercised by many individuals with dignity and respectability, was certainly not looked upon by society in a very favourable light. The vices and profligacy of many of its members seemed almost to justify the infamy stamped on the occupation by the old law, which classed players with "rogues and vagabonds." Placed in such a social atmosphere, and exposed to such powerful and opposing influences, the dramatic author of those times was likely to exhibit precisely the tendencies which we actually find characterising his works, and recorded in his life.

§ 9 I will now give a rapid sketch of the principal English playwrights anterior to Shakspeare. JOHN LYLY (b. about 1554) composed several court plays and pageants, and is supposed to have enjoyed in some degree the favour of Elizabeth, for we know that he was at one time a petitioner for the reversion of the office of Master of the Revels. His few plays were written upon classical, or rather mythological subjects, as the story of Endymion, Sappho and Phaon, and Alexander and Campaspe. He has a rich and fantastic imagination, and his writings exhibit genius and elegance, though strongly tinctured with a peculiar kind of affectation with which he infected the language of the Court, the aristocracy, and even to a considerable degree literature itself, till it fell under the ridicule of Shakspeare, like the parallel absurdity in France, the Phébus of the Hôtel de Rambouillet, under the lash of the Précieuses Ridicules and the Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes. Lyly was the English Gongora, and his absurd though ingenious jargon, like the estilo culto in Spain, became the fashionable affectation of the day. It consisted in a kind of exaggerated vivacity of imagery and expression, the remotest and most unexpected analogies were sought for, and crowded into every sentence. The reader may form some notion of this mode of writing (which was called Euphuism, from Lyly's once fashionable book entitled Euphues and his England) by consulting the caricature of it which Scott has introduced in the character of the courtier Sir Piercy Shafston in The Monastery. The first part of the Euphues appeared in 1578 or 1579. Lyly was a man of considerable classical acquirements, and had been educated at Oxford. His lyrics are extremely graceful and harmonious, and even as a playwright his merits are rather lyrical than dramatic

GEORGE PEELE, like Lyly, had received a liberal education at Oxford. He was one of Shakspeare's fellow-actors and fellow-shareholders in the Blackfriars Theatre. He had also been employed by the City of London in composing and preparing those spectacles and shows which formed so great a portion of ancient civic festivity. His earliest work, The Arraignement of Paris, was printed anonymously in 1584. His most celebrated dramatic works were the David and Bethsabe, and Absolom, in which there is great richness and beauty of language, and occasional indications of a high order of pathetic and elevated emotion, but his versification, though sweet, has little variety, and the luxurious and sensuous descriptions in which Peele most delighted are so numerous that they become rather tiresome in the end. It should be remarked that this poet was the first to give an example of that peculiar kind of historical play in which Shakspeare was afterwards so consummate a master. His Edward I is, though monotonous, declamatory and stiff, in some sense the forerunner of such works as Richard II, Richard III, or Henry V.

THOMAS KYD, who lived about the same time, is principally noticeable as having probably been the original author of that famous play upon which so many dramatists tried their hands in the innumerable recastings which it received, and which have caused it to be ascribed in succession to almost the whole body of the elder Elizabethan dramatists. Of this piece, in spite of its occasional extravagance, even the greatest of these authors might have been proud. It is called Jeronimo, and was continued in The Spanish Tragedy. The two furnish incessant allusions to the playwrights of the day. The subject is exceedingly gloomy, bloody, and dolorous, but the pictures of grief, despair, revenge, and madness, with which it abounds, not only testify high dramatic power of conception, but must have been, as we know they were, exceedingly favourable for displaying the powers of a great tragic actor.

THOMAS NASH and ROBERT GREENE, both Cambridge men, both sharp, and, I fear, mercenary satirists, and both alike in the profligacy of their lives and the misery of their deaths, though they may have eked out their income by occasionally writing for the stage, were in reality rather pasquinaders and pamphleteers than dramatists—condottieri of the press, shamelessly advertising the services of their ready and biting pen to any person or any cause that would pay them. They were both unquestionably men of rare powers. Nash probably the better man and the abler writer of the two. Nash is famous for the bitter controversy he maintained with the learned Gabriel Harvey, whom he has caricatured and attacked in numerous pamphlets, in a manner equally humorous and severe.

He was concerned with other dramatists in the production of a piece entitled Summer's Last Will and Testament, and in a satirical comedy, The Isle of Dogs, which drew down upon him the anger of the Government, for we know that he was imprisoned for some time in consequence.

Greene was, like Nash, the author of a multitude of tracts and pamphlets on the most miscellaneous subjects. Sometimes they were tales, often translated or expanded from the Italian novelists, sometimes amusing exposures of the various arts of coney-catching, i.e. cheating and swindling, practised at that time in London, and in which, it is to be feared, Greene was personally not unversed, sometimes moral confessions, like Nash's Pierce Pennilesse his Supplication to the Devil, or Greene's Groatsworth of Wit, purporting to be a warning to others against the consequences of unbridled passions. Some of these confessions are exceedingly pathetic, and would be more so could the reader divest himself of a lurking suspicion that the whole is often a mere trick to catch a penny. The popularity of these tracts, we know, was very great. The only dramatic work we need specify of Greene's was George-a-Green, the legend of an old English popular hero, recounted with much occasional vivacity and humour.

THOMAS LODGE (1556-1625?) is described by Mr Collier as "second to Kyd in vigour and boldness of conception, but as a drawer of character, so essential a part of dramatic poetry, he unquestionably has the advantage." His principal work is a tragedy entitled The Wounds of Civil War, lively set forth in the true Tragedies of Marius and Sylla (1594). He also composed, in conjunction with Greene, A Looking-Glass for London and England, the object of which is a defence of the stage against the Puritanical party. (See also p 87, a.)

§ 10 But by far the most powerful genius among the dramatic poets who immediately preceded Shakspeare was CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE (1563?-1593). This man, if destiny had granted to him a longer life, which might have enabled him to correct the luxuriance of an ardent temperament and an unregulated imagination, might have left works that would have placed him very high among the foremost poets of his age. As it is, his remains strike us with as much regret as admiration—regret that such rare powers should have been so irregularly cultivated. Marlowe was born at Canterbury in 1563, and was educated at Cambridge. On leaving the University he joined a troop of actors, and is recorded to have broken his leg upon the stage. His mode of life was remarkable for vice and debauchery, even in a profession so little scrupulous, and he was strongly suspected by his contemporaries of having been little better than an Atheist. His career was as short as it was disgraceful. he was stabbed in the head with his own dagger, which he had drawn in a disreputable scuffle with a disreputable antagonist, in a disreputable place and he died of this wound at the age of thirty. His works are not numerous, but they are strongly distinguished from those of preceding and contemporary dramatists by an air of astonishing power, energy, and elevation—an elevation, it is true, which is sometimes exaggerated into bombast, and an energy which occasionally degenerates into extravagance. His first work was the tragedy of Tamburlaine, and the rants of the declamation in this piece furnished rich materials for satire and caricature, but in spite of this bombast the piece contains many passages of great power and beauty. Marlowe's best work is incontestably the drama of Faustus, founded upon the very same popular legend which Goethe adopted as the groundwork of his tragedy, but the point of view taken by Marlowe is far simpler than that of Goethe, and the English poem contains no trace of the profound self-questioning of the German hero, of the extraordinary creation of Mephistopheles, nor anything like the pathetic episode of Margaret. The witch element, which reigns so wildly and picturesquely in the German poem, is here entirely absent. But, on the other hand, there is certainly no passage in the tragedy of Goethe in which terror, despair, and remorse are painted with such a powerful hand, as the great closing scene of Marlowe's piece, when Faustus, after the twenty-four years of sensual pleasure which were stipulated in his pact with the Evil One, is waiting for the inevitable arrival of the Friend to claim his bargain. This is truly dramatic, and is assuredly one of the most impressive scenes that ever was placed upon the stage. The tragedy of the Jew of Malta, though inferior to Faustus, is characterised by similar merits and defects. The hero, Barabbas, is the type of the Jew as he appeared to the rude and bigoted imaginations of the fifteenth century—a monster half terrific, half ridiculous, impossibly rich, inconceivably bloodthirsty, cunning, and revengeful, the bugbear of an age of ignorance and persecution. Though the exploits of cruelty and retaliation upon his Christian oppressors make Barabbas a fantastic personage, the intense expression of his rage, his triumph, and his despair, give occasion for many noble bursts of Marlowe's powerful declamation. The tragedy of Edward II, which was the last of this great poet's works, shows that in some departments of his art, and particularly in that of moving terror and pity, he might, had he lived, have become no insignificant rival of Shakspeare himself. The scene of the assassination of the unhappy king is worked up to a very lofty pitch of tragic pathos. Charles Lamb observes that "the reluctant pangs of abdicating royalty in Edward furnished hints which Shakspeare scarce improved in his Richard II, and the death-scene of Marlowe's king moves pity and terror beyond any erene, ancient or modern, with which I am acquainted' Marlowe was the morning star that heralded the rising of the great dramatic Sun

§ 11 I pass over the names of a number of comparatively insignificant authors who appeared about this time, whose dramatic works have not yet been collected and printed They in some instances, according to the custom of that age, either composed plays in partnership, or revised and altered plays written before, so that it is exceedingly difficult to assign to each playwright his just share of merit There are, however, two or three pieces which have come down to us, either anonymous, or at least attributed to so many different authors, that it is now impossible to father them with precision Some of these pieces are of great merit, and others are curious as being examples of the practice which afterwards became general in our theatre, of dramatising either episodes from the chronicle history of our own or other countries (of which class we may cite the old Hamlet, The Famous Victories, and King John), or remarkable crimes—causes célèbres—which had attracted the public attention by their unusual atrocity or the romantic nature of their details Good examples of these are Arden of Feversham, and The Yorkshire Tragedy, both founded on fact, both works of no mean merit, and both attributed, though without any probability, to the pen of Shakspeare

CHAPTER VII.

SHAKSPEARE. A D 1564-1616

§ 1. Parentage and education of Shakspeare § 2 His early life and marriage. § 3 He comes to London, and turns player and author § 4 The London theatres § 5 Shakspeare, the actor § 6 Continuation of his life. His success and prudence Returns to Stratford Death § 7 Evidence to ascertain the chronology of Shakspeare's plays. § 8 Four periods of his career as author § 9 Classification of his Dramas into History and Fiction Sources of the Dramas. § 10 His treatment of the Historical Dramas § 11 His treatment of the Dramas founded on Fiction § 12 His Venus and Adonis, Rape of Lucrece, and Sonnets

§ 1 WILLIAM SHAKSPEARE was born in April 1564, in the small town of Stratford-on-Avon, Warwickshire, and was baptized on the 26th of the month. It was usual at that time to allow two days to intervene between birth and baptism, and hence it has been inferred that William Shakspeare was born on April 23rd. His father, John Shakspeare, was in all probability a fell-monger and wool-dealer, to which commerce he appears to have added that of glover, or manufacturer of the many articles of dress that were then made of leather. He unquestionably belonged to the burgher or shopkeeper class, but had married an heiress of ancient and even knightly descent, Mary Arden or Ardern, the scion of a family which had figured in the courtly and warlike annals of preceding reigns, and thus in the veins of the great poet of humanity ran blood derived from both the aristocratic and popular portions of the community. Mary Arden had brought her husband in dowry a freehold property of some fifty or sixty acres, with a yet more valuable property in reversion, and John Shakspeare, already a prosperous tradesman, during many subsequent years advanced steadily in distinction and importance among his fellow-townsmen. After having held various minor offices, he was chosen one of the fourteen Aldermen of Stratford, was promoted in 1568 to the office of High Bailiff, and three years subsequently to that of Chief Alderman. But about the year 1577 a rapid descent appears to have commenced from this position of well-being and dignity to one of comparative indigence. We find record in 1578 of the mortgage of John Shakspeare's farm at Ashbies, his borough taxes are remitted, he is excused from contributing a small weekly sum for the relief of the poor. After some years of increasing distress he is deprived of his post of Alderman, arrested for debt, and after his release he is noted in 1592 as not coming to church "for fear of processe for debtte."

These details are not without importance when viewed in connection with the early life of William Shakspeare, and especially as bearing upon the question of the kind and degree of education enjoyed by the future poet. That he could have derived even elementary instruction of a scholastic kind from his parents is impossible, for we know that neither John nor Mary Shakspeare could write—an accomplishment, however, which, it should be remarked, was comparatively rare in Elizabeth's reign in even a higher class of society than the one to which such persons belonged. There existed at that time, and there exists at the present day, in the borough of Stratford, one of those endowed "free grammar-schools" of which so many country towns in England offer examples, where the pious charity of past ages has provided for the gratuitous education of posterity. To this grammar-school of Stratford, founded in the reign of Edward IV, it is certain that John Shakspeare had the right as Alderman, and past Bailiff of the town, of sending his son without expense. It is inconceivable that he should have neglected to avail himself of so useful a privilege, and that William enjoyed at all events the advantage of such elementary instruction as was offered by the grammar-schools of those days is rendered more than probable, not only by the extensive though irregular reading of which his works give evidence, but by one among the vague traditions that have descended to us. Aubrey, who died about 1700, states upon hearsay authority that the poet had been "in his younger years a schoolmaster in the country." It may be that after passing through the lower classes of Stratford Grammar-School, Shakspeare was employed, as a lad of his aptitude would not improbably have been, to assist the master in instructing the junior pupils.

§ 2 Among the various legends connected with the early life of so great a man, and which posterity, in the singular absence of more trustworthy details, swallows with greediness, the most celebrated is that which represents his youth as irregular, if not profligate, and recounts his deer-stealing expedition, in company with other riotous young fellows, to Sir Thomas Lucy's park at Charlcote, near Stratford. The young poacher is said to have been seized, brought before the indignant Justice of the Peace, and treated with so much severity by Sir Thomas that he revenged himself on the rural magnate by affixing a satirical ballad to the gates of Charlcote. The wrath of the magistrate is said to have blazed so high at this additional insolence, that Shakspeare was obliged to withdraw himself from more serious persecution by escaping to Loudon. That the poet at a later date retained no kindly feeling towards the Lucy family is rendered probable by the irreverent jests upon their coat of arms, "the dozen white luses," which are introduced in the opening scene of The Merry Wives of Windsor, where also Justice Shallow proclaims his grievance against Sir John,—“Knight, you have beaten my men, killed my deer, and broke open my lodge.” Falstaff “But not kissed your keeper’s daughter” The deer-stealing story may not be altogether void of foundation, but Shakspeare’s departure from Stratford, and his embracing the theatrical career, can be explained in a different and less improbable manner. There is reason to believe that it was in 1586, at the age of 22, he left his native town, and it is quite possible that the distressed situation in which his parents then were, and certain irregularities in his own youthful conduct, may have contributed to render a longer stay in Stratford disagreeable. One event which had occurred about four years before, probably contributed more powerfully to send him forth to seek his fortune than the ire of Sir Thomas Lucy, or the perhaps not very enviable reputation which his boyish escapades had acquired for him among the steady burgesses of the little town. This event was his marriage, contracted when he was only 18, in 1582, with Anne Hathaway, the daughter of “a substantial yeoman” who had resided at the hamlet of Shottery, about two miles from Stratford. Richard Hathaway, the father, had died a few months before the marriage took place. Anne was seven years and a half older than her boy-husband, the marriage was formally approved by the relations of the bride, and it has been conjectured that it was pressed on by them, in order that the young Shakspeare should heal a breach which he had made in the reputation of Anne. There remains in existence the bond necessary to procure from the Bishop of Worcester such a dispensation as would authorize the marriage ceremony after once publishing the banns. The fruit of the union was first a daughter, Susanna, the poet’s favourite child, born in 1583, and in the following year twins, Judith and Hamnet. The latter, the poet’s only son, died at twelve years of age, his two daughters survived him. There is no evidence to show whether Shakspeare’s marriage was a happy and well-assorted union, or the reverse. During some twenty years, the most active portion of his life while he resided in London, it is supposed that his wife remained with her children and the poet’s parents in Stratford, but tradition reports that he annually visited his native place. No provision for his wife’s maintenance is made in his will, she was, however, already legally provided for, being entitled to dower on Shakspeare’s freehold property, and an interlineation in the will by which he gives her “my second best bed with the furniture” was assuredly meant not as a parting insult, but to gratify some womanly foible of attachment for a piece of household property with which old associations were connected

Concerning the boyhood and youth of the great painter of nature and of man we know little or nothing. It is more than probable that his education was neglected, his passions strong, and his conduct far from regular, yet we may in some sort rejoice at the destiny which allowed him to draw his earliest impressions of nature from the calm and graceful scenery of Warwickshire, and placed him in a situation to study the passions and characters of men among the unsophisticated inhabitants of a small provincial town. Perhaps, too, the very imperfection of his intellectual training was an advantage to his genius in allowing his gigantic powers to develop themselves, untrammelled by the bonds of regular education. It is not improbable that at one period of his youth he had been placed in the office of some country practitioner of the law, in all his works he shows an extraordinary knowledge of the technical language of that profession, and frequently draws his illustrations from its vocabulary. Besides, such terms as he employs he almost always employs correctly, which would hardly be possible but to one who had been professionally versed in them, add to which, if a possible satirical allusion to Shakspeare by Thomas Nash, of the year 1589, actually refers to him, there is a distinct indication of the poet's having in his youth exercised "the trade of Noverint," that is, the occupation of a lawyer's clerk, this word being the usual commencement of writs—"noverint universi."

§ 3. At the age of 22, therefore, Shakspeare, now the father of three children, in all probability not enjoying in his native place a very enviable reputation, without means of support, his father having at this time descended to a very low ebb of worldly fortunes, determined upon the great step of leaving Stratford altogether, and embarking on the wide ocean of London theatrical life. The story of his being reduced to hold horses at the doors of theatres, a legend of which nothing is to be heard before the middle of the last century, can hardly demand a serious consideration. The companies of actors were always glad to enlist among them such men of ready genius as could render themselves useful as performers and dramatists, and this combined occupation Shakspeare, like Ben Jonson, Marlowe, and many others of his contemporaries, fulfilled with an aptitude of which the proofs are evident. Theatrical companies had visited Stratford, and had performed for the amusement of the Corporation. The greatest tragic actor of that day, Richard Burbage, was a Warwickshire man, and Thomas Greene, a well-known member of the company to which Shakspeare attached himself, was a native of Stratford, and perhaps a relation of Shakspeare Nothing, therefore, is more probable than that the young adventurer, whose talents were perhaps not unknown, received an invitation to throw in his lot with the Lord Chamberlain's company. Like other young men of that time, he rendered himself useful in the double capacity of actor and arranger of pieces, and there is no reason to suppose that his professional career differed from that of many of his contemporaries in any respect, save in the industry and success with which he pursued his double calling, and the prudence with which he accumulated the pecuniary results of that activity. He began, in all probability, by adapting old plays to the exigencies of his theatre, and while engaged in this humble employment, acquired that consummate knowledge of stage effect which distinguished him. His connection with the theatre continued from 1586 to about 1611, a period of twenty-five years, embracing the splendour of his youth and the vigour of his manhood. Between these dates were produced his thirty-seven dramas, and his poems, with perhaps the exception of the earliest, Venus and Adonis.

§ 4 The theatrical company to which Shakspeare remained attached as an actor and shareholder during the whole of his London career was the richest and most prosperous of the numerous troops that then furnished amusement to the capital. Their original place of representation was that known as "The Theatre," in the parish of Shoreditch, established in 1576 by James Burbage. The playhouses in the reign of Elizabeth were commonly placed outside the City walls in Shoreditch, or on the river's banks in the southern suburb of the capital, in order that they might be removed from the jurisdiction of the Common Council of London, which, looking upon theatrical gatherings as dangerous to morality and religion, and as dangerous in times of plague to the health of the community, used all its efforts to discountenance and crush the players. The enmity between the witty vagabonds of the theatre and the Puritainical Aldermen was envenomed by incessant jokes and pasquinades on the part of the former, and by constant persecution from the latter, until upon the ultimate triumph of Puritanism at the outbreak of the Civil War the theatres were completely closed. Partly by prudently avoiding to give offence by political allusions, partly by securing powerful protection at Court, the company to which Shakspeare belonged so far increased in importance that in 1596 it was able to erect within the precincts of London itself the Blackfriars playhouse, situated nearly on the spot now occupied by the printing-house of the Times newspaper. In 1599 the materials of "The Theatre" were removed from Shoreditch by the Burbages, and used in the construction of The Globe, a theatre placed in Southwark upon the Bankside, and so named from its sign, the effigy of Hercules supporting the globe, with the motto "Totus Mundus agit"

Histrionem " This edifice, much larger than the Blackfriars theatre, was built of wood, circular within, and with the exception of the part occupied by the stage was roofless. It served chiefly though not exclusively as a summer theatre, while the Blackfriars, being entirely roofed over, was more suitable for winter performances.

§ 5 Guided by the feeble lights of tradition, and occasional obscure allusions in the writings of the day, we may trace Shakspeare's professional and literary career from his joining the company at The Theatre or the Curtain, till his retirement from active life about 1611-12. That career appears to have been a highly successful one. During some eighteen years at least he rendered himself useful to his theatre as an actor. He is spoken of by Chettle, a contemporary dramatist, as "excellent in the quality he professes," the word quality having at that time a special reference to the occupation of player. He is named among the "principal tragedians," and placed first among the "principal comedians" who enacted two of the plays of Jonson. That he was well acquainted with the theoretic principles of the actor's art is unquestionable from many passages in his writings, it will suffice to refer to the inimitable directions to the players put into the mouth of Hamlet (act iii., sc. 2). He does not, however, seem to have been assigned the foremost parts in any drama in whose representation he assisted. We have good reason for supposing that he acted the Ghost in his tragedy of Hamlet, the secondary, but graceful and touching character of Adam in As You Like It, and the sensible citizen, Old Knowell, in Ben Jonson's Every Man in His Humour. It is probable that for some years before the close of his dramatic career he abandoned the practice of appearing on the stage. His services as an author had become more valuable to his troop than his exertions as an actor. Burbage, we know, was the original and most popular performer of his comrade's great tragic creations, Richard III., Hamlet, Othello, and the like.

§ 6 Shakspeare's first original poem was not dramatic. Venus and Adonis, which, in his dedication to Lord Southampton, he calls "the first heir of my invention," was published in 1593. It is probable that this poem—voluptuous in subject, studious and even laboured in style, and containing many descriptions of rural objects and incidents—was conceived, if not composed, at Stratford. The Rape of Lucrece (1594), a somewhat similar but maturer work, written in the same seven-line stanza as Chaucer's Troilus, enjoyed a great but inferior popularity. The Venus was re-issued in six several editions between the years 1593 and 1602, while the Lucrece during nearly the same lapse of time, appeared in three. The first years of Shakspeare's theatrical life were probably devoted to mere arrangement and adaptation of old plays, at what period he abandone such adaptation for original dramatic composition we cannot be entirely certain. The first unquestionable allusion to Shakspeare by a contemporary is of the year 1592, and proves that the poet had already risen to sufficient importance as actor and playwright to call down upon him the attacks of envious or disappointed rivals. In that year a pamphlet entitled Greene's Groat's-worth of Wit was published after the death of that unhappy but clever profligate by his executor Henry Chettle. Greene, addressing from his death-bed certain of his fellow-dramatists, and warning them against the sickle favour which writers for the stage receive, proceeds as follows.

Yes, trust them not, for there is an upstart Crow beautified with our feathers, that with his Tyger's heart wrapt in a Player's hide, supposes he is as well able to bumbast out a blank verse as the best of you, and being an absolute Johannes factotum, is in his own conceit the only Shake-scene in a country. We may infer from this distinct reference to Shakspeare that he had made himself in many ways serviceable to his company, and had rehandled and made his own of plays at least partly written by Greene—probably the second and third parts of Henry VI., in the latter of which occurs the line parodied by Greene, "O tiger's heart wrapped in a woman's hide" (act 1, sc 4). Chettle, in a pamphlet of his own published almost immediately after Greene's, offered apology to Shakspeare in terms which bear testimony not only to the great poet's genius as a writer, but to his excellence as a man, to "his uprightness of dealing," his "civil demeanour," and to the fact that he had already gained the friendship or patronage of distinguished persons. Almost all contemporary notices conspire in attributing to Shakspeare a disposition amiable, gentle, and generous.

It is quite certain that the generous Southampton and the accomplished Pembroke were patrons and admirers of the poet. The former, indeed, is related, upon the authority of Davenant, to have made Shakspeare a present of 1000*l*. "to go through with a purchase which he heard he had a mind to"—a sum equal at the present day to six times its nominal amount. This princely gift, if actually bestowed, may have been not so much a personal gratuity to Shakspeare, as a generous contribution to the support of the drama as represented by Shakspeare's company, and designed to assist them in their theatrical enterprises, the action nevertheless would show the high respect which the poet had inspired. That Shakspeare, in his business relations with the theatre and the public, exhibited great good sense, prudence, and knowledge of the world, seems proved by the skill with which the actors of his troop managed to steer clear of the various dangers arising from the Puritanic opposition of the London Corporation, and the still more serious perils incurred by offending, in political or satirical allusions, the susceptibility of the Court and the Censorship, then so severe, that almost all the other companies of players suffered more or less for their imprudences—some in the forcible closing of their theatres, some in the imprisonment of their authors and performers. Shakspeare's worldly prosperity seems to have gone on steadily increasing, and he appears to have carefully invested his gains, for in 1597, when he was aged 33, he purchased the property of New Place, in Stratford, on which stood a house regarded as one of the most considerable in the town, and to which he determined to retire as soon as the state of his fortune would permit, to pass the evening of his life far from the turmoils of the stage in the competency he had so wisely earned. During his London life he no doubt made frequent visits to his native place, keeping up a lively interest in the public and private affairs of his townsmen. In 1598 he was probably applied to as an influential person in the capital to assist, through powerful friends, in the effort made to obtain exemption for the town of Stratford from taxes and subsidies. He was able to afford a tranquil asylum to his parents, and to reinstate them in a position of dignity, for in 1597 Dethick, the Garter King-at-Arms, granted an application for arms made in the preceding year by John Shakspeare. In 1601 the poet's father died, his mother survived until 1608. The death of his only son, Hamnet, in 1596, when the boy was in his twelfth year, must have been a severe shock to so loving a heart, but in general his life seems, in external circumstances, to have been one of continued prosperity. In 1602 he purchased 107 acres of land, and most probably engaged in farming speculations, with the assistance of his brother Gilbert. Two years after this we find him plaintiff in an action, in the Court of Stratford, to recover 17 15s 10d., being the price of malt sold and delivered to one Philip Rogers. About the same time he purchased a lease of the tithes of Stratford, to expire in 1636. In 1607 (the poet now aged 43) his favourite daughter, Susanna, married Dr Hall, and in the following year she brought into the world a granddaughter to the dramatist. Both at the marriage and at the christening it is highly probable that Shakspeare visited Stratford. He certainly was godfather, at the latter period, to William Walker, the child of one of his friends and fellow-townsmen. About 1611 the poet finally retired to New Place, where he lived with his daughter, Mrs Hall, and her husband, who enjoyed a considerable provincial reputation for medical skill. Three years later we learn that Shakspeare and his son-in-law were in London, probably on a matter concerning the enclosure of common lands at Stratford. Shakspeare did not long enjoy the retirement for which he had so earnestly laboured. He died on April 23rd, 1616, on the 23rd of the month, the anniversary or his presumed birthday, having exactly completed his 52nd year. A short time before his death his second daughter, Judith, was married to Thomas Quiney, a vintner and wine merchant, her oldest son, named Shakspeare after his grandfather, died in infancy, and of two sons subsequently born neither survived to reach his majority. Respecting the details of Shakspeare's last illness and decease we have no trustworthy information. Dr Hall, indeed, has left us a curious record of some of the most remarkable cases occurring in his practice, but unluckily his notes which we possess do not begin till 1617, the year after the poet's death. Writing in 1662, the vicar of Stratford says, "Shakspere, Drayton, and Ben Jonson had a merry meeting, and, it seems, drunk too hard, for Shakspere died of a fever there contracted." On this tradition, made out with an "it seems," not much reliance can be placed. The poet was buried in the parish church of Stratford, the registers of which furnish the greater part of the meagre, though trustworthy information we possess concerning the family vicissitudes of the Shakspeares. Over his grave is erected a mural monument, which is chiefly remarkable as containing a bust of the poet—an authentic though not very well executed portrait. It was probably copied from a mask of the face taken after death, and, until Malone in 1793 caused it to be whitewashed, was coloured, the eyes being a light hazel, and the beard and hair auburn. Of the other likenesses of Shakspeare, the coarse engraving by Droeshout, prefixed to the first folio edition of his works in 1623, appears to have the best claims to our confidence. This is vouched for as a faithful resemblance in the eulogistic verses placed before it—verses written by Ben Jonson, who knew intimately his great contemporary, and was not a man to assert what he did not think.

The tomb and the birthplace of Shakspeare will ever be sacred spots—shrines of loving pilgrimage for all the nations of the earth. The house of New Place has long been destroyed, but the garden in which it stood, as well as the house where the poet is believed to have been born, will be preserved to the latest ages by the piety of his countrymen and the veneration of the civilized world. A short time before his death Shakspeare made his will, and thus we have a very exact account of the nature and extent of his property at the time of his decease. In the mode of its disposal we see evident traces of that kind and affectionate disposition which everything seems to indicate as belonging to him, a careful remembrance of his old comrades and "fellows," to each of whom he leaves some token of regard, generally a ring. This document is precious to us on another ground—from its containing his signature thrice repeated. These, and three other signatures (one in a copy of Florio's translation of Montaigne's Essays) are the only specimens that have been preserved of the writing of that immortal hand

§ 7 The most valuable principle of classification which can be applied to the writings of Shakspeare is obviously one based upon the chronological order of their production, because such a method gives us a chart of the intellectual and artistic development of Shakspeare's mind, enabling us to trace the course of that majestic river from its sparkling but slender sources to the full flow of its calm and mighty current. Certainty as to the date of the origin of several of the plays is indeed unattainable, but a general scheme of the order of Shakspeare's writings can be made out, which is trustworthy in its main outlines. The evidence for the chronology is of various kinds, and it is the concurrence of these various kinds of evidence which produces in the mind a sense of conviction and assurance. Previous to the publication of Shakspeare's plays in the collected-form of 1623, known as the First Folio, nearly half of their number had appeared singly in quarto shape. The dates of these old quartos are known. Dated entries, moreover, of their intended publication appear in the register of the Stationers' Company. Thus, under the date Jan 18, 1601, we find the entry, "An excellent and plesaunt conceited comedie of Sir John Falstaff and the Merry Wives of Windsores." Again, in contemporary books or manuscripts we come upon express statements respecting Shakspeare's plays. Of these the most remarkable and important is a passage in the 'Palladis Tamia,' or 'Wit's Treasure,' of Francis Meres, published in September 1598, in which the writer enumerates six comedies and six tragedies of Shakspeare, and makes mention of his "sugred sonnets among his private friends." Sometimes again, though no express mention be made of a play by Shakspeare, a quotation from the play, an imitation of some passage, an unmistakable allusion to some scene or incident, may serve equally well to ascertain its date. When Weever, in his 'Mirror of Martyrs,' printed in 1601, wrote the lines—

"The many-headed multitude were drawn
By Brutus' speech that Cæsar was ambitious,
When eloquent Mark Antony had shown
His virtue, who but Brutus then was vicious?"

can we doubt that the writer had seen a performance of Shakspeare's Julius Cæsar? Or, on the other hand, an imitation or a quotation is made by Shakspeare from some contemporary volume, of which the date of publication is known. Thus The Tempest contains a passage manifestly borrowed from Florio's translation of Montaigne's Essays—the passage in which Gonzalo describes his imaginary Commonwealth, The Tempest, therefore, unless these lines of the play be an after-insertion, or unless Shak-

Shakspeare had seen Florio's manuscript, cannot have been written previous to the year 1603, when Florio's work was published. Finally, reference is occasionally made by Shakspeare to some contemporary event or fact of recent occurrence, as, for example, the punning allusion in the Comedy of Errors to the civil wars of France, which terminated with the submission of Henry of Navarre to the Roman Catholic Church, in July 1593.

But besides such evidence, either wholly or partly, of an external kind, helping to determine the chronology of Shakspeare's plays, there is a body of evidence of equal or greater importance, and wholly internal. Nor is this merely of a nature to be appreciated by that variable standard—the sensibility of a cultured reader, a portion at least of this internal evidence admits of being estimated by the exact methods of science. Certain changes which took place in Shakspeare's manner of writing verse from his earliest to his latest plays can be observed with so much accuracy that it is possible to express the degrees of change by precise statistics. It was remarked long since by Malone, that in his youthful plays Shakspeare made use of rhymed verses in large numbers, and that his abandonment of rhyme was gradual, so that, in the absence of other proof, the number of rhymed lines in a play might be taken as an indication of the date at which that play was written. The substantial truth of Malone's remark has been since confirmed by a precise calculation of the percentages of rhymed and unrhymed lines in all the plays of Shakspeare. It is found that, whereas in Love's Labour's Lost, which is known to be one of the earliest written of the dramas, the number of rhymed lines exceeds that of unrhymed by nearly two to one, in Hamlet, a play of the middle period, there are some thirty unrhymed lines for one that is rhymed, while in the Winter's Tale, certainly one of the latest plays, in more than eighteen hundred verses there occurs not a single rhyme. It was also noticed that in his early manner of writing verse Shakspeare frequently closed the sense and the line together, and thus a stop or pause was of frequent occurrence at the end of the line, but as the poet obtained mastery over the instrument of verse, his treatment of it became freer, and the position of the pauses constantly varied, no longer occurring with regularity at the close of the verse. Thus, taking again Love's Labour's Lost for comparison with the Winter's Tale, it is estimated that in the former play the proportion of lines which run on to "end-stopped" lines is no more than one in eighteen, while in the latter play the proportion is one in two. Again, at a certain period of his authorship, the poet extended his freedom further, not only did he permit the sense to run on from line to line at pleasure, he began in some instances to terminate a line with what is called a weak, monosyllabic ending.

the effect of which is necessarily to precipitate the mind and the voice onward into the line which follows. Examples of such "weak" or unemphatic endings are the words and, if, on, to, and they appear as a phenomenon of Shakspeare's versification comparatively late in his dramatic career, becoming speedily of frequent occurrence, to such an extent indeed, that the "weak-ending" forms the most characteristic feature of the versification of that group of plays which brings to a close the great dramatist's series of writings. Once more: as Shakspeare made progress in his craft, and as his workmanship became more daring and more deft, he took pleasure in varying from the regular ten-syllable form of verse, by terminating the line with a double (or feminine) ending, thus including at least eleven syllables in the line instead of ten. Of such eleven-syllable lines in Love's Labour's Lost there are four per cent, and no less than thirty-one per cent in The Winter's Tale.

To statistics, of which the above may be taken as a specimen, we add the results, which assuredly may be trusted though they cannot be tabulated, of the finer æsthetic enquiry. We observe an increased power on the part of the dramatist in dealing with the structure of the plot, increased power of representing the deeper passions of humanity, an enlarged experience and acquaintance with life, a stronger energy of thought, a bolder action of imagination, a capacity for more varied and more profound characterization. The nature of the imagery employed, and the manner of expression, undergo an unmistakable alteration. In the early plays the imagery is comparatively simple, as opposed to complex or involved, and it is studiously handled, and drawn out in detail. In the poet's later style, metaphor presses upon and crosses metaphor, each paragraph is alive with multitudinous and varied life, which yet is ever at one with itself, the expression is close-packed, and there is a "daring confidence in the resources of language, which plunges headlong into a sentence without knowing how it is to come forth." In a word, the art of the apprentice has become the art of the master.

§ 8 Relying upon such various evidence—external and internal—we are enabled to distinguish four chief periods in the dramatic career of Shakspeare. The first, the tentative period, the years of experimenting, will include such plays by preceding authors as received touches from the hand of Shakspeare—Titus Andronicus the first part of Henry VI.; and perhaps other pieces, and, with these, certain light and graceful comedies—Love's Labour's Lost, a play of jest and dialogue, Two Gentlemen of Verona, a sentimental comedy, The Comedy of Errors, which approaches farce, and the bright, masque-like poem of love and laughter, A Midsummer's Night's Dream. To the same period belong the early historical plays—the second and third parts of Henry VI., plays founded on yet earlier work, accomplished by Shakspeare in conjunction, perhaps, with Greene and Marlowe, Richard III, a historical drama, somewhat in the manner of Marlowe and his idealistic school, Richard II, in which rhyme and blank-verse struggle for the mastery, and which is distinguished among the historical plays by the absence of humorous scenes, King John, founded upon an older play, but elevated and ennobled by the genius of Shakspeare, and in a new manner animated by him with the bounding spirits and high-toned patriotism of Fauleconbridge. Finally, to this period belongs a single tragedy—Romco and Juliet—a work from which the apparently careful revision of its author was unable to remove certain youthful crudities and affectations that disfigure it, yet which must for ever remain unique and incomparable among the dramatic works of all nations—the lyrical tragedy of youth, of passion, and of death.

In the second period of Shakspeare's authorship, he completed his series of English historical plays, concluding with the heroic celebration of English valour, patriotism, and noble kingship in Henry V. Side by side with the histories, and again clustered in a little group at the close of this second period, are found the most joyous of the comedies of Shakspeare, at once more substantial and more refined than the comedies of the first period—of these the Merchant of Venice, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night, may be mentioned as characteristic of this stage in Shakspeare's artistic development. But history and comedy do not merely run on now side by side, they mingle and unite, so that we are in doubt whether we ought to name the first and second parts of Henry IV by their traditional title, as histories, or whether we should not rather call them the comedy of Falstaff. The treatment of history by the poet at this time had doubtless an important and beneficial influence upon the development of his artistic powers. The compression of the large and rough matter of history into dramatic form demanded vigorous exercise of the plastic energy of the imagination, and the circumstance that he was dealing with reality and positive facts of the world, must have served to make clear to Shakspeare that there was sterner stuff of poetry, material more precious even for the purposes of art, in actual life than could be found in the conceits, and prettiness, and affectations, which at times led him astray in his earlier writings.

But now a change passed over the poetry of Shakspeare. That causes of which we are ignorant darkened the poet's life we may not affirm, but certainly at this point of his career a cloud, traversed indeed by gleams of intense light, settles upon, and adds a solemn grandeur and terror to his art. With the strangest and darkest of his non-tragic plays—Measure for Measure—he bids comedy fare well, and now for a period of about ten years (from about 1600 to about 1610) in steady and majestic succession, tragedy follows tragedy. The ills of life, calamity, treachery, jealousy, ambition, the breach of natural ties, the false love of woman, filial ingratitude, self-destructive pride, the misanthropy of wounded and too credulous affection—these now occupied the imagination and the intellect of Shakspeare. From Julius Cæsar to Timon of Athens the tragic gloom seems but to grow more enduring and more intense. Yet at the worst we are never overtaken by total darkness, we never doubt that a moral order of the world remains unshaken; we never experience the benumbing cold of suspicion in human virtue, nay, never even a withdrawal of spiritual warmth and vital hope. The same play which contains Macbeth contains Banquo, and Goneril has for her sister, Cordelia.

From the little group of plays which belong to the fourth and final period of Shakspeare's authorship this gloom has passed away, and a serene and tender light pervades his poetry, like the long illumination which remains in the sky after a summer sunset. These last plays of Shakspeare are romantic dramas, serious in tone, yet never resolving themselves in a tragic issue. Their mirth is never noisy and boisterous, but tempered by grave undertones, and made refined by some neighbouring presence of beauty or dignified repose. Such are Cymbeline, The Winter's Tale, and, above all, that drama so full of deep, imaginative, and intellectual suggestiveness, The Tempest. These plays may possibly have been written by Shakspeare at Stratford, at a time when the bonds which connected him with London and the stage were growing slack. We might suppose, from the character of these plays, that they were written in a pleasurable leisure, in intervals of enjoyment rather than with intense and passionate continuity. And to this same period belong certain fragments of plays by Shakspeare, which were completed by other hands—his portion of Pericles, occupied with the story of the lost princess, Marina, certain scenes of The Two Noble Kinsmen, in the production of which play the dramatist, Fletcher, was his coadjutor, and, last, a portion of Henry VIII, which play owes its incoherent structure to the fact that it was transferred also to the hands of Fletcher—probably upon some occasion of urgency—to complete. These unfinished works bear witness to the fact that Shakspeare was now voluntarily withdrawing himself from the tasks of the playwright, and was settling down to enjoy the peace and the substantial happiness of his Stratford home.

§ 9 The mode of classifying Shakspeare's dramas upon which the First Folio and most of the editions are based, is founded on the principle of ranging them under the heads of Tragedies, Comedies, and Histories, but this method is open to the objection that a number of plays, from their tone and incidents, must be considered as a mingling of tragedy and comedy, or of comedy and history. It is indeed this mingling of styles which constitutes the peculiar distinguishing trait of the English Elizabethan drama, and not only its distinguishing trait, but also its peculiar excellence and title of superiority over the national drama of every other country.

There remains a third mode of classification, not without interest and significance, as pointing to the topics which proved attractive and exciting to the poet's imagination and passions,—a classification based upon the sources from which Shakspeare drew the materials for his dramatic creations. These sources will naturally divide themselves into the two great genera—History and Fiction, Wahrheit und Dichtung—while the former of these two genera will naturally subdivide into different classes or degrees of historical authenticity, ranging from vague and half-poetical legend to the comparatively firm ground of recent historical events. Again, the legendary category may be referred to the different countries from whose chronicles the events were borrowed: thus the story of Hamlet is originally related by the Danish chronicler, Saxo-Græmmaticus, Macbeth, Lear, and Cymbeline refer respectively to the annals, more or less fabulous, of Scottish and British history, while Titus Andronicus and Timon of Athens are legendary plays from the stories of Rome and of Ancient Greece. Of the dramas which belong in the main to authentic history, there are two groups—the Roman plays and the English. To the former group belong Coriolanus, Julius Cæsar, and Antony and Cleopatra. The English historical plays (setting aside that one which treats of the period of earliest date, King John, and that which presents the most recent events, Henry VIII) fall into two series—a series occupied with the rise of the House of Lancaster, consisting of four plays, viz Richard II, 1 Henry IV, 2 Henry IV, Henry V, and a series occupied with the rise and fall of the House of York, in like manner consisting of four plays, viz the three parts of Henry VI and Richard III. For these pieces Shakspeare mainly drew his materials from the annalist, Hollinshed (p. 90), and both in their form and peculiar excellences this class of dramas was carried by Shakspeare to a wonderful degree of perfection. These pieces are not tragedies nor comedies in the strict sense of the word, but they are grand panoramas of national glory or national distress, embracing often a very considerable space of time, and retracing, with apparent irregularity in their plan, but with an astonishing unity of general feeling and sentiment, great epochs in the life of the nation.

The second general category, that of pieces derived from fiction, need not detain us long. The materials for this—the largest—class of his dramas, Shakspeare derived mainly from the Italian novelists and their imitators, who supplied the chief element of light literature in the sixteenth century. The most brilliant type of this species of writer was Boccaccio, whose Novelle, translated and copied into all the tongues of Europe, furnished a mass of excellent materials, from Chaucer down to La Fontaine. It cannot be shown that in any one instance Shakspeare took the trouble to invent a plot for himself. The circumstance is noteworthy that while Fletcher and the younger contemporaries of Shakspeare endeavoured to attract audiences by novel incidents and an appeal to the vulgar appetite of curiosity, the poet of nobler inventive genius preferred subjects with which his spectators were already familiar, and these he new-created into a higher form of existence by breathing into them the breath of his own feelings and imagination. How nobly he performed his task may be perceived by a simple comparison of the original novel or poem which he selected as the groundwork of his pieces, with such plays as Romeo and Juliet, As You Like It, or The Winter's Tale. The number of Shakspeare's pieces derived from fiction amounts to nineteen. We are not to infer that the poet necessarily consulted the tales in the Italian and other foreign languages. From a careful examination of his works it seems to result that our great dramatist has rarely made use, whether in the way of subjects for his plays or quotations introduced into the dialogue, of any ancient or foreign materials not then existing in English translations, and this important fact, while it is far from compelling us to the monstrous conclusion that Shakspeare was an illiterate man, yet furnishes proof that Ben Jonson was neither an envious carper nor a malicious perverter of the truth when, in his noble tribute to the genius of his departed friend, he describes him as having "small Latin and less Greek." We may also remark that what Jonson, one of the most learned men of his day, would characterise as small, may have been in reality no inconsiderable tincture of scholarship.

The following general classification endeavours to throw the plays of Shakspeare, considered in reference to their sources, into some general groups, and to indicate in the case of each play the original—history, novel, or poem—from which the dramatist drew his materials—

I. HISTORY.

1. Legends,—

Titus Andronicus (Tragedy). Probably an older play on the same subject, A ballad (if later than Shakspeare's play)

Timon of Athens (Tragedy). North's Plutarch; Lucian; Painter's Palace of Pleasure

Hamlet (Tragedy). An older play The Historie of

- Hamlet*, translated from the French of Belleforest, the Chronicle of Saxo-Grammaticus Lear (Tragedy) An older play, Hollinshed (The Episode of Gloster and his sons is partly taken from Sidney's Arcadia) The demonology is taken from Dr Howarts
Cymbeline (Tragi-comedy) Hollinshed, Boccacio's Decamerone (Day 2 Nov 9), (?) an English version of Boccacio's story, entitled, "Westward for Smells"
Macbeth (Tragedy) Hollinshed (two parts of the history combined)

11 Authentic —

(a) Roman

- Julius Caesar* (Tragedy) North's Plutarch
Antony and Cleopatra (Tragedy) North's Plutarch.
Coriolanus (Tragedy) North's Plutarch.

(b) English

- King John*. An older play on the same subject, Hollinshed
Tetralogy of York { Henry VI, Part I. Hollinshed, Hall
Tetralogy of Lancaster { Henry VI, Part II } Older plays, entitled "The first Part of the Contention," and "The True Tragedie of Richard, Duke of Yorke"
 { ——— Part III }
 { Richard III Hollinshed, Sir Thomas More, Hall, (?) "The True Tragedie of Richard III"
 { Richard II Hollinshed, Hall (a few touches), (?) Daniel's Civil Wars
 { Henry IV, Part I } Hollinshed, an old play, entitled "The Famous Victories of Henry V" { ——— Part II }
 { Henry V }
 { Henry VIII Hollinshed; Hall, Cavendish's Life of Wolsey

II FICTION

- Love's Labour's Lost* (Comedy) Source unknown
Comedy of Errors (Comedy) The Menæchmi and Amphitruus of Plautus (?) an old play, The Historie of Error, 1576-77
Two Gentlemen of Verona (Comedy) La Dama, by Jorge de Montemayor (1 translation of Bartholomew Young), (?) an older play, entitled "The History of Felix and Philomena" (1584)
A Midsummer Night's Dream (Comedy) Chaucer, Knight's Tale, Wife of Bath's Tale, and Legend of Good Women (Tisbe of Babylon)
Romeo and Juliet (Tragedy) Arthur Brook's Tragicall Historie of Romeus and Juliet, Paynter's Palace of Pleasure
Merchant of Venice (Comedy) (?) An older English play, Il Pecorone, by Giovanni Fiorentino, Gesta Romanorum (?) Ballad of Gernulus the Jew
Taming of the Shrew (Comedy) An older piece, 'The Taming of a Shrew,' "Supposes" translated from Ariosto by Gascoigne

- Merry Wives of Windsor* (Comedy) "The Two Lovers of Pisa," in Tarleton's News out of Purgatorie, Il Pecorone, Le tredici piacevoli notti del S Gio Francesco Straparola
- Much Ado About Nothing* (Comedy) The Episodo of Ariodant and Ginevra in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, (1) an older play, Bandello's 22nd Novel, (1) Lucie Quene, B u, Canto IV, Stanzas 19-29
- As You Like It* (Comedy). Lodge's Rosalynde, and the Cob'e's Tale of Gamelyn.
- Twelfth Night* (Comedy) A novel of Bandello (1 translation by Barnabio Richo), Two Italian comedies (1) Gl' Inquanti, (2) Gl' Inquanti
- All's Well that Ends Well* (Comedy) The story of Giletta of Narbona in Paynter's Palace of Pleasure (taken from Boccaccio's Decameron, Day 3, Nov. 9)
- Measure for Measure* (Comedy) Whotstone's play, "The Historie of Promos and Cussandra" (derived from Girardo Cinthio's Hecatommiti u., iii, 5)
- Othello* (Tragedy) Girardo Cinthio's Hecatommiti i., iii, 7
- Troilus and Cressida* (Tragi-comedy) Chaucer, Troilus and Creseyde, Lydgate, Troy Book, Caxton, Recuyles, or Destruction of Troy, Chipman's Homer
- Pericles* (Comedy) Gower's Confessio Amantis, Gesta Romanorum, Twine's Pattern of Painfull Adcentures
- The Tempest* (Comedy) Source unknown 1 an older play, Silvestor Jourdan's Discovery of the Bermudas. (Jacob Ayer's play Die Schöne Sidea, was perhaps translated from an old English play on which Shakspeare may have founded The Tempest)
- The Winter's Tale* (Comedy) Greene's "Pandosto, the Triumph of Time," 1568 (in subsequent impressions, entitled "The History of Dorastus and Fawnia")
- Two Noble Kinsmen* (Tragi-Comedy) Chaucer's Knyght's Tale

§ 10. In the historical department of the above classification it will be seen that many plays were based upon preceding dramatic works treating of the same, or nearly the same, subjects, and in some cases we possess the more ancient pieces themselves, exhibiting different degrees of imperfection and barbarism. We thus are in a position to compare the changes introduced by the consummate art of Shakspeare into the rude draughts of his theatrical predecessors, and to appreciate the wise economy he showed in retaining what suited his purpose, as well as the skill he exhibited in modifying and altering what did not. In three or four examples we have more than one edition of the same play in its different stages towards complete perfection under the hand of Shakspeare, instances of which may be cited in the cases of Romeo and Juliet and Hamlet. A careful and minute collation of such various editions furnishes us with precious materials for the investigation of one of the most interesting and profitable problems that literary criticism can approach—the tracing of the different phases of elaboration through which every great work must pass. It is no mean privilege to be thus admitted, as it were, into the studio of the mighty painter, the laboratory of the mighty chemist—to mark the touches, sometimes bold, sometimes almost imperceptible in their delicacy, which transform the rugged sketch into the highly-finished picture, the apparently insignificant operations by which the rude ore is transformed into the consummate jewel. It is like being admitted into the penetralia of nature herself. The first impression which strikes the reader when he makes acquaintance with the Historical and Legendary category of Shakspeare's dramas, is the astonishing force and completeness with which the poet seized the general and salient peculiarities of the age and country which he undertook to reproduce. With the limited and imperfect scholarship that he probably possessed, this power is the mere extraordinary, and shows that his vast mind must have proceeded in a manner eminently synthetic, he first made his characters true to general and universal humanity, and then gave them the peculiar distinguishing traits appropriate to their particular period and country. His persons are true portraits of Romans, for example, because they are first true portraits of men. His great contemporary Jonson has shown a far more accurate and extensive knowledge of the details of Roman manners, ceremonies, and institutions, but his personages, admirable as they are, are entirely deficient in that intense human reality which Shakspeare never fails to communicate to his dramatis personæ. The nature of the Historical Play, as it was understood by Shakspeare, admitted, and even required, the adoption of an extensive epoch as the subject, and a numerous crowd of agents as the material, of such pieces, and it is not too much to say, that in all the personages so introduced, from the most prominent down to the most obscure, the reader may detect, if he takes the necessary pains, that every one had, in the mind of the author, a separate and distinct individuality, equally true to universal and to particular nature. Nay, in comparing such subjects as are drawn from different periods in the history of his own or other nations, in ancient or modern times, we may remark the singular felicity with which this great creator has differentiated, so to say, various phases in the character, social or political, of a people: thus the Romans in Coriolanus are very different from the Romans in Julius Caesar or Antony and Cleopatra, though equally true to general human nature and to the particular nature of the Roman people at the different epochs selected. The same extraordinary power of differentiating is equally perceptible in the English historical plays, as will plainly be seen on comparing King John, for example, with Henry IV or Henry V. This power of throwing himself into a given epoch is, in Shakspeare, carried to a degree which cannot be justly qualified as anything short of superhuman. It is true that in these plays we find instances of gross anachronism in detail, but these anachronisms never touch the essential truth of the delineation. Shakspeare may make a hero of the Trojan War quote Aristotle, or he may arm the Romans of Pharsalia with the Spanish rapier of the sixteenth century; but he never infects the language and sentiments of classical times with the conceits of gallant and courtly compliment that were current in the age of Louis XIV. In the scenes of private and domestic life which he has freely intermingled with the stirring and heroic episodes of war or policy, his knowledge of human nature enables him to paint with an equally firm and masterly touch the hero and the man. The delicate task of giving glimpses into the private life of great historical personages, which we find generally evaded in all other authors who have treated such subjects, is a proof of the supremacy of Shakspeare's genius. The same thing may be said of the boldness with which he has introduced comic incidents and characters amid the most lofty and solemn events of history, and as frequently and successfully in his Roman as in his English plays. In the two parts of Henry IV the heroic and familiar are side by side, and the Prince's adventures with the imitable Falstaff and his other pleasant but disreputable companions, are closely intermingled with the majestic march of the great historical events. Thus shows that Shakspeare, far from fearing, as an inferior artist would have done, the juxtaposition of the familiar and the sublime, the wildest and most fantastic comedy with the loftiest and gravest tragedy, not only made such apparently discordant elements mutually heighten and complete the general effect which he contemplated, but in so doing teaches us that in human life the sublime and the ridiculous are side by side, and that the source of laughter is placed close by the fountain of tears. That some of the historical plays are much inferior to others of the collection is manifest. The inferior plays are with one exception the earlier in date, and in the case of the three parts of Henry VI it is difficult to ascertain what portions of the plays proceeded from the hand of Shakspeare. It has been already noticed that the play of Henry VIII, nobly conceived by Shakspeare, was completed in a different spirit and manner, and with a different intention by Fletcher. From a tragedy, or at least a play of grave import, the drama was transformed into a spectacle appealing to the eye, with ceremonious passages of courtly compliment. The peculiarity of Fletcher's versification enables us to separate his parts from those contributed by Shakspeare. It may be interesting and useful to the reader to compare the manner of the two writers as seen in the portions of the play which are assigned to each—Shakspeare Act 1, Sc 1 and Sc. 2

Act II, Sc 3 and Sc 4 Act III, Sc. 2 (to exit of King Henry).
Act V, Sc. 1 (? altered by Fletcher) Fletcher the remainder of the play, including the Prologue and Epilogue

§ 11 But a general conception of the dramatic genius of Shakspeare must be founded upon an examination of all his pieces, and while the historical dramas show how he could free his mind from the trammels imposed by the necessity of adhering to real facts and persons, the romantic portion of his pieces, or those founded upon Fiction, will equally prove that the freedom of an ideal subject did not deprive him of the strictest fidelity to general nature. The characters that move through the action of these latter dramas exhibit the same consummate appreciation of the general and the individual in humanity, and though he has occasionally stepped over the boundary of ordinary human nature, and has created a multitude of supernatural beings, fairies, spirits, witches, and other creatures of the imagination, even in these the severest consistency and the strictest verisimilitude never for a moment abandon him. They are always constantes sibi, we know that such beings do not and cannot exist, but we irresistibly feel, in reading the scenes in which they appear, that if they did exist, they could not exist other than as he has painted them. The data being established, the consequences, to the most remote and trivial details, flow from them in a manner that no analysis can gainsay. In the mode of delineating passion and feeling Shakspeare proceeds as only the greatest dramatic authors can. Some writers create a personage by accumulating in it all such traits as their reading and observation show to usually accompany the fundamental elements which go to form its constitution, and thus they fall into the error of making their personages embodiments of such and such a moral peculiarity. They give us admirable and complete monographs of ambition, of avarice, of hypocrisy and the like. Moreover, in the expression of their feelings, whether tragic or comic, such characters almost universally describe the sensations they experience. This men and women in real life never do. Nay, when under the influence of strong emotion or other powerful moral impression, we indicate to others what we feel, rather, and far more powerfully, by what we suppress than by what we utter. In this respect the men and women of Shakspeare exactly resemble the men and women of real life, and not the men and women of the stage. Nor has he ever fallen into the common error of forgetting the infinite complexity of human character. If we analyze any one of the prominent personages of Shakspeare, though we may often at first sight perceive in it the predominance of some one quality or passion, on a nearer view we shall find that the complexity of its moral being goes on widening and deepening with every new attempt on our part to grasp or sound the whole extent of its individuality. Macaulay has excellently observed that it is easy to say, for example, that the primary characteristic of Shylock is revengefulness, but that a closer insight shows a thousand other qualities in him, the mutual play and varying intensity of which go to compose the complex being that Shakspeare has drawn in the terrible Jew. Nothing is more childish than the superficial judgment which identifies the great creations of Shakspeare with some prominent moral or intellectual characteristic. His conceptions are as multiform as those of nature herself, and as the physiologist knows that even in the plant or mollusc of apparently the simplest construction there are depths of organization which bid defiance to all attempts to fathom them, so in the characters of the great painter of humanity, there is a variety which grows more and more bewildering the more earnestly we strive to penetrate its mysteries. This wonderful power of conceiving complex character is at the bottom of another distinguishing peculiarity of our great poet, namely, the total absence in his works of any tendency to self-reproduction. To deduce from the dramas of Shakspeare any notion of what were the sympathies and tendencies of their author is a task of the utmost hazard and difficulty. The poet is marvellously impersonal, or, rather, he is all persons in turn. Let us suppose a man capable of conceiving and delineating such a picture of jealousy as we have in the tragedy of Othello. Would not such a man be irresistibly impelled to do a second time what he had so admirably done the first? But Shakspeare, when he has once thrown off such a character as Othello, never recurs to it again. Othello disappears from the stage as completely as a real Othello would have done from the world, and leaves behind him no similar personage. True, Shakspeare has given us a number of other pictures of jealous men, but their jealousy is as different from that of Othello as in real life the jealousy of one man is different from that of another. Leontes, Ford, Posthumus, are all equally jealous, but how differently is the passion manifested in each of these! In the female characters, too, what a wonderful range, what an inexhaustible variety! Perhaps in no class of his impersonations is the depth, the delicacy, and the extent of Shakspeare's creative power more visible than in his women, for we must not forget that in conceiving these exquisitely varied types of female character, he knew that they would be entrusted in representation, to boys or young men—no female having acted on the stage till long after the age which witnessed such creations as Herionie, Lady Macbeth, Rosalind or Juliet. We may conceive what a chill it must have been to the imagination of a poet to be conscious that a marvel of female delicacy, grandeur, or passion would be personated on the stage by a performer of the other sex, and that the author would feel what

Shakspeare has so powerfully expressed in the language of his own Cleopatra

"The quick comedians
Extemporally will stage us Antony
Shall be brought drunken forth, and I shall see
Some squeaking Cleopatra boy my greatness."

Surely the power of ideal creation has never undergone a severer ordeal Shakspeare's triumph over this great practical difficulty is the more surprising as there is perhaps no class of his personages more varied, more profound, and more exquisitely delicate than his female characters

In the expression of strong emotion, as well as in the delineation of character, Shakspeare is superior to all other dramatists, superior to all other poets He never finds it necessary, in order to produce the effect he desires, to have recourse in the one case to violent or declamatory rhetoric, or in the other to unusual or abnormal combinations of qualities In him we meet with no sentimental assassins, no moral monsters,

"Linked with one virtue and a thousand crimes"

Without overstepping the ordinary limits of human experience, he is always able to interest or to instruct us with the exhibition of general passions and feelings, manifesting themselves in the way we generally see them in the world He is like the great painter of antiquity, who produced his ever-varying effects by the aid of four simple colours In the expression, too, he uniformly draws, at least in his finest passages, his illustrations from the most simple and familiar objects, from the most ordinary scenes of life. When a great occasion presents itself, he ever shows himself equal to that occasion. There are, indeed, in his works many passages where he has allowed his taste for intellectual subtleties to get the better of his judgment, and where his passion for playing upon words—a passion which was the literary vice of his day, and the effects of which are traceable in the writings of Bacon as well as in his—is permitted to cool the enthusiasm excited by the situation or the feelings of the speaker But this indulgence in conceits generally disappears in the great culminating moments of intense passion—and while we are speaking of this defect with due critical severity, we must not forget that there are occasions when the intensest moral agitation is not incompatible with a morbid and feverish activity of the intellect, and that the most violent emotion sometimes finds a vent in the intellectual contortions of a conceit. Part of the difficulty of the language of Shakspeare arises from the enormously developed intellectual and imaginative faculty in the poet, leading him to make metaphor of the boldest kind the ordinary tissue of his style. The thoughts rose so fast under his pen, and successively generate others with such a portentous rapidity, that the reader requires almost as great an intellectual vivacity as the poet, in order to trace the leading idea through the labyrinth of subordinate illustration. In all figurative writing the metaphor, the image, is an ornament, something extraneous to the thought it is intended to illustrate, and may be detached from it, leaving the fundamental idea intact. In Shakspeare the metaphor is the very fabric of the thought itself and entirely inseparable from it. His diction may be compared to some elaborate monument of the finest Gothic architecture, in which the superficial glance loses itself in an inextricable maze of sculptural detail and fantastically fretted ornamentation, but where a close examination shows that every pinnacle, every buttress, every moulding is an essential member of the construction. There is assuredly no poet, ancient or modern, from whose writings may be extracted such a number of profound and yet practical observations applicable to the common affairs and interests of life, observations expressed with the simplicity of a casual remark, yet pregnant with the condensed wisdom of philosophy, exhibiting more than the acuteness of De Rochefoucauld, without his cynical contempt for humanity, and more than the practical good sense of Molière, with a far wider and more universal applicability. In the picturing of abnormal and supernatural states of existence, as in the delineation of every phase of mental derangement, or the sentiments and actions of fantastic and supernatural beings, Shakspeare exhibits the same coherency and consistency in the midst of what at first sight appears altogether to transcend ordinary experience. Every grade of folly, from the verge of idiocy to the most fantastic eccentricity, every shade of moral perturbation, from the jealous fury of Othello to the frenzy of Lear, or the not less touching madness of Ophelia, is represented in his plays with a fidelity so complete that the most experienced physiologists have affirmed that such intellectual disturbances may be studied in his pages with as much profit as among the actual patients of a madhouse.

§ 12 The non-dramatic works of Shakspeare consist of two narrative poems, written in stanzas, entitled Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece, the volume of beautiful sonnets whose signification has excited so much controversy, and a few lyrics, some of which appear to have but indifferent claims to be attributed to the great poet. Venus and Adonis exhibits the flush and voluptuous glow of a fervent imagination, united with the laboured superintendence of form and expression natural to a young and careful artist. The story is the common mythological episode of the loves of Venus and the hunter. In the rich and somewhat sensual love-scenes in this poem, in the studious painting from external nature, and in the delicious but somewhat effeminate melody of the verse, we see all the marks of youth, but it is the youth of a Shakspeare. The Rape of Lucrece is a poem which exhibits increased power of dealing with human passion, but still the passion is rather studied, analyzed and laid bare, than represented with dramatic force and directness. The Sonnets of Shakspeare possess a peculiar interest, not only from their intrinsic beauty, but from the circumstance of their containing confessions of the personal feelings of their author, confessions which point to some deep wrongs in love and friendship suffered by the poet. They were printed first in 1609, but from an allusion in Meres's Palladis Tamia, we know that some of them were written before 1598. They are 154 in number, and some are addressed to a high-born youth, while others are intended for a woman of stained character. The poet bitterly complains of the treachery of his friend, and the infidelity of the woman whom he loved, while he speaks both of the one and of the other in the most ardent language of passionate, yet melancholy, devotion. Throughout the whole of these exquisite but painful compositions there runs a deep undercurrent of sorrow, self-discontent, and wounded affection, which bears every mark of being the expression of a real sentiment. Nevertheless, it must be stated that accomplished students have endeavoured to explain away the autobiographical significance of the Sonnets, upon the theory that they were written on wholly imaginary themes, or in the character and to serve the occasion of some of the poet's patrons. The volume was dedicated, on its first appearance, by the publisher, Thomas Thorpe, to "Mr W H.," who is described as the "only begetter" of the sonnets, some critics have supposed that this mysterious "Mr W H." was no other than William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, one of Shakspeare's most powerful friends, while others identify the unknown begetter with the Earl of Southampton. The whole production is shrouded in mystery, and we must content ourselves with admiring the deep tenderness, the melancholy grace, the play of poetical fancy, and the weight of moral reflection which may be found in these poems, without endeavouring to solve the enigma,—unquestionably a painful and personal one,—involved in the circumstances under which they were composed.¹

¹ A careful examination of the whole subject, with a resume of the many theories of the Sonnets, will be found in Professor Dowden's edition of the Sonnets.

BOOKS USEFUL IN THE STUDY OF SHAKSPEARE

TEXT — The Cambridge Shakespeare (giving in foot-notes all the readings of the early editions) Booth's Reprint of the First Folio EDITIONS WITH NOTES — The Variorum Shakespeare of 1821 (Boswell's Malone), contains all the best notes up to that date. Besides the well known editions of Dyce, Staunton, Knight, and Collier, may be mentioned R. Grant White's edition (Boston, 1872, text following generally the 1st Folio, notes good and not over-copious), and Delius's Shakspeare's Werke (English Text, German notes, brief and excellent). Furness's admirable Variorum Shakespeare will supersede the edition of 1821; but only two plays are as yet published, Romeo and Juliet and Macbeth.

GLOSSARIES, &c. — Mrs. Cowden Clarke's Concordance to the Plays, Mrs. Furness's Concordance to the Poems; Schmidt's Shakespeare-Lexicon (A to L published).

Dyce's Glossary (last vol. of his Shakespeare) Nares' Glossary

GRAMMAR, VERSIFICATION — Abbott's Shakespearian Grammar, Sidney Walker, Criticisms on Shakespeare and Shakespeare's Versification Bathurst's Changes in Shakespeare's Versification

SOURCES — Collier's Shakespeare Library, Smarock's On the Plots of Shakespeare's Plays (Shakespeare Society, 1850) Skottowe's Life of Shakespeare. W. G. Hazlitt's Shakespeare's Library

COMMENTARIES. — S. T. Coleridge, Lectures on Shakespeare Gervinus's Shakespeare Commentaries (ed. 1875 contains a valuable preface by F. J. Furnivall, Gervinus treats the plays, in great detail, chronologically) Mrs. Jameson's Characteristics of Homer (on the female characters of Shakespeare) Prof. Dowden's Shakspeare, his Mind and Art (studies the growth of the poet's character and genius through his works, considered chronologically) Hudson's Shakespeare, his Life, Art, and Characters (the best commentary by any American critic), Hazlitt's Characters of Shakspeare's Plays Courtenay's Commentaries on the Historical Plays (dry, but valuable for a comparison of the plays with Holinshed), Knight's Shakspeare Studies

On Shakespeare's Life the most important recent contributions have been made by Mr. Halliwell. For a convenient and well arranged summary of the facts, see S. Nell's Shakespeare, a Critical Biography

Of German Commentaries Schlegel's Gervinus's, and Ulrich's have been translated (The last edition of Ulrich's Shakespeare's Dramatische Kunst contains much additional matter) Kreyssig's Vorlesungen über Shakespeare, and a smaller work, Shakespeare Fragen, contain criticisms of a high order. Hertzberg's prefaces to certain plays (in the German Shakespeare Society's edition of Schlegel's and Tieck's translation of Shakespeare) are particularly valuable with reference to characteristics of versification. The Deutsche Shakespeare Gesellschaft has published ten annual volumes, containing many articles of importance.

'The New Shakspeare Society,' under the direction of F. J. Furnivall, has published, besides transactions (containing very important Shakspeare studies; certain reprints of early quartos and a series of Shakspeare Allusion Books, and is at present actively advancing the study of our great poet.

CHAPTER VIII

THE SHAKSPEARIAN DRAMATISTS

- § 1 BEN JONSON His life § 2 His tragedies and comedies § 3 His masques and other works § 4 BEAUMONT and FLETCHER. § 5 MAS-SINGER. § 6 FORD § 7 WEBSTER. § 8 CHAPMAN, DEKKER, MIDDLETON, MARSTON, and other minor Dramatists § 9 SHIRLEY
 § 10 Remarks on the Elizabethan drama

§ 1 THE age of Elizabeth and James I produced a galaxy of great dramatic poets, the like of whom, whether we regard the nature or the degree of excellence exhibited in their works, the world has never seen. In the general style of their writings, they bear a strong family resemblance to Shakspeare, and indeed many of the peculiar merits of their great prototype may be found scattered among his various contemporaries, and in some instances carried to a height little inferior to that found in his writings. Thus intensity of pathos hardly less touching than that of Shakspeare may be found in the dramas of Ford, gallant animation and dignity in the dialogues of Beaumont and Fletcher, deep tragic emotion in the sombre scenes of Webster, noble moral elevation in the graceful plays of Massinger, but in Shakspeare, and in Shakspeare alone, do we see the consummate union of all the most opposite qualities of the poet, the observer, and the philosopher.

The name which stands next to that of Shakspeare in the list of these illustrious dramatists is that of BEN JONSON (1573-1637), a vigorous and solid genius, built high with learning and knowledge of life, and whose numerous works, dramatic as well as other, possess an imposing and somewhat monumental weight. He was born in 1573, and was consequently nine years younger than Shakspeare. His career was full of strange vicissitudes. Though compelled by a stepfather to follow the humble trade of a bricklayer, he succeeded in gratifying an intense thirst for learning. The statement that he passed some time, with the assistance of a patron, at the University of Cambridge, is discredited by his own silence. At all events he studied with a diligence that certainly rendered him one of the most learned men of his age—an age fertile in learned men. He is known to have served some time as a soldier in the Low Countries, and to have distinguished himself by his courage in the field, but his theatrical career seems to have begun when he was about 20 years of age, when we find him attached as an actor to one of the minor theatres, called the Cuitain His success as a performer is said to have been very small, arising most probably from want of grace and beauty of person, and there is no reason to suppose that his theatrical career differed from the almost universal type of the actor-dramatists of that age While still a very young man he fought a duel with one of his fellow-actors, whom he had the misfortune to kill, receiving at the same time a severe wound, and for this infringement of the law, which at that particular period was punished with extreme severity, the poet was (to use his own words) "brought near the gallows" Among other vicissitudes of life, Jonson is related to have twice changed his religion, having been converted by a Jesuit to the Roman Catholic faith, and to have afterwards again returned to the bosom of his mother-Church, on which last occasion he is said, when receiving the Sacrament on his reconversion, to have drunk out the whole chalice, in sign of the sincerity of his recantation

His first-dramatic work, the Comedy of Every Man in his Humour, is assigned to the year 1596 This piece, the action and characters of which were originally Italian, failed in its first representation, and there is a tradition, far from improbable in itself, that Shakspeare, who was then in the full blaze of his popularity, advised the young aspirant to make some changes in the piece and to transfer its action to England Two years afterwards the comedy, with considerable alterations, was brought out a second time, at Shakspeare's theatre of the Globe, and then with triumphant success. One of the few parts which Shakspeare is known to have personated on the stage is that of Old Knowel, the jealous merchant, in this comedy Thus was probably laid the foundation of that warm and solid friendship between Jonson and Shakspeare, which appears to have continued during their whole lives, and the existence of which is proved not only by many pleasant anecdotes recording the gay and witty social intercourse of the two great poets, but by the enthusiastic, and yet discriminating, eulogy in which Jonson—who was not a man to give light or unconsidered praise—has honoured the memory and described the genius of his friend From the moment of this second representation of his comedy Ben Jonson's literary reputation was established, and during the remainder of his very active career, though the success of particular pieces may have fluctuated, Jonson undoubtedly occupied a place at the very head of the dramatic authors of his day His social and generous, though coarse and somewhat overbearing character, the extraordinary power and richness of his conversation, contributed to make him one of the most prominent figures in the literary society of that day His "wit-combats" at the famous taverns of the Mermaid, the Devil, and the Fulcon, have been commemorated in many anecdotes, and he even appears to have been regarded at last as a sort of intellectual potentate, much as his great namesake Samuel Johnson was afterwards, and to have conferred upon his favourites the title of his sons "sealing them," as he says in one of his epigrams, "of the tribe of Ben."

His first comedy was followed in the succeeding year by Every Man Out of his Humour, and his literary activity continued to be very great, for in 1603 he gave to the world his tragedy of Sejournus, and in 1605 he appears to have had some share, with Chapman, Marston, Dekker, and other dramatists, in the piece of Eastward Ho! a comedy which called down upon all connected with it a severe persecution from the Court, which was bitterly offended by certain satirical allusions to the favour then accorded by King James to his Scottish countrymen. Jonson was involved in this persecution, and there is a story that the guilty wits having been condemned to have their noses slit, Jonson generously refused to abandon his associates, and that his mother had prepared for herself and him "a strong and lusty poison," to enable him to escape the ignominy of such a disfigurement. With the frank and violent character of Jonson it was impossible that he could escape continual quarrels and disputes, so difficult to avoid in a literary career, and particularly in the dramatic profession. Thus we have notices of violent feuds between him and Dekker, Chapman, Marston and others, as well as Inigo Jones, the Court architect and arranger of festivities and masques, whose favour seems to have given great umbrage to the proud and self-confident nature of old Ben. Many of these literary quarrels may be traced in the dramatic works of Jonson and his contemporaries, who used the stage as a vehicle for mutual attack and recrimination. In rapid succession between 1603 and 1612 followed some of Jonson's finest works, Volpone, Epicene, the Alchemist, and the tragedy of Catiline. In the latter year he was appointed Laureate or Court poet, and was frequently employed in getting up those splendid and fantastic entertainments called masques, in which magnificence of scenery, decoration, and costume, ingenious, allegorical, and mythological personages, exquisite music, dancing, and declamation were made the instruments for paying extravagant compliments to the king and the great personages of the court, on occasion of any festivity at the palace or in the mansions of the great. These charming compositions, in which Jonson exhibited all the stores of his invention and all the resources of his vast and elegant scholarship, were represented sometimes by actors, but often by the ladies and gentlemen of the court, and were performed not in the public theatres but in palaces and great houses, both in London and the country. Many of Jonson's later pieces were entirely unsuccessful, and in one of the last, the New Inn, acted in 1630, the poet complains bitterly of the hostility and bad taste of the audience. Towards the end of his life Ben Jonson appears to have fallen into poverty, aggravated by disappointment and ill-health, the latter probably caused by his too great fondness for copious libations of sack. He died in 1637, in the twelfth year of the reign of Charles I., and was buried, it is said, in a vertical position, in the churchyard of Westminster, the stone over his grave having been inscribed with the excellent and laconic words, "O rare Ben Jonson!"

§ 2. The dramatic as well as the other works of this great poet are so numerous that I must content myself with a very cursory survey of them. They are of various degrees of merit, ranging from an excellence not surpassed by any contemporary excepting Shakspeare, to the lowest point of laborious mediocrity. Two of them are tragedies, the Fall of Sejanus and the Conspiracy of Catiline. The subjects of both these plays are borrowed from the Roman historians, and the dialogue and action in both may be regarded as a mosaic of striking and brilliant extracts from the Latin literature, reproduced by Jonson with such a consummate force and vigour that we may call him a Roman author who composed in English. Nothing can exceed the minute accuracy with which all the details of the Roman manners, ceremonies, religion, and sentiments are reproduced, and yet the effect of the whole is singularly stiff and unpleasing, partly perhaps from the absence of pathos and tenderness which characterises Jonson's mind, and partly from the unmanageable nature of the subjects, the hero in both cases being so odious that no art can secure for his fate the sympathy of the reader. Many of the scenes, however, particularly those of a declamatory character, as the trial of Silus and Crematius Cordus before the abject Senate, the appearance of Tiberius, and the magnificent oration in which Petreus describes the defeat and death of Catiline, are of extraordinary power and grandeur. Of comedies, properly so called, Jonson composed fifteen, the best of which are incontestably Every Man in his Humour, Volpone, Epicene or the Silent Woman, and the Alchemist. The plots or intrigues of Jonson are far superior to those of the generality of his contemporaries: he always constructed them himself, and with great care and skill. Those of Volpone and the Silent Woman for example, though some of the incidents are extravagant, are admirable for the constructive skill they display, and for the art with which each detail is made to contribute to the catastrophe. The general effect, however, of Jonson's plays, though abundantly satisfactory to the reason, is hard and defective to the taste. The character of his mind was eminently analytic, he dissected the vices, the follies, and the affectations of society, and presented them to the reader rather like anatomical preparations than like men and women. His observation was extensive and acute, but his mind loved to dwell rather upon the eccentricities and monstrosities of human nature than upon those universal features with which all can sympathise as all possess them. His mind was singularly deficient in what is called humanity, his point of view is invariably that of the satirist, and thus, as he fixed his attention chiefly upon what was abnormal, many of his most elaborately-drawn portraits are a sort of dry, harsh, abstruse caricatures of absurdities which were peculiar to the manners and society of that day, and appear to us as strange and quaint as the pictures of our ancestors in their stiff and fantastic dresses. The satiric tendency of Jonson's mind, too, induced him to take his materials, both for intrigue and character, from odious or repulsive sources, thus the subject of two of his finest pieces, Volpone and the Alchemist, turns entirely upon a series of ingenious cheats and rascalities, all the persons, without exception, being either scoundrels or their dupes. Nevertheless, in spite of these peculiarities, the knowledge of character displayed by Jonson is so vast, the force and vigour of expression is so unbounded, he has poured forth into his dialogue such a wonderful wealth of illustration drawn from men as well as books, that his comedies form a study eminently substantial. In some of them, as in Poetaster, Bartholomew Fair, and the Tale of a Tub, Jonson has attacked particular persons and parties as Dekkar in the first, the Puritans in the second, and Inigo Jones in the third, but these pieces can have but little interest for the modern reader. The tone of morality which prevails throughout Jonson's works is high and manly, and he is particularly remarkable for the lofty standard he invariably claims for the social value of the poet, the dramatist, and the satirist. Though he has too often devoted his great powers to the delineation of those oddities and absurdities which were then called humours, and which may be defined as natural follies and weaknesses exaggerated by affectation, he has traced more than one truly comic personage, the interest of which must be permanent, thus his admirable type of coward braggadocio in Bobadill will always deserve to occupy a place in the great gallery of human folly. The want of tenderness and delicacy which I have ascribed to Jonson will be especially perceived in the harsh and unamiable characters which he has given to his female persons. Without stamping him as a woman-hater, it may be said that there is hardly one female character in all his dramas which is represented in a graceful or attractive light, while a great many of them are absolutely repulsive from their coarseness and their vices.

§ 3 It is singular that while Jonson in his plays should be distinguished for that hardness and dryness which I have endeavoured to point out, this same poet, in another large and beautiful category of his works, should be remarkable for the elegance and refinement of his invention and his style. In the Masques and Court Entertainments which he composed for the amusement of the king and the great nobles, as well as in the charming fragment of a pastoral drama entitled 'The Sad Shepherd,' Jonson appears quite another man. Everything that the richest and most delicate invention could supply, aided by extensive, elegant, and recondite reading, is lavished upon these courtly compliments, the gracefulness of which almost makes us forget their adulation and servility. This servility, it should be remarked, was the fashion of the times, and was carried quite as far towards the pedantic and imbecile James as it had been towards his great predecessor Elizabeth. Of such masques and entertainments Jonson composed about 35, many of which exhibit a richness and playfulness of invention which have never been surpassed. These productions were, of course, generally short, and depended in a great measure for their effect upon the scenes, machinery, costumes, dances, and songs with which they were thickly interspersed. The magnificence sometimes displayed in these spectacles was extraordinary, and forms a striking contrast with the beggarly mise en scène of the regular theatres of those days. Among the most beautiful of these masques we may mention Pan's Anniversary, the Masque of Oberon, and the Masque of Queens. In the dialogue of these slight pieces, as well as in the lyrics which are frequently introduced, we see how graceful and melodious could become the genius of this great poet, though generally attuned to the severer notes of the satiric muse. Besides his dramatic works Jonson left a very large quantity of literary remains in prose and verse. The former portion contains many curious and valuable notes made by Jonson on books and men, among which are particularly interesting the references to Shakspeare and Bacon, and the latter consists chiefly of epigrams written in the manner of Martial, and sometimes containing interesting notices of contemporary persons and things. All these are pregnant with wit, fancy, and solid learning, and confirm the idea which we derive from Jonson's dramas of the power, richness, and variety of his genius.

§ 4 Superior to Ben Jonson in variety and animation, though hardly equal to him in solidity of knowledge, were the two illustrious dramatists who worked together with so intimate an union that it is impossible, in the works composed before their friendship was dissolved by death, to separate their contributions. These were BEAUMONT (1586-1616) and FLETCHER (1576-1625), both men of a higher social status, by birth and by education, than the generality of the dramatists of this splendid epoch, for Beaumont was of noble family, and the son of a judge, while Fletcher was son to Bishop Fletcher an ecclesiastic, however, of no very enviable reputation, in the Spanish Curate, Beggars' Bush, and Rule a Wife and Have a Wife. But a mere enumeration of the principal dramas of these animated and prolific playwrights will be found tiresome and unsatisfactory. I will therefore, after making a few general remarks on the genius and manner of Beaumont and Fletcher, note such peculiarities in their principal plays as my limited space will permit. The first quality which strikes the reader in making acquaintance with these poets is the singularly airy, free, and animated manner in which they exhibit incident, sentiment, and action. They evidently wrote with great ease and rapidity, and their productions, though occasionally offending against the rules of good taste and propriety, are never deficient in the tone of good society. Their dialogue, far less crowded with thought than that of Shakspeare, and less burdened with scholarlike allusion than that of Jonson, is singularly vivacious and flowing. Their style, though not altogether free from affectation, is wonderfully limpid, and will generally be found much easier to understand at the first glance than that of Shakspeare—a clearness which arises from less complexity in the ideas. They often attain, in their more poetical and declamatory passages, a high elevation both of tragic and romantic eloquence. In the delineation of character and passion they are inferior to the great artist with whom they have not seldom ventured to measure their strength, and if ever they have deserved the high honour of being compared for a moment with Shakspeare, it must be remembered that we must select, as the subject of such comparison, not the deeper and vaster creations of the great master's genius,

“For in that circle none durst walk but he,”—

Not, in short, such works as Hamlet, Lear, Othello, but rather what may be called his secondary pieces, such as Much Ado About Nothing, Measure for Measure, or the Tempest—works in which the graceful, fantastic, and romantic element predominate. In this department Beaumont and Fletcher are no unworthy rivals to the greatest of dramatists. They possess high comic powers in the delineation of violently farcical and extravagant characters. Their portraiture of bragging cowardice in Bessus is one of the finest and completest delineations which the stage has given, while in such quaint and outrageously ludicrous impersonations as these of Lazarille, the hungry courtier who is in vain pursuit of the “umbra's head,” which is the object of his idolatry, they have touched the very brink to which humorous extravagance can be carried. Their plots, like these of Shakspeare, are often carelessly constructed and improbable in incident, but the curiosity of the reader is always kept alive by striking situations and amusing turns of fortune. Their materials are similar to those which the romantic dramatists of that age generally employed—Italian and French novels, and sometimes legendary or authentic history. It should be remarked, however, that they have never once attempted, like Shakspeare, the historical drama, founded upon the annals of their own country, though they have freely used materials derived from Roman chronicles—as in their tragedy of the False One, in which they seem to have intended to try their strength against Julius Cæsar,—and from the legendary history of the Middle Ages, as in Rollo, Thierry and Theodoret, and other pieces. They are singularly happy in the delineation of noble and chivalrous feeling, the love and friendship of young and gallant souls, and their numerous portraits of valiant veterans may be pronounced unequalled. As examples of the former I may cite the personages of Philaster, of Arbaces, of Palamides and Arcite, of Arcas in the Loyal Subject and, above all, of Caratach in the tragedy of Bonduca. They possess the art of rendering a character vicious, and even criminal, without making it forfeit all claims to our sympathy, and thus exhibit a true sense of humanity. A striking example of this is the erring but generous hero of A King and No King. Their pathos, though frequently exhibited, is rather tender than deep. Among the most striking instances of this I may refer to the Maid's Tragedy, one of their most admired and elaborate works. The grief of Aspasia and the despair of Evadne are worked up to a high pitch of tragic emotion. In the Two Noble Kinsmen, the subject of which is borrowed from the Knight's Tale of Chaucer, the dignity of chivalrous friendship is portrayed with the highest and most heroic spirit. In this play the scenes exhibiting the love and madness of the Gaele's Daughter show an evident imitation of the character of Ophelia, and there can be no higher praise to Beaumont and Fletcher than to confess that they come out of the contest beaten indeed, but not disgraced. Excellent too are they in pictures of simple tenderness and sorrow: there are few things in dramatic literature more pathetic than the character and death of the little heroic Prince Hengo in the tragedy of Bonduca. But it is perhaps in their pieces of mixed sentiment, containing comic matter intermingled with romantic and elevated incidents, that Beaumont and Fletcher's genius shines out in its full effulgence. It is on such occasions that we see them rise without effort and sink without meaness. Perhaps no better examples of this—the most charming—phase of their peculiar talent can be selected than the comedies of the Elder Brother, Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, Beggars' Bush, and the Spanish Curate. In the third-mentioned piece the romantic and the farcical intrigues are combined in a most masterly manner, while in the first and second the force of innate worth and courage is made to shine out brilliantly amid the most apparently adverse circumstances. In the more violently farical intrigues and characters, such as are to be found in the Little French Lawyer, the Woman-hater, the Humorous Lieutenant, the Scornful Lady, Wit at Several Weapons, and the like, we willingly forget the eccentricity, or even absurdity of the idea in consideration of the inexhaustible series of laughable extravagancies in which it is made to develop itself. Such extravagancies are very different from the dry, persevering, analytical method in which Jonson works out to its very last dregs the exhibition of one of those "humours" which he so delighted to portray—a process which may almost be called scientific, like the destructive distillation of the chemist, leaving nothing behind but a caput mortuum. The fools and grotesques of Beaumont and Fletcher are "lively, audible, and full of vent," and the authors seem to enjoy the amusement of heaping up absurdity upon absurdity, out of the very abundance of their humorous conception. The language in which the poet clothes their droll extravagancies is often highly figurative, full of imagery, and of a rich and generous music, sometimes the simple change of a few words will transform one of these passages of ludicrous and yet picturesque exaggeration into a noble outburst of serious poetry. Some of the pieces of Beaumont and Fletcher furnish us with a store of curious antiquarian and literary materials. Thus the excellent romantic play of Beggars' Bush contains, in the humorous scenes where the "mumping" fraternity is introduced, valuable materials illustrating that singular subject the slang dialect, or the professional jargon of thieves, beggars, and such like offshoots of society, and it is curious to see how long much of this argot has been in existence, and how slight are the changes it has undergone. In the same way the fantastic extravaganza of the Knight of the Burning Pestle is an absolute storehouse preserving a multitude of popular chivalric legends and fragments, sometimes beautiful and always interesting, of ancient English ballad poetry. In a good many passages of Fletcher we meet with evident parodies or caricatures of scenes and speeches of other dramatists, and particularly of Shakespeare, in which latter case the interest of such passages is of course very high, but it must be remembered that such caricatures or parodies are marked by a playful spirit, and bear no trace of malignity or envy. Examples of this will be found in the play I have just mentioned, in the droll pathetic speech on the installation of Clause as King of the Gypsies, an evident and good-natured jest at Cranmer's speech in the last scene of Henry VIII. Many others might be adduced. The pastoral drama of the Faithful Shepherdess is unquestionably one of the most exquisite combinations of delicate and tender sentiment with description of nature and lyrical music that the English or any other literature can boast. Originally imitated from the Italian, this mixture of the eclogue and the drama forms a peculiar subdivision of poetry. Though the characters, sentiments, language, and incidents have little relation to real life, the charm of such idyllic compositions, from the days of Theocritus to those of Guarini and Tasso, has always been felt, and the refined ideal and half-mythologic beauty of the "fabled life" of Tempe seems to gratify that craving of the imagination which makes us all hunger after something purer, sweeter, and more innocent than the atmosphere of our ordinary "working-day world." The pictures of nature which crowd this exquisite Arcadian drama have never been surpassed for their truth, their delicacy, and the melody of their expression, and it is not the least glory of Beaumont and Fletcher that in this exquisite poem they are the victorious rivals of Ben Jonson, whose delicious fragment of the Sad Shepherd was undoubtedly suggested by the drama I am speaking of, while Fletcher also furnished to Milton the first prototype of one of the most inimitable of his works—the pastoral drama of Comus.

§ 5 Of the personal history of PHILIP MASSINGER (1584-1640) little is known. This excellent poet was born in 1584, and died, apparently very poor, in 1640. His birth was that of a gentleman, his education good, and even learned, for though his stay in the University of Oxford, which he entered in 1602, was not longer than two years, his works prove, by the uniform elegance and refined dignity of their diction, and by the peculiar fondness with which he dwells on classical allusions, that he was intimately penetrated with the finest essence of the great classical writers of antiquity. His theatrical life, extending from 1604 to his death, appears to have been an uninterrupted succession of struggle, disappointment, and distress, and we possess one touching document proving how deep and general was that distress in the dramatic profession of the time. It is a letter written to Henslowe, the manager of the Globe theatre, in the joint names of Massinger, Field, and Daborne, all poets of considerable popularity, imploring the loan of an insignificant sum to liberate them from a debtors' prison. Like most of his fellow-dramatists Massinger frequently wrote in partnership with other playwrights, the names of Dekker, Field, Rowley, Middleton, and others being often found in conjunction with his. We possess the titles of about 37 plays either entirely or partially written by Massinger, of which number, however, only 18 are now extant, the remainder having been lost or destroyed. These works are tragedies, comedies, and romantic dramas partaking of both characters. The finest of them are the following: the Fatal Dowry, the Unnatural Combat, the Roman Actor, and the Duke of Milan, in the first category, the Bondman, the Maid of Honour, and the Picture, in the third, and the Old Law and A New Way to Pay Old Debts in the second. The qualities which distinguish this noble writer are an extraordinary dignity and elevation of moral sentiment, a singular power of delineating the sorrows of pure and lofty minds exposed to unmerited suffering, cast down but not humiliated by misfortune. In these lofty delineations it is impossible not to trace the reflexion of Massinger's own high but melancholy spirit. Female purity and devotion he has painted with great skill, and his plays exhibit many scenes in which he has ventured to sound the mysteries of the deepest passions, as in the Fatal Dowry and the Duke of Milan, the subject of the latter having some resemblance with the terrible story of Mariamne. It was unfortunately indispensable, in order to please the mixed audiences of those days, that comic and farcical scenes should be introduced in every piece, and for comedy and pleasantry Massinger had no aptitude. This portion of his works is in every case contemptible for stupid buffoonery, as well as odious for loathsome indecency, and the coarseness and obscenity of such passages forms so painful a contrast with the general elegance and purity of Massinger's tone and language that we are driven to the supposition of his having had recourse to other hands to supply this obnoxious matter in obedience to the popular taste. Massinger's style and versification are singularly sweet and noble. No writer of that day is so free from archaisms and obscurities, and perhaps there is none in whom more constantly appear all the force, harmony, and dignity of which the English language is susceptible. From many passages we may draw the conclusion that Massinger was a fervent Catholic. The Virgin Martyr is indeed a Catholic mystery, and in many plays—as, for example, the Renegado—he has attributed to Romanist confessors, and even to the then unpopular Jesuits, the most amiable and Christian virtues. If we desire to characterise Massinger in one sentence, we may say that dignity, tenderness, and grace are the qualities in which he excels.

§ 6 If Massinger, among the Elizabethan dramatists, be peculiarly the poet of moral dignity and tenderness, JOHN FORD (1586-1639) must be called the great painter of unhappy love. This passion, viewed under all its aspects, has furnished the almost exclusive subject matter of his plays. He was born in 1586, and died in 1639, and does not appear to have been a professional writer, but to have followed the employment of the law. He began his dramatic career by joining with Dekker in the production of the touching tragedy of the Witch of Edmonton, in which popular superstitions are skilfully combined with a deeply-touching story of love and treachery; and the works attributed to him are not numerous. Besides the above piece he wrote the tragedies of the Brother and Sister, the Broken Heart (beyond all comparison his most powerful work), a graceful historical drama on the subject of Perkin Warbeck, and the following romantic or tragi-comic pieces: the Lover's Melancholy, Love's Sacrifice, the Fancies, Ohaste and Noble, and the Lady's Trial. His personal character, if we may judge from slight allusions found in contemporary writings, seems to have been sombre and retiring, and in his works sweetness and pathos are carried to a higher pitch than in any other dramatist. In the terrible play of the Brother and Sister the subject is love of the most unnatural and criminal kind, and yet Ford fails not to render his chief personages, however we may deplore and even abhor their crime, objects of our sympathy and pity. In the Broken Heart we have in the noble Penthea, in Orgilus, Ithocles, and Crlantha, four phases of unhappy passion and the scenes between Penthea and her cruel but repentant brother, between Penthea and the Princess (in which the dying victim makes her will in such fantastic but deeply-touching terms), and last of all in the tremendous accumulation of moral suffering with which the piece concludes, we cannot but recognise in Ford a master of dramatic effect. His lyre has but few tones, but his music makes up in intensity for what it wants in variety, and at present we can hardly understand how any audience could ever have borne the harrowing up of their sensibilities by such repeated strokes of pathos. Ford, like the other great dramatists of that era of giants, never shrank from dealing with the darkest, the most mysterious enigmas of our moral nature. His verse and dialogue are even somewhat monotonous in their sweet and plaintive melody, and are marked by a great richness of classical allusion. His comic scenes are even more worthless and offensive than those of Massinger. One proof of the consummate mastery which Ford possessed over the whole gamut of love-sentiment is his skill in making attractive the characters of unsuccessful suitors, in proof of which may be cited Orgilus and the noble Malfato.

§ 7 But perhaps the most powerful and original genius among the Shakspearian dramatists of the second order is JOHN WEBSTER. His terrible and funereal Muse was Death, his wild imagination revelled in images and sentiments which breathe, as it were, the odour of the charnel. His plays are full of pictures recalling with fantastic variety all associations of the weakness and futility of human hopes and interests, and dark questionings of our future destinies. His literary physiognomy has something of that dark, bitter, and woful expression which makes us thrill in the portraits of Dante. The number of his known works is very small, the most celebrated among them is the tragedy of the Duchess of Malfy (1623), but others are not inferior to that strange piece in intensity of feeling and savage grimness of plot and treatment. Besides the above we possess Guise, or the Massacre of France, in which the St. Barthélemy is, of course, the main action, the Devil's Law-Case, the White Devil, founded on the crimes and sufferings of Vittoria Corombona, Appius and Virginia, and we thus see that in the majority of his subjects he worked by preference on themes which offered a congenial field for his portraiture of the darker passions and of the moral tortures of their victims. In selecting such revolting themes as abounded in the black annals of mediæval Italy, Webster followed the peculiar bent of his great and morbid genius, in the treatment of these subjects we find a strange mixture of the horrible with the pathetic. In his language there is an extraordinary union of complexity and simplicity; he loves to draw his illustrations not only from "skulls, and graves, and epitaphs," but also from the most attractive and picturesque objects in nature, and his occasional intermingling of the deepest and most innocent emotion and of the most exquisite touches of natural beauty produces the effect of the daisy springing up amid the festering mould of a graveyard. Like many of his contemporaries, he knew the secret of expressing the highest passion through the most familiar images, and the dirges and funeral songs which he has frequently introduced into his pieces possess, as Charles Lamb eloquently expresses it, that intensity of feeling which seems to resolve itself into the very elements they contemplate. His dramas are generally composed in mingled prose and verse, and it is possible that he may have had a share in the production of many other pieces besides those I have enumerated above.

§ 8 As the dramatic form was the predominant type of popular literature at this splendid period, the student must expect to be bewildered by the great though subordinate glory of a multitude of minor lights of the theatrical heaven, whose genius our space will enable us to analyse but in a very rapid and cursory manner. The works of these playwrights, each of whom has, when closely examined, his peculiar traits, have, however, such a strong family resemblance both in their merits and defects, that this cursory appreciation will not lead the reader into any considerable error; one star of the bright constellation may somewhat differ from another in glory, but the general character and composition of their rays is the same. Chapman, Dekker, Middleton, and Marston are all remarkable for their fertility and luxuriance. GEORGE CHAPMAN, who has been previously mentioned as the translator of Homer (p. 86), is, however, more admirable for his lofty, classical spirit, and for the power with which he communicated the rich colouring of romantic poetry to the forms borrowed by his learning from Greek legend and history. THOMAS DEKKER, one of the most inexhaustible of the literary workers of his age, though he generally appears as a fellow-labourer with other dramatists, yet in the few pieces attributed to his unassisted pen shows great elegance of language and deep tenderness of sentiment. THOMAS MIDDLETON is admired for a certain wild and fantastic fancy which delights in portraying scenes of witchcraft and supernatural agency JOHN MARSTON, on the contrary, deserves applause less by a purely dramatic quality of genius than by a lofty and satiric tone of invective in which he lashes the vices and follies of mankind, and in particular the neglect of learning. Nor can he who would make acquaintance with the dramatic wealth of this marvellous age pass without attention the works of Taylor, Tournour, Rowley, Broome, and Thomas Heywood. Tournour has some resemblance, in the sombre and gloomy tone of his works, to the terrible genius of Webster, while Broome is remarkable for the immense number of pieces in whose composition he had a greater or less share, an observation which may also be applied to Heywood. This latter poet must not be confounded with his namesake John, who was one of the earliest dramatic authors and flourished in the reigns of Henry VIII. and Mary (see p. 116). Thomas Heywood exhibits a graceful fancy, and one of his plays, A Woman Killed with Kindness, is among the most touching of the period. Broome was originally Ben Jonson's domestic servant, but afterwards attained considerable success upon the stage.

§ 9 The dramatic era of Elizabeth and James closes with JAMES SHIRLEY (1594-1666), whose comedies, though in many respects bearing the same general character as the works of his great predecessors, still seem the earnest of a new period. He excels in the delineation of gay and fashionable society, and his dramas are more laudable for ease, nature, and animation than for profound tracings of human nature, or for vivid portraiture of character. He passed through the whole of the Civil War, and survived the Commonwealth some years, and is the link which connects the great dramatic school of Shakspeare with the very different form of the drama which revived at the Restoration in 1660. In proportion as the Puritan party grew in influence and acrimony, in precisely equal degree grew the hostility to the theatre, and at last, when fanaticism was rampant, the theatre was formally and legally suppressed, the play-houses were pulled down by bigoted mobs of citizens and soldiers, and the performance of plays, nay, the simple witnessing of theatrical representations, made a penal offence. This took place Sept. 2, 1642, and the dramatic profession may be regarded as remaining under the frown of government during about 14 years from that date, when the theatre was revived, but revived, as we shall afterwards see, under a completely different form and with totally different tendencies, moral as well as literary. Of the nature and causes of this dramatic revolution, not less profound than the great political and social revolution of which it was a symptom and a result, I shall speak in another place.

§ 10 The Elizabethan drama is the most wonderful and majestic outburst of genius that any age has yet seen. It is characterised by marked peculiarities, an intense richness and fertility of imagination, such as was natural in an age when the stores of classical antiquity were suddenly thrown open to the popular mind, and thus richness and splendour of fancy are combined with the greatest force and vigour of familiar expression. We have an intimate union of the common and the refined, the boldest flights of fancy and the most scrupulous fidelity to actual reality. The great object of these dramatists being to produce intense impressions upon a miscellaneous audience, they sacrificed everything to strength and nature. The circumstance that most of these writers were actors tended to give their productions the peculiar tone they exhibit: to this we must attribute some of their gravest defects as well as many of their most admirable beauties—their occasional coarseness, exaggeration, and buffoonery, as well as that instinctive knowledge of effect which never abandons them. But besides being actors, they were, almost without exception, men of educated and cultivated minds, and thus their writings never fail to show a peculiar aroma of style and language, which is perceptible even in the least fragment of their dialogue. They were also men, men of strong passions and often of irregular lives; and what they felt strongly, and what they had seen in their wild lives, they boldly transferred to their writings, which thus reflect not only the faithful images of human character and passion under every conceivable condition, not only the strongest as well as the most delicate colouring of fancy and imagination, but the profoundest and simplest precepts derived from the practical experience of life. It should never be forgotten that they all resemble Shakspeare in the general texture of their language and the prevailing principles of their mode of dramatic treatment, and only differ from him in the degree to which they possess separately those high and varied qualities which he alone of all human beings carried to an almost superhuman degree of intensity.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS.

OTHER DRAMATISTS

ARTHUR MUNDAY (1558-1633) was said by Mores to be the "best plotter" among the comic poets. Fourteen plays were written either partly or wholly by him. The first of importance was Valentine and Orson, published in 1598. Drayton and others assisted him in Sir John Oldcastle, which was referred by some to Shakespeare. In 1601 he published Robert Earl of Huntingdon's Downfall, and Robert Earl of Huntingdon's Death in the last of which he was assisted by Chettle. His writings extended over the period 1580-1621. He died August 10 1633 and is styled on his monument in St. Stephen's Coleman Street, "citizen and draper of London."

HENRY CHETTLE was a most industrious writer of plays. Thirty-eight are said to bear an impress from his hand. With Haughton and Dekker he produced Patient Grissil in 1603. According to Mr Collier he wrote for the stage before 1592. Three only of his plays have been preserved. He wrote too largely to produce works of more than passing interest.

GEORGE COOKE, produced Green's Tu quoque in 1599 and was the author of fifty epigrams.

THOMAS NABBS, wrote in the reign of Charles I. A third rate poet, but original. None of his dramatic pieces are extant, the chief of which were Microcosmus Spring's Ulster Brule Charles the First, a tragedy, and Suetonax, a comedy, are proved not to be his. Nabbs was secretary to some noble or prelate near Worcester. He also wrote a continuation of Knolles's History of the Turks.

THOMAS RANDOLPH (1605-1634), born near Daventry. A scholar and poet of some worth, but whose pieces have sunk into an obscurity ill deserved. He studied at Cambridge, and through too great excess shortened his life, and died at the early age of twenty-nine. His chief plays were The Muses Looking-glass, and The Jealous Lovers.

NATHANIEL FIELD in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. wrote A Woman's a Weathercock, 1612, Amends for Ladies 1618.

JOHN DAY, wrote between 1602 and 1654. Studied at Caius College Cambridge, was associated with Rowley, Dekker, Chettle, and Marlowe, and is said to have been the subject of the satirical lines on the flight of Day. The chief works were Bristol Tragedy, 1602, Law Tricks, 1608, and the Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green, 1659.

HENRY WILKINSON lived in the reign of Charles I. Winstanley calls him "one of the chiefest dramatic poets of that age." There is much ease and elegance in his verse, but little force and passion. His plays numbered nine, five of which are preserved. Albertus Wallenstein, 1634. The Hollander, 1640, &c.

CHAPTER IX.

THE SO-CALLED METAPHYSICAL POETS A.D. 1600-1700.

§ 1 Characteristics of the so-called metaphysical poets § 2 WITHER and QUARLES § 3 HERRICK and CRASHAW § 4 HERRICK, SUCKLING, and LOVELACE § 5 BROWNE and HAWKINS. § 6 WALLER. § 7. DAVENANT and DENHAM § 8 COWLEY

§ 1. THE seventeenth century is one of the most momentous in English history. A large portion of it is occupied by an immense fermentation, political and religious, through which were worked out many of those institutions to which the country owes its grandeur and its happiness. The Civil War, the Commonwealth, the Protectorate, and the Restoration, fill up the space extending from 1640 to 1660, while its termination was signalled by another revolution which, though peaceful and bloodless, was destined to exert a perhaps even more beneficial influence on the future fortunes of the country. In its literary aspect this agitated epoch, though not marked by that marvellous outburst of creative power which dazzles us in the reigns of Elizabeth and her successor, yet has left deep traces on the turn of thought and expression of the English people, and confining ourselves to the department of poetry, and excluding the solitary example in Milton of a poet of the first class, who will form the subject of a separate study, we may say that this period introduced a class of excellent writers in whom the intellect and the fancy play a greater part than sentiment or passion. Ingenuity predominates over feeling; and while Milton owed much to many of these poets, whom I have ventured, in accordance with Johnson, to style the metaphysical class, nevertheless we must allow that they had much to do with generating the so-called correct and artificial manner which distinguishes the classical writers of the age of William, Anne, and the first George. I propose to pass in rapid review, and generally according to chronological order, the most striking names of this department, extending from about 1600 to 1700.

§ 2 GEORGE WITHER (1588-1667) and FRANCIS QUARLES (1592-1644) are a pair of poets whose writings have a considerable degree of resemblance in manner and subject, and whose lives were similar in misfortune. Wither took an active part in the Civil War, attained command under the administration of Cromwell, and had to undergo severe persecution and long imprisonment. His most important work is a collection of poems, of a partially pastoral character, entitled the Shepherds' Hunting, in which the reader will find frequent rural descriptions of exquisite fancifulness and beauty, together with a sweet and pure tone of moral reflection. The vice of Wither, as it was generally of the literature of his age, was a predilection for ingenious turns and unexpected conceits, which bear the same relation to really beautiful thoughts that plays upon words do to true wit. He is also often singularly deficient in taste, and frequently deforms graceful images by the juxtaposition of what is merely quaint, and is sometimes even ignoble. Many of his detached lyrics are extremely beautiful, and the verse is generally flowing and melodious, but in reading his best passages we are always nervously apprehensive of coming at any moment upon something which will jar upon our sympathy. He wrote, among many other works, a curious series of Emblems, in which his puritanical enthusiasm revolved in a system of moral and theological imagery as far-fetched as political.

Quarles, a Royalist as ardent as Wither was a devoted Republican, exhibits many points of intellectual resemblance to Wither, to whom, however, he was far inferior in poetical sentiment. One of his most popular works is a collection of Devotional Emblems, in which moral and religious precepts are inculcated in short poems of a most quaint character, and illustrated by engravings filled with what may be called allegory run mad. For example, the text, "Who will deliver me from the body of this death?" is accompanied by a cut representing a diminutive human figure, typifying the soul, peeping through the ribs of a skeleton or from behind the bars of a dungeon. This taste for extravagant yet prosaic allegory was borrowed from the laborious ingenuity of the Dutch and Flemish moralists and divines, and Otto Van Veen, the teacher of Rubens, is answerable for some of the most extravagant pictorial absurdities of this nature. Quarles, however, in spite of his quaintness, is not destitute of the feeling of a true poet, and many of his pieces breathe an intense spirit of religious fervour. In spite of their antagonism in politics, Quarles and Wither bear a strong resemblance—the one may be designated as the most roundhead of the Cavaliers, the other as the most cavalier of the Roundheads.

§ 3 If Quarles and Wither represent ingenuity carried to extravagance, George Herbert (1593-1633) and Richard Crashaw (circa 1613-1649) exhibit the highest exaltation of religious sentiment, and are both worthy of admiration, not only as Christian poets, but as good men and pious priests. George Herbert was born in 1593, and at first rendered himself remarkable by the graces and accomplishments of the courtly scholar, but afterwards entering the Church, exhibited, as parish priest of Bemerton in Wiltshire, all the virtues which can adorn the country parson—a character he has beautifully described in a prose treatise under that title. He died in 1633, and was known among his contemporaries as "holy George Herbert." He was certainly one of the most perfect characters which the Anglican Church has nourished in her bosom. His poems, principally religious, are generally short lyrics, combining pious aspiration with frequent and beautiful pictures of nature. He decorates the altar with the sweetest and most fragrant flowers of fancy and of wit. Herbert's poems are not devoid of that strange and perverted ingenuity with which I have reproached Quarles and Wither, but the tender unction which reigns throughout his lyrics serves as a kind of antidote to the poison of perpetual conceits. In his most successful efforts he has almost attained the perfection of devotional poetry, a calm and yet ardent glow, a well-governed fervour which seems peculiarly to belong to the Church of which he was a minister. His prose treatise, A Priest to the Temple, was not published until about twenty years after his death, in the Commonwealth times. His collection of sacred lyrics is entitled The Temple, Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations (1633).

Crashaw's short life was glowing throughout with religious enthusiasm. The date of his birth is not exactly known, but probably was about 1613, and he died, a canon of the Cathedral of Loretto, in 1649. He was brought up in the Anglican Church, and received a learned education at Cambridge, but during the Puritan troubles he embraced the Romish faith, and carried to the ancient Church a singularly sensitive mind, very extensive erudition, and a gentle but intense devotional mysticism. He was a passionate lover of music, was proficient in languages, and possessed among his contemporaries a high reputation for ability. The mystical tendency of his mind was increased by his misfortunes and by his change of religion, and in his later works we find the fervour of his pietism reaching a pitch little short of extravagance. While yet a Protestant he was an ardent admirer of the ecstatic writings of St. Theresa, and that union of the sensuous fervour of human affection with the wildest flights of theological rapture which we see in the writings of the great Catholic mystics, is faithfully reproduced in Crashaw. That he possessed an exquisite fancy, great melody of verse, and that power over the reader which nothing can replace, and which springs from deep earnestness, no one can deny. The reader will never regret the time he may have employed in making some acquaintance with Crashaw's poetry. The title of the collection containing his religious verse is Steps to the Temple. Among his secular poems I mention Music's Duel, borrowed from the celebrated Contention between a Nightingale and a Muscian, composed by Famianus Strada, of which there is a most exquisite imitation in Ford's play of the Lover's Melancholy.

§ 4 Love, romantic loyalty, and airy elegance find their best representatives in three charming poets whose works may be examined under one general head. These are ROBERT HERRICK (1591-1634), SIR JOHN SUCKLING (1609-1641), and SIR RICHARD LOVELACE (1618-1658). The first of these writers, after beginning his career among the brilliant but somewhat debauched literary society of the town and the theatre, took orders in 1629, and retired to a quiet parish in Devonshire. Here he continued to write his beautiful lyrics until 1647, when, ejected as a Royalist, he came to London. In 1648 appeared his Hesperides, and Noble Numbers, the former secular verse, the latter religious. Restored to his living in 1662, he died there Oct. 1674. He seems never to have ceased repining at the fate which obliged him to exchange the gay conversation of poets and wits for the unsympathising companionship of the rural "salvages" among whom he was condemned to live. His poems are all lyric, generally songs, upon love and wine, but some are upon sacred subjects. In Herrick we find the most unaccountable mixture of sensual coarseness with exquisite refinement. Like the Faun of the ancient sculpture, his Muse unites the bestial and the divine. In fancy, in genius, in power over the melody of verse, he is never deficient, and it is easy to see that in his union of tenderness with richness of imagination he had been inspired by the lovely pastoral and lyric movements of Fletcher and of Heywood. Suckling and Lovelace are the types of the Cavalier poet. Both underwent persecution, and were reduced to poverty. Lovelace was long and often imprisoned for his adherence to the loyal doctrines of his party, and is said to have died in abject distress. Both were men of elegant if not profound scholarship, and both exemplify the spirit of loyalty to their king, and gallantry to the ladies. Many of Suckling's love songs are equal, if not superior, to the most beautiful examples of that mixture of gay badinage and tender if not very deep-felt devotion which characterises French courtly and erotic poetry in the seventeenth century, and his thoughts are expressed with that cameo-like neatness and refinement of expression which is the great merit of the minor French literature from Marot to Béranger. But his most exquisite production is his Ballad upon a Wedding, in which, assuming the character of a rustic, he describes the marriage of a fashionable couple, Lord Broghill and Lady Margaret Howard. In this inimitable gem, if we exclude one or two allusions of a somewhat too warm complexion, the reader will find the perfection of grace and elegance, rendered only the more piquant by the well-assumed naïveté of the style. Lovelace is more serious and earnest than Suckling; his lyrics breathe rather devoted loyalty than the half-passionate, half-jesting love-fancy of his rival. Some of his most charming lyrics were written in prison, and the beautiful lines to Althea, composed when the author was closely confined in the Gate-house at West-munster, remind us of the caged bird which learns its sweetest and most plaintive notes when deprived of its woodland liberty

The gay and airy spirit which we see running through the minor poetry of this epoch may be traced back to a period considerably earlier—to the contemporaries of Ben Jonson and the great dramatists. The pleasant and facetious BISHOP CORBET (p 87), CAREW, one of the ornaments of the court of Charles I (p 87), and even DRUMMOND (p. 88), though the genius of the latter is of a more serious turn, all exhibit a tendency to intellectual ingenuity which was afterwards gradually divested of that somewhat pedantic character which Drummond, for example, had imbibed from his models, the masters of the Italian sonnet. It is curious to observe that the Scots should in this time have distinguished themselves in their writings by a learned and artificially classical spirit strangely at variance with the unadorned graces of the "native woodnotes wild" that thrill so sweetly through their national and popular songs. This learned character was perhaps derived from, as it is chiefly exemplified in, Buchanan, one of the purest and most truly classical writers in Latin verse among those who have appeared since the destruction of Roman literature (p 110). The Scots have generally been a learned people, and much of their national annals were written in Latin, sometimes in Latin of great elegance. This may perhaps be in some degree attributed to the fact that their vernacular dialect, when they employed it, was, though certainly far too cultivated to be stigmatised as a patois of English, yet at all events no better than a provincial mode of speech, and the naïveté which is charming in a song or poem runs great risk of exciting contempt when colouring historical or philosophical matter.

§ 5 WILLIAM BROWNE (1591-1643 (?)) was the author, besides a large number of graceful lyrics and shorter poems, of a work entitled Britannia's Pastorals, undoubtedly suggested, as far as their style and treatment is concerned, by the example of Spenser and Giles Fletcher. They contain much agreeable description of rural life, but they are chargeable with that ineradicable defect which accompanies all idyllic poetry, however beautiful may be its details, namely, the want of probability in the scenes and characters, when the reader tests them by a reference to his own experience of what rustic life really is. His verse is almost uniformly well knit, easy, and harmonious, and the attentive reader could select many passages from this poet, now little read, exhibiting great felicity of thought and expression. He died probably in 1643.

WILLIAM HABINGTON (1605-1654) is a poet of about the same calibre as Browne, though his writings are principally devoted to love. He celebrates, with much ingenuity and occasional grace, the charms and virtues of a lady whom he calls Castara, and who—a fate rare in the annals of the love of poets—was not only his ideal mistress but his wife. Habington, like Crashaw, was a Catholic, and his poems are free from that immorality which so often stains the graceful fancies of the poets of this age. Though generally devoted to love, Habington's collected works exhibit some of a moral and religious tendency.

§ 6 The most prominent and popular figures of the period we are now considering, and the writers who exerted the strongest influence on their own time, I have reserved till the end of this chapter—they are Waller and Cowley, to which may be added the secondary but still important names of Denham and Davenant.

EDMUND WALLER (1606–1687), born March 3, 1606, at Coleshill, was educated at Eton, and at King's College, Cambridge, and entered Parliament when very young. He was of ancient and distinguished family, of great wealth, and a man of varied accomplishments and fascinating manners, but his character was timid and selfish, and his political principles fluctuated with every change that menaced either his safety or his interest. He sat for many years in Parliament, and was the "darling of the House of Commons" for the readiness of his repartees and the originality and pleasantness of his speeches. It was unfortunate for a man endowed with the light talents formed to adorn a court to be obliged to take part in public affairs at so serious a crisis as that of the Long Parliament, the Civil War, and the Restoration, but Waller seems for a while to have floated scatheless through the storms of that terrible time, trusting, like the nautilus, to the very fragility which bears it safely among rocks and quicksands where an argosy would be wrecked. He exhibited repeated indications of tergiversation in those difficult times, professing adherence to Puritan and Republican doctrines while really sympathising with the Court party, and on more than one occasion was accused of something very like distinct military treachery. Even his consummate adroitness did not always succeed in securing impunity, and in 1643 he was convicted by the House of a plot to betray London to the King, and narrowly escaped a capital punishment, being imprisoned, fined 10,000*l.*, and obliged to exile himself for some time, which he passed in France. His conduct at this juncture is said to have been mean and abject. Though the first-cousin of Hampden, and so a direct connexion of Oliver Cromwell himself, whom he has celebrated in one of his finest poems, Waller was ready to hail with enthusiasm every new change in the political world, and he panegyricised Cromwell and Charles II. with equal fervour, though not with equal effect. He lived to see the accession of James II., whose policy he prophesied would lead to the fatal results that afterwards occurred. During the whole of his life Waller was the idol of society, but neither much trusted nor much respected—a pliant, versatile, adroit partisan, joining and asserting all causes in succession, and steering his bark with address through the dangers of the time. In his own day, and in the succeeding generation, his poetry enjoyed the highest reputation. He was said to have carried to perfection the art of expressing graceful and sensible ideas in the clearest and most harmonious language, but his example, which acted so powerfully on Dryden and Pope, has ceased to exert the same influence, which it owed rather to the good sense and good taste by which Waller avoids faults than to the ardour and enthusiasm which can alone attain beauties. Regular, reasonable, well-balanced, well-proportioned, the lines of Waller always gratify the judgment, but rarely touch the heart or fire the imagination. Here and there in his works may be found strokes of happy ingenuity which we know not whether to attribute more to accident or to genius, as in the passage where he laments the cruelty of his mistress Richarissa (Lady Dorothy Sidney), and boasts that his disappointment as a lover had given him immortality as a poet, he makes the following delicious allusion to the fable of Apollo and Daphne —

“He caught at love, and filled his arm with bays.”

Most of his poems are love verses, but his panegyric on Cromwell contains many passages of great dignity and force. He was less felicitous in his longer work, the Battle of the Summer Islands, in which, in a half-serious half-comic strain, he described an attack upon a stranded whale in the Bermudas.

§ 7 Sir-WILLIAM DAVENANT (1606-1668), born in the same year with Waller, was one of the most active literary and political personages of his day. He is principally interesting to us at the present day as being connected with the revival of the theatre after the eclipse it had suffered during the severe Puritan rule, and nothing can more clearly indicate the immense change which literary taste had undergone, than the fact that Davenant, who was a most ardent worshipper of the genius of Shakspeare and Shakspeare's mighty contemporaries, should, in attempting to revive their works, have found it necessary to alter their spirit so completely, that a reader who admires the originals must regard the adaptations with a feeling little less than disgust. Yet there can be no doubt that Davenant's veneration was sincere. He was long connected with the Court Theatre, and both in the dramas which he composed himself, and in those which he adapted and placed upon the stage, we see how far the taste for splendour of scenery, dances, music, and decoration had usurped the passion of the earlier public for truth and intensity in the picturing of life and nature. Declamation and pompous tirades had now taken the place of the ancient style of dialogic, so varied, so natural, touching every key of human feeling, from the wildest gaiety to the deepest pathos. The mechanical accessories of the stage had been immensely improved, actresses, young, beautiful, and skilful, usurped the place of the boys of the Elizabethan scene, and in every respect the stage had undergone a complete revolution. We see the influence of that French or classical taste which was brought into England by the exiled court of Charles II, and which afterwards completely metamorphosed the character of our dramatic literature, which, in the time of Dryden and Congreve, was destined to produce much that was imposing and vigorous in tragedy and much that was inimitable in comedy, but which was, in all its essentials, something totally different from the great productions of the preceding era. Davenant was a most prolific author, not only in the dramatic department, in which his most popular productions were Albion, the Siege of Rhodes, the Jaw against Lovers, the Cruel Brother, and many others, but also as a narrative poet. He was also one of the most active, virulent, and unscrupulous party-writers of that period. There is a ridiculous story of Davenant being in the habit of giving out that he was a natural son of William Shakspeare by a handsome Oxford landlady, but neither the supposition itself nor the fact of Davenant's exhibiting such a strange, perverted kind of vanity, are at all deserving of credit. One of Davenant's principal non-dramatic works is the poem of Gondibert, narrating a long series of lofty and chivalric adventures in a dignified but somewhat monotonous manner. It is written in a peculiar four-lined stanza with alternate rhymes, afterwards employed by Dryden in his Annus Mirabilis. It is, however, a form of versification singularly unfitted for continuous narration, and its employment may be one cause of the neglect into which the once-admired work of Davenant has fallen, a neglect so complete that perhaps there are not ten men in England now living who have read it through.

SIR JOHN DENHAM (1615-1669) was the son of the Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland, and a supporter of Charles I. Though a poet of the secondary order, when regarded in comparison with Cowley, one work of his, Cooper's Hill, will always occupy an important place in any account of the English Literature of the seventeenth century. This place it owes not only to its specific merits, but also in no mean degree to the circumstance that this poem was the first work in a peculiar department which English writers afterwards cultivated with great success, and which is, I believe, almost exclusively confined to our literature. This department is what may be called local or topographic poetry, and in it the writer chooses some individual scene as the object round which he is to accumulate his descriptive or contemplative passages. Denham selected for this purpose a beautiful spot near Richmond on the Thames, and in the description of the scene itself, as well as in the reflections it suggests, he has risen to a noble elevation. Four lines, indeed, in which he expresses the hope that his own verse may possess the qualities which he attributes to the Thames, will be quoted again and again as one of the finest and most felicitous passages of verse in any language.

§ 8 One of the most accomplished and influential writers of the period was ABRAHAM COWLEY (1618-1667). He exhibits one of the most perfect types of the ideal man of letters. He was a remarkable instance of intellectual precocity, for in 1633 he published his first poems, filled with enthusiasm by the Faerie Queen of Spenser, when only 15 years of age. He received a very complete education, going first to Cambridge in 1637, but in 1643, being then an M.A., he was expelled from that university for his Royalist sympathies, and went to St. John's College, in Oxford. He bore among his contemporaries the reputation of being one of the best scholars and most distinguished poets of his age. During the earlier part of his life he had been confidentially employed, both in England and in France, in the service of Charles I and his queen, and on attaining middle age he determined to put in execution the philosophical project he had long fondly cherished, of living in rural and lettered retirement. He was disappointed in obtaining such a provision as he thought his services had deserved, but receiving a grant of some crown leases producing a moderate income, he quitted London and went to reside near Chertsey (1665). But his dreams of ease and tranquillity were not fulfilled, he was involved in continual squabbles with the tenants, from whom he could extort no rents, and he speeks with constant querulousness of the hostility and vexations to which he was subjected. He died of a fever caused by a cold caught in the meadows, but not before he had learned the melancholy truth that annoyances and vexations pursue us even into the recesses of rural obscurity.

Cowley is highly regarded among the writers of his time both as a poet and an essayist. Immense and multifarious learning, well digested by reflection and polished into brilliancy by taste and sensibility, render his prose works, in which he frequently intermingles passages of verse, reading little less delightful than the fascinating pages of Montaigne. Cowley, like Montaigne, possesses the charm arising from the intimate union between reading and reflection, between curious erudition and original speculation, the quaintness of the scholar and the practical knowledge of the man of the world. There are few writers so substantial as Cowley, few whose productions possess that peculiar attraction which grows upon the reader as he becomes older and more contemplative. As a poet, the reputation of Cowley, immense in his own day, has much diminished, which is to be attributed to that abuse of intellectual ingenuity, that passion for learned, far-fetched, and recondite illustrations which was to a certain extent the vice of his age. He has very little passion or depth of sentiment, and in his love-verses—a kind of composition then thought obligatory on all who were ambitious of the name of poet—he substitutes the play of the intellect for the unaffected outpouring of the feelings. He was deeply versed both in Greek and Latin literature, and his imitations, paraphrases, and translations show perfect knowledge of his originals and great mastery over the resources of the English language. He paraphrased the Odes of Anacreon, and his Pindarics were “written in imitation of the Style and Manner of Pindar,” but these odes have only an external resemblance with those of the “Theban Eagle.” They have the irregularity of form—only an apparent irregularity in the case of the Greek originals, which, it must be remembered, were written to be accompanied by that Greek music of whose structure nothing is now known—but they have not that intense and concentrated fire which burns with an inextinguishable ardour, like the product of some chemical combustion, in the great Boeotian lyrist. Cowley seems always on the watch to seize some ingenious and unexpected parallelism of ideas or images, and when the illustration is so found, the shock of surprise which the reader feels is rather akin to a flash of wit than to an electric stroke of genius. Cowley lived at the moment when the revolution inaugurated by Bacon was beginning to produce its first fruits. The Royal Society, then recently founded, was astonishing the world, and astonishing its own members, by the immense horizon opening before the bold pioneers of the Inductive Philosophy. In this mighty movement Cowley deeply sympathized, and perhaps the finest of his lyric compositions are those in which, with a grave and well-adorned eloquence, he proclaims the genius and predicts the triumphs of Bacon and his disciples in physical science.

One long epic poem of great pretension Cowley meditated but left unfinished. This is the Davideis, the subject of which is the sufferings and glories of the King of Israel. But this work is now completely neglected. Biblical personages and events have rarely, with the solitary and sublime exception of Milton, been transported with success out of the majestic language of Scripture, and it may be maintained, without much fear of contradiction, that the rhymed heroic couplet—the measure employed by Cowley—is not a form of versification capable of supporting the attention of the reader through a lofty epic narrative. The genius of Cowley was far more lyric than epic and in his shorter compositions he exerted that influence upon the style of English poetry which tended very much, during nearly two centuries, to modify it very perceptibly, and which is especially traceable in the writings of Dryden, Pope, and generally in the next succeeding generations.

CHAPTER X.

THEOLOGICAL WRITERS OF THE CIVIL WAR AND THE COMMONWEALTH

- § 1 Theological writers JOHN HALES and WILLIAM CHILLINGWORTH.
 § 2 SIR THOMAS BROWNE § 3 THOMAS FULLER § 4 JEREMY TAYLOR. His Life § 5 His Liberty of Prophesying and other works.
 § 6 His style compared with Spenser § 7 RICHARD BAXTER. The Quakers FOX, PENN, and BARCLAY

§ 1 THE Civil War, which led to the temporary overthrow of the ancient monarchy of England, was in many respects a religious as well as a political contest. It was a struggle for liberty of faith at least as much as for liberty of civil government. The prose literature of this time, therefore, as well as of a period extending considerably beyond it, exhibits a strong religious or theological character. The blood of martyrs, it has been said, is the seed of the Church, and the alternate triumphs and persecutions, through which passed both the Anglican Church and the multiplicity of rival sects which now arose, naturally developed to the highest degree both the intellectual powers and the Christian energies of their adherents. The most glorious outburst of theological eloquence which the Church of England has exhibited, in the writings of Jeremy Taylor, Barrow, and the other great Anglican Fathers, was responded to by the appearance, in the ranks of the sectaries, of many remarkable men, some hardly inferior in learning and genius to the leaders whose doctrines they opposed, while others, with a ruder yet more burning enthusiasm, were the founders of dissenting communions, as in the case of the Quakers.

JOHN HALES (1584-1656), surnamed "the ever-memorable John Hales," was a man who enjoyed among his contemporaries an immense reputation for the vastness of his learning and the acuteness of his wit. He was born in 1584, and in the earlier part of his life had acquired, by travel and diplomatic service in foreign countries, a vast amount not only of literary knowledge but practical acquaintance with men and affairs. He afterwards retired to the learned obscurity of a Fellowship of Eton College, where he passed the sad and dangerous years filled with civil contention. During part of this time his writings and opinions rendered him so obnoxious to the dominant party that a price was set upon his head, and he was obliged to hide, being at the same time reduced to the extremest privations. He for some time subsisted by the sale of his books. He died in 1656, and left behind him the reputation of one of the most solid and yet acutest intellects that his country had produced. The greater part of his writings are controversial, treating on the politico-religious questions that then agitated men's minds. He had been present at the Synod of Dort, and has given an interesting account of the questions debated in that assembly. While attending its sittings as an agent for the English Church he was converted from the Calvinistic opinions he had hitherto held to those of the Episcopalian divines. Both in his controversial writings and in his sermons he exhibits a fine example of that rich yet chastened eloquence which characterises the great English divines of the seventeenth century, and which was carried to the highest pitch of gorgeous magnificence by Taylor and of majestic grandeur by Barrow.

WILLIAM CHILLINGWORTH (1602-1644), also an eminent defender of Protestantism against the Church of Rome, was converted to the Roman Catholic faith while studying at Oxford, and went to the Jesuits' College at Douay. But he subsequently returned to Oxford, renounced his new faith, and published in 1637 his celebrated work against Catholicism, entitled The Religion of the Protestants a Safe Way to Salvation, in reply to a treatise by a Jesuit, named Knott, who had maintained that unrepenting Protestants could not be saved. "In the long parenthetical periods," observes Mr Hallam, "as in those of other old English writers, in his copiousness, which is never empty or tautological, there is an artificial eloquence springing from strength of intellect and sincerity of feeling that cannot fail to impress the reader. But his chief excellence is the close reasoning which avoids every dangerous admission, and yields to no ambiguousness of language. He perceived and maintained with great courage, considering the times in which he wrote and the temper of those whom he was not unwilling to keep as friends, his favourite tenet, that all things necessary to be believed are clearly laid down in Scripture. . . . In later times his book obtained a high reputation, he was called the immortal Chillingworth, he was the favourite of all the moderate and the latitudinarian writers, of Tillotson, Locke, and Warburton."

§ 2 The writings of SIR THOMAS BROWNE (1605-1682), though not exclusively theological, belong, chronologically as well as by their style and manner, to this department. Both as a man and a writer this is one of the most peculiar and eccentric of our great prose-authors, and the task of giving a clear appreciation of him is unusually difficult. He was an exceedingly learned man, and passed the greater part of his life in practising physio in the ancient city of Norwich. It should be remembered that the great provincial towns at that time had not been degraded to that insignificance to which the modern facility of intercourse has reduced them in relation to the Metropolis they were then so many little capitals, possessing their society, their commercial activity, and their local physiognomy, and had not yet been swallowed up by the monster London. Browne was born in 1605, and his life was unusually prolonged, as he died in 1682. His writings are of a most miscellaneous character, ranging from observations on natural science to the most arduous subtleties of moral and metaphysical speculation. Among the most popular of his works are the treatise entitled Hydriotaphia, or Urn-Burial, and the Essays on Vulgar Errors, which bear the name of Pseudodoxia Epidemica. The first of these works was suggested by the digging up in Norfolk of some Roman funeral urns, and the other is an attempt to overthrow many of the common superstitions and erroneous notions on various subjects. But a mere specification of the subject will altogether fail to give an idea of Browne's strange but fascinating writings. They are the frank and undisguised outpourings of one of the most original minds that ever existed. With the openness and discursive simplicity of Montaigne, they combine immense and recondite reading: at every step the author starts some extraordinary theory, which he illustrates by analogies so singular and unexpected that they produce upon the reader a mingled feeling of amusement and surprise, and all this in a style absolutely bristling with quaint Latinisms, which in another writer would be pedantic, but in Browne were the natural garb of his thought. His diction is stiff with scholastic terms, like the chasuble of some mediæval prelate, thick-set with pearl and ruby. The contrast between the simplicity of Browne's character and the out-of-the-way learning and odd caprices of theory in which he is perpetually indulging, makes him one of the most amusing of writers, and he very frequently rises to a sombre and touching eloquence. Though deeply religious in sentiment he is sometimes apparently sceptical, and his sudden turns of thought and strange comparisons keep the attention of the reader continually awake. He stands almost alone in his passion for pursuing an idea through every conceivable manifestation, and his ingenuity on such occasions is absolutely portentous. For instance, in a treatise on the Quincunx he finds quincunxes on the earth, in the waters, and in the heavens, nay, in the very intellectual constitution of the soul. He has a particular tendency to dwell on the dark mysteries of time and of the universe, and makes us thrill with the solemnity with which he suggests the nothingness of mortal life, and the insignificance of human interests when compared to the immeasurable ages that lie before and behind us. In

Sir Thomas Browne's works an intimate companionship is established between the writer and the reader, but the book in which he ostensibly proposes to communicate his own personal opinions and feelings most unreservedly, is the Religio Medici, a species of Confession of Faith. In this he by no means confines himself to theological matters, but takes the reader into his confidence in the same artless and undisguised manner as the immortal Montaigne. The images and illustrations with which his writings are crowded, produce upon the reader the same effect as the familiar yet mysterious forms that make up an Egyptian hieroglyphic—they have the same fantastic oddity, the same quaint stiffness in their attitude and combination, and impress the mind with the same air of solemn significance and outlandish remoteness from the ordinary objects of our contemplation.

§ 3 THOMAS FULLER (1608-1661) is another great and attractive prose-writer of this period, and has in some respects a kind of intellectual resemblance to Browne. Unlike him, however, he passed a very active life, having taken a not unimportant part in the Great Civil War, in which he embraced the cause of the royalists. He was born in 1608, and survived till 1661, and it is said was to have been rewarded for his services with a bishopric, had the intention of the restored court not been defeated by his death. He studied first at Queen's and afterwards at Sidney College, Cambridge, and entering the Church, rendered himself conspicuous in the pulpit. In the course of time he was nominated preacher at the Savoy in London, and in 1642, just at the outbreak of the Civil War, offended the Parliament by a sermon delivered at Westminster, in which he advised reconciliation with the King, who had left his capital and was on the eve of declaring war against his subjects. Fuller after this joined Charles at Oxford, and is said to have displeased the court party by a degree of moderation which they called lukewarmness. Having thus excited the dissatisfaction of both factions, we may, I think, fairly attribute to reasonable and moderate views the double unpopularity of Fuller. During the war he was attached, as chaplain, to the army commanded by Sir Ralph Hopton in the West of England, and he took a distinguished part in the famous defence of Basing House, when the Parliamentary army under Sir William Waller was forced to abandon that siege. During his campaigning Fuller industriously collected the materials for his most popular work, the Worthies of England and Wales, which, however, was not published until after the author's death. This, more than his Church History, is the production with which posterity has generally associated the name of Fuller, but his Sermons frequently exhibit those singular peculiarities of style which render him one of the most remarkable writers of his age. His writings are eminently amusing, not only from the multiplicity of curious and anecdotic details which they contain, but from the odd and yet frequently profound reflections suggested by those details. The Worthies contain biographical notices of eminent Englishmen, as connected with the different counties, and furnish an inexhaustible treasure of curious stories and observations: but whatever the subject Fuller treats, he places it in such a number of new and unexpected lights, and introduces in illustration of it such a number of ingenious remarks, that the attention of the reader is incessantly kept alive. He was a man of a pleasant and jovial as well as an ingenious turn of mind. There is no sourness or asceticism in his way of thinking, flashes of fancy are made to light up the gravest and most unattractive subjects, and, as frequently happens in men of a lively turn, the sparkle of his wit is warmed by a glow of sympathy and tenderness. His learning was very extensive and very minute, and he drew from out-of-the-way and neglected corners of reading illustrations which give the mind a pleasant shock of novelty. One great source of his picturesqueness is his frequent use of antithesis, and, in his works, antithesis is not what it frequently becomes in other authors, as in Samuel Johnson for example, a bare opposition of words, but it is the juxtaposition of apparently discordant ideas, from whose sudden contact there flashes forth the spark of wit or the embodiment of some original conception. The shock of his antithetical oppositions is like the action of the galvanic battery—creative. He has been accused of levity in intermingling ludicrous images with serious matter, but these images are the reflex of his own cheerful, ingenious, and amiable nature, and though their oddity may sometimes excite a smile, it is a smile which is never incompatible with serious feeling. He is said to have possessed an almost supernatural quickness of memory, yet he has given many excellent precepts guarding against the abuse of this faculty, and in the same way he has shown that wit and ingenuity may be rendered compatible with lofty morality and deep feeling. In a word, he was essentially a wise and learned humourist, with not less singularity of genius than Sir Thomas Browne, and with less than that strange writer's abstract indifference to ordinary human-interests.

§ 4 But by far the greatest theological writer of the Anglican Church at this period was JEREMY TAYLOR (1613-1667). He was of good but decayed family, his father having exorcised the humble calling of a barber at Cambridge, where his illustrious son was born in 1613. The boy received a sound education at the Grammar-School founded by Forse, then recently opened in that town, and afterwards studied at Caius College, where his talents and learning soon made him conspicuous. He took holy orders at an unusually early age, and is said to have attracted by his youthful eloquence, and by his "graceful and pleasant air," the notice of Archbishop Laud, the celebrated Primate and Minister, to whose narrow-minded bigotry and tyrannical indifference to the state of religious opinion among his countrymen so much of the confusion of those days is to be ascribed Laud, who was struck with Taylor's merits at a sermon preached by the latter, made the young priest one of his chaplains, and procured for him a fellowship in All Souls' College, Oxford. His career during the Civil War bears some resemblance to that of Fuller, but he stood higher in the favour of the Cavaliers and the Court. He served, as chaplain, in the Royalist army, and was taken prisoner in 1644 at the action fought under the walls of Cardigan Castle, but he confesses that on this occasion, as well as on several others when he fell into the power of the triumphant party of the Parliament, he was treated with generosity and indulgence. Such traits of mutual forbearance, during the heat of civil strife, are honourable to both parties, and as refreshing as they are rare. Our great national struggle, however, offered many instances of such noble magnanimity. The King's cause growing desperate, Taylor at last retired from it, and Charles, on taking leave of him, made him a present of his watch. Taylor then placed himself under the protection of his friend Lord Carbery, and resided for some time at the seat of Golden Grove, belonging to that nobleman, in Carmarthenshire. Taylor was twice married, first to Phoebe Langdale, who died early, and afterwards to Joanna Bridges, a natural daughter of Charles I., with whom he received some fortune. He was unhappy in his children, his two sons having been notorious for their profligacy, and he had the sorrow of surviving them both. During part of the time which he passed in retirement, Taylor kept a school in Wales, and continued to take an active part in the religious controversies of the day. The opinions he expressed were naturally distasteful to the dominant party, and on at least three occasions subjected him to imprisonment and sequestrations at the hands of the Government. In 1658, for example, he was for a short time incarcerated in the Tower, and on his liberation migrated to Ireland, where he performed the pastoral functions at Lisburn. On the Restoration his services and sacrifices were rewarded with the Bishopric of Down and Connor, and during the short time he held that preferment he exhibited the brightest qualities that can adorn the episcopal dignity. He died at Lisburn of a fever, in 1667, and left behind him a high reputation for courtesy, charity, and zeal—all the virtues of a Christian Bishop.

§ 5 Taylor's works are very numerous and varied in subject. I will content myself with mentioning the principal, and then endeavour to give a general appreciation of his genius. In the controversial department his best-known work is the treatise On the Liberty of Prophesying, which must be understood to refer to the general profession of religious principles and the right of all Christians to tolration in the exercise of their worship. This book is the first complete and systematic defence of the great principle of religious toleration, and in it Taylor shows how contrary it is not only to the spirit of Christianity but even to the true interests of government to interfere with the profession and practice of religious sects. Of course, the argument, though of universal application, was intended by Taylor to secure indulgence for what had once been the dominant Church of England, but which was now proscribed and persecuted by the rampant violence of the sectarians. An Apology for Fixed and Set Forms of Worship was an elaborate defence of the noble ritual of the Anglican Church. Among his works of a disciplinary and practical tendency I may mention his Life of Christ, the Great Exemplar, in which the details scattered through the Evangelists and the Fathers are co-ordinated in a continuous narrative. But the most popular of Taylor's writings are the two admirable treatises, On the Rule and Exercise of Holy Living, and On the Rule and Exercise of Holy Dying, which mutually correspond to and complete each other, and which form an Institute of Christian life and conduct, adapted to every conceivable circumstance and relation of human existence. This devotional work has enjoyed in England a popularity somewhat similar to that of the Imitation of Jesus Christ among Catholics, a popularity it deserves for a similar eloquence and unction. The least admirable of his numerous writings, and the only one in which he derogated from his usual tone of courtesy and fairness, was his Ductor Dubitantium, a treatise of questions of casuistry. His Sermons are very numerous, and are among the most eloquent, learned, and powerful that the whole range of Protestant—nay, the whole range of Christian—literature has produced. As in his character, so in his writings, Taylor is the ideal of an Anglican pastor. Our church itself being a middle term or compromise between the gorgeous formalism of Catholicism and the narrow fanaticism of Calvinistic theology, so our great ecclesiastic writers exhibit the union of consummate learning with practical simplicity and fervour.

§ 6 Taylor's style, though occasionally overcharged with erudition and marked by that abuse of quotation which disfigures a great deal of the prose of that age, is uniformly magnificent. The materials are drawn from the whole range of profane as well as sacred literature, and are fused together into a rich and gorgeous unity by the fire of an unequalled imagination. No prose is more melodious than that of this great writer, his periods, though often immeasurably long, and evolving, in a series of subordinate clauses and illustrations, a train of images and comparisons, one springing out of another, roll on with a soft yet mighty swell, which has often something of the enchantment of verse. He has been called by the critic Jeffrey, "the most Shakspearian of our great divines," but it would be more appropriate to compare him with Spenser. He has the same pictorial fancy, the same voluptuous and languishing harmony, but if he can in any respect be likened to Shakspeare, it is firstly in the vividness of intellect which leads him to follow, digressively, the numberless secondary ideas that spring up as he writes, and often lead him apparently far away from his point of departure, and, secondly, the preference he shows for drawing his illustrations from the simplest and most familiar objects, from the opening rose, the infant streamlet, "the little rings and wanton tendrils of the vine," the morning song of the soaring lark, or the "fair cheeks and full eyes of childhood." Like Shakspeare, too, he knows how to paint the terrible and the sublime no less than the tender and the affecting, and his description of the horrors of the Judgment-Day is no less powerful than his exquisite portraiture of married love. Nevertheless, with Spenser's sweetness he has occasionally something of the luscious and enervate languor of Spenser's style. He had studied the Fathers so intensely that he had become infected with something of that lavish and Oriental imagery which many of those great writers exhibited—many of whom, it should be remembered were Orientals, not only in their style, but in their origin. Taking his personal character and his writings together, Jeremy Taylor may be called the English Fénelon, but in venturing to make this parallel, we must not forget that each of these excellent writers and admirable men possessed the characteristic features of his respective country, if Fénelon's productions, like those of Taylor's, are distinguished by their sweetness, that sweetness is allied in the former to the neat, clear, precise expression which the French literature derives not only from the classical origin of the language, but from the antique writers who have always been set up as models for French imitation, while Jeremy Taylor, with a sweetness not inferior, owes that quality to the same rich and poetic susceptibility to natural beauty that gives such a matchless colouring to the English poetry of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

§ 7 Having thus given a rapid sketch of some of the great figures whose genius adorned the Church, it may complete our view of the religious aspect of that time to mention some of the more remarkable men who appeared in the opposing party. The greatest names among the latter class—Milton and Bunyan—will be discussed in subsequent chapters, but a few words may now be added respecting the excellent Baxter and the fanatical founder of the sect of the Quakers, George Fox, together with his more cultivated, yet not less earnest, follower William Penn, and Barclay, who defended with the arms of learning and argument a system originally founded by half-frantic enthusiasm.

RICHARD BAXTER (1615-1691) was during nearly the whole of his long life the victim of unrelenting persecution. Few authors have been so prolific as he, the multitude of his tracts and religious works almost defies computation. He was the consistent and unconquerable defender of the right of religious liberty, and in those evil days when James II. endeavoured forcibly to re-establish the Roman Catholic religion in England, Baxter was exposed to all the virulence and brutality of the infamous Jeffries and his worse than inquisitorial tribunal. He was a man of vast learning, the purest piety, and the most indefatigable industry. In prison, in extreme poverty, chased like a hunted beast, suffering from a weak constitution and a painful and incurable disease, this meek yet unconquerable spirit still fought his fight, pouring forth book after book in favour of free worship, and opposing the quiet sufferance of a primitive martyr to the rage and tyranny of the persecutor. His works, which have little to recommend them to a modern reader but the truly evangelic spirit of toleration which they breathe, are little known in the present day, with the exception of The Saints' Everlasting Rest, and A Call to the Unconverted.

GEORGE FOX (1624-1690), the founder of the Quaker sect, was a man born in the humblest rank of life in 1624, and so completely without education that his numerous writings are filled with unintelligible gibberish, and in many instances, even after having been revised and put in order by disciples possessed of education, it is hardly possible, through the mist of ungrammatical and incoherent declamation, to make out the drift of the author's argument. The life of Fox was like that of many other ignorant enthusiasts, believing himself the object of a special supernatural call from God he retired from human companionship, and lived for some time in a hollow tree, clothed in a leathern dress which he had made with his own hands. Wandering about the country to preach his doctrines, the principal of which were a denial of all titles of respect, and a kind of quietism combined with hostility not only to all formal clerical functions and establishments, but even to all institutions of government, he met with constant and furious persecution at the hands of the clergy, the country magistrates, and the rabble, whose manners were, of course, much more brutal than in the present day. He has left curious records of his own adventures, and in particular of two interviews with Cromwell, upon whose mind the earnestness and sincerity of the poor quaker seem to have produced an impression honourable to the goodness of the Protector's heart. Fox's claims to the gift of prophecy and to the power of detecting witches bear witness at once to his ignorance and simplicity, and to the universal prevalence of gross superstition, but we cannot deny to him the praise of ardent faith, deep, if unenlightened, benevolence, and a truly Christian spirit of patience under insults and injuries

WILLIAM PENN (1644-1718), the founder of the colony of Pennsylvania, played a very active and not always very honourable part at the court of James II when that prince, under a transparent pretext of zeal for religious liberty, was endeavouring, by giving privileges to the dissenting and nonconformist sects, to shake the power and influence of the Protestant Church, and thus to pave the way for the execution of his darling scheme, the re-establishment of Romanism in England Penn was a man of good birth and academical education, but early adopted the doctrines of the Quakers. His name will ever be respectable for the benevolence and wisdom he exhibited in founding that colony which was afterwards destined to become a wealthy and enlightened state, and in the excellent and humane precepts he gave for the conduct of relations between the first settlers and the Indian aborigines The sect of Quakers has always been conspicuous for peaceable behaviour, practical good sense, and much acuteness in worldly matters Their principles forbidding them to take any part in warfare, and excluding them from almost all occupations but those of trade and commerce, they have generally been thriving and rich, and their numbers being small they have been able to carry out those excellent and well-considered plans for mutual help and support which have made their charitable institutions the admiration of all philanthropists

ROBERT BARCLAY (1648-1690) was a Scottish country-gentleman of considerable attainments, who published a systematic defence of the doctrines of the sect founded by the rude zeal of Fox His celebrated Apology for the Quakers was published, originally in Latin, in 1678

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

OTHER THEOLOGICAL AND MORAL WRITERS.

JOSEPH HALL (1574 1656), bishop of Norwich, whose satires have been already mentioned (p. 83), was also a distinguished theological writer. His Contemplations and his Art of Divine Meditation are the most celebrated of his works. As a devotional writer he is second only to Jeremy Taylor.

ROBERT SANDERSON (1587 1663) bishop of Salisbury, one of the most celebrated of the High Church Divines, wrote works on casuistry, and sermons distinguished by great learning.

OWEN FELTHAM (circa 1610 1677), lived in the house of the Earl of Thomond. His work entitled Resolves, Divine, Moral, and Political was first published in 1628, and enjoyed great popularity for many years. But Mr Hallam's judgment is that "Feltham is not only a laboured and artificial, but a shallow writer." He owed much of his popularity to a pointed and sententious style.

SIR THOMAS OVERBURY (1581 1613) who was poisoned in the Tower in the reign of James I., wrote a work entitled Characters which displays skill in the delineation of character. His description of the Fair and happy Milkmaid has been often quoted, and is one of the best of his characters. He also wrote two didactic poems entitled The Wife and the Choice of a Wife.

JOHN EARLE (1601 1665), bishop of Worcester and afterwards of Salisbury, the reputed author of a work, Microcosmography, or a Piece of the World Discovered, in Essays and Characters, published anonymously about 1628. In some of these short characters Earle is worthy of comparison with La Bruyère, in others perhaps the greater part, he has contented himself with pictures of ordinary manners, such as the varieties of occupation rather than of intrinsic character, supply. In all, however, we find an acute observation and a happy humour of expression. The chapter entitled the Sceptic is best known, it is witty, but an insult throughout on the honest searcher after truth, which could have come only from one that was content to take up his own opinions for ease or profit. Earle is always gay and quick to catch the ridiculous, especially that of exterior appearances, his style is short, describing well with a few words, but with much of the affected quaintness of the age. It is one of those books which give us a picturesque idea of the manners of our fathers at a period now become remote, and for this reason, were there no other it would deserve to be read. (Hallam.)

PETER HEYLIN (1600-1662) a divine and historian, deprived of his preferments by the Parliament, was the author of many works, of which the most popular was his Microcosmus, or a Description of the Great World, first published in 1621.

JOHN SELDEN (1584 1654), one of the most learned men of his age, and the author of numerous historical and antiquarian works, but the one by which he is best known in English literature is his Jubæ Tull, published after his death containing many acute sayings, and well worth reading.

JAMES USSHER (1581 1656) archbishop of Armagh, likewise distinguished for his great learning, is best known by his chronological work, entitled Annals, containing chronological tables of universal history from the creation to the time of Vespasian. The dates in the margin of the authorized version of the Bible are taken from Ussher.

JOHN GAUDEN (1605 1664) bishop of Exeter and afterwards of Worcester, was the author of Non Dilectus, a work professing to be written by Charles I. The authorship of this book has been the subject of much controversy, but there can be no doubt that it was written by Gauden, who, after the Restoration, claimed it as his own.

CHAPTER XI.

JOHN MILTON, A D 1608-1674

§ 1 JOHN MILTON His early life and education. § 2 Travels in Italy.
 § 3 Returns to England espouses the popular party His Areopagitica
 § 4 Made Latin Secretary to the Council of State. His Defensio Populi Anglicani, and other Prose Works. His Tractate of Education § 5 History of his life after the Restoration His death § 6 Three periods of Milton's literary career FIRST PERIOD 1623-1640 Hymn on the Nativity Comus § 7 Lycidas § 8 L'Allegro and Il Penseroso § 9 Milton's Latin and Italian writings His English Sonnets § 10 SECOND PERIOD 1640-1660 Style of his prose writings § 11 THIRD PERIOD 1660-1674 Paradise Lost Analysis of the poem Its versification. § 12 Incidents and personages of the poem Conduct and development of the plot. § 13 Paradise Regained § 14 Samson Agonistes.

§ 1 ABOVE the seventeenth century towers, in solitary grandeur, the sublime figure of JOHN MILTON (1608-1674). It will be no easy task to give even a cursory sketch of a life so crowded with literary as well as political activity, still less easy to appreciate the varied, yet all incomparable, works in which this mighty genius has embodied its conceptions. He was born, on the 9th December, 1608, in London, and was sprung from an ancient and gentle stock. His father, an ardent republican, and one who sympathised with the Puritan doctrines, had quarrelled with his relations, and had taken his own independent part in life, embracing the profession of a money-scrivener, in which, by industry and unquestioned integrity, he amassed a considerable fortune, so as to be able to retire in 1632 to a pleasant country-house at Horton, near Colnbrook, in Buckinghamshire. (It was undoubtedly from his father that the poet first imbibed his political and religious sympathies, and perhaps also something of that lofty, stern, but calm and noble spirit which makes his character resemble that of the heroes of ancient story.) The boy evidently gave indications, from his early childhood, of the extraordinary intellectual powers which distinguished him from all other men, and his father, a person of cultured mind, furthered the design of Nature by generously permitting him to prepare by years of leisurely study and meditation for the service of the Temple—the holy temple of patriotism and literature. Milton enjoyed the rare advantage of an education admirably training him for the career of letters, and the proud care with which he collected every production of his youthful intelligence, his first verses and his college exercises, shows that he was well aware that of everything proceeding from his pen, "whether prosing or versing, but chiefly this latter, the style, by certain vital signs it had, was likely to live." What in other men would have been a pardonable vanity, in him was a duty he owed to his own genius and to posterity. He was most carefully educated, first at home, then at St. Paul's School, London, whence he entered Christ's College, Cambridge, yet a child in years, but already a consummate scholar. We may conceive with what admiration, even with what awe, must have been regarded by his preceptors both in the School and the University the first efforts of his Muse, which, though taking the commonplace form of academical prolusions, exhibit a force of conception, a pure majesty of thought, and a solemn and organlike music of versification that widely separate them from even the matured productions of contemporary poets. He left Cambridge in 1632, after taking his Master's degree, and there are many allusions in his works which prove that the doctrines and discipline of the University at that time contained much that was distasteful to his haughty and uncontrolled spirit. His first attempts in poetry were made as early as his 15th year, so that he is as striking an instance of precocity as of power of genius, and his sublime Hymn on the Nativity, in which may plainly be seen all the characteristic features of his intellectual nature, was begun on Christmas Day, 1629.

On leaving the University he resided for about five years at his father's seat at Horton, continuing his multifarious studies with unabated and almost excessive ardour, and filling his mind with those sweet and simple emanations of rural beauty which are so exquisitely reflected in his poetry. His studies seem to have embraced the whole circle of human knowledge: the literature of every age and of every cultivated language, living and dead, gave up all its stores of truth and beauty to his all-embracing mind; the most arduous subtleties of philosophy, the deepest mysteries of theological learning, were familiar to him: there is no art, no science, no profession with which he was not more or less acquainted, and however we may wonder at the majesty of his genius, the extent of his acquirements is no less astounding. It was during this, probably happiest, period of his life that he wrote the more graceful, fanciful, and eloquent of his poems, the pastoral drama, or Masque, of Comus, the lovely elegy on his friend King entitled Lycidas, and in all probability the descriptive poems L'Allegro and Il Penseroso. At this epoch his mind seems to have exhibited that exquisite susceptibility to all refined, courtly, and noble emotions which is so faithfully reflected in these works, emotions not incompatible in him with the severest purity of sentiment.

and the loftiest dignity of principle. He was at this time eminently beautiful in person, though of a stature scarcely attaining the middle size, but he relates with pride that he was remarkable for his bodily activity and his address in the use of the sword. During the whole of his life, indeed, the appearance of the poet was noble, almost ideal. His face gradually exchanged a childish seraphic beauty, for the lofty expression of sorrow and sublimity which it bore in his blindness and old age. When young he was the type of his own angels, when old of a prophet, a patriot, and a saint.

§ 2 In 1638 the poet, now about 30, set out upon his travels on the continent—the completion of a perfect education. He visited France, Switzerland, and the most celebrated cities of Italy, was furnished with powerful introductions, and received everywhere with marked respect and admiration. “Johannes Miltonus, Anglus,” seems to have struck the learned and fastidious Italians with unusual astonishment, and wherever he went the youthful poet gave proofs, “as the manner was,” of his profound skill in Italian and Latin verse. He appears everywhere to have made acquaintance with all who were most illustrious for learning and genius, he had an interview with Galileo, “then grown old, a prisoner in the Inquisition,” and he made pleasant and profitable acquaintance with Giovanni Diodati, of an illustrious house originally of Lucca, professor of theology, son of one Carolo Diodati, who had sought religious freedom in Geneva, and uncle of Milton’s friend Charles Diodati, and the noble Manso, the distinguished friend of poets, who had been the friend of Torquato Tasso, and now, to quote Pope’s line about St. John —

“With open arms received one poet more.”

During his residence abroad the young poet gave proofs not only of his learning and genius, but also of the ardour of his religious and political enthusiasm, so hostile to Catholicism and monarchy, and though he had at starting received from the wise diplomatist Wotton the prudent recommendation of maintaining “il volto sciolto ed i pensieri stretti,” his anti-papal zeal exposed him at Rome and other places to considerable danger, even, it is supposed, of assassination. The friendships Milton formed with virtuous and accomplished foreigners were in some degree the suggesting motive for two of his excellent Latin poems. While in Italian he wrote at least as well as the majority of the contemporary poets of any but the first class, in Latin verse his compositions have never been surpassed by any modern writer.

§ 3 After spending about fifteen months on the continent he was abruptly recalled to England by the first mutterings of that social and political tempest which was for a time to overthrow the Monarchy and the Church. So fervid a patriot and so inveterate an enemy of episcopacy was not likely to remain an inactive spectator of the momentous conflict he threw himself into the struggle with all the ardour of his temperament and convictions, and from this period begins the second phase of his many-sided life

Milton now began the career of a most eloquent, but vehement and even furious controversialist. He was one of the most prolific writers of that agitated time, producing works on all the most pressing questions of the day. Chiefly the advocate of republican principles in the state, he was the most uncompromising enemy of the Episcopal Church. His fortune being small, he opened a school in 1640, and among those who had the honour of his instructions only two persons are at all celebrated, his nephews John and Edward Phillips, who have contributed some details to the history of English Poetry. The commencement of Milton's career as a prose writer may be referred to about the year 1641, and it continued almost without interruption till the Restoration defeated all his hopes, and left him, in blindness, poverty, and danger, nothing but the proud consciousness of having done his duty as a good citizen, and the leisure to devote the closing years of his life to the composition of his sublimest poems, the Paradise Lost and the Paradise Regained.

Milton's first prose writings were directed against the Anglican Church Establishment, but he soon took a very active part in agitating an important question involving the Law of Divorce. This was suggested by his own conjugal infelicity. His first marriage was an unfortunate one. In 1643 he was united to Mary Powell, the daughter of a spendthrift and ruined country gentleman of strong Royalist sympathies, to whom Milton's father had lent sums of money which he was unable to repay, and who perhaps allowed his daughter to make an unsuitable and unpromising match in order to escape from his embarrassments. Mary Powell, disgusted with the austerity of Milton's life, soon visited her father's house, and was only recalled to the conjugal roof, in 1645, by the ruin of the Royalist cause, and the financial ruin of her father, who with his family had to take refuge in besieged Oxford. The lady was forgiven by her husband, but the remaining years of her marriage were probably not happy, though three daughters were the fruit of the union. We shall by-and-by see that Milton was twice married after the death of his first wife. The finest of the prose compositions produced at this epoch was the Areopagitica an oration after the antique model, addressed to the Parliament of England in defence of the Liberty of the Press. It is the sublimest pleading that any age or country has produced, in favour of the great fundamental principle of Freedom of Thought and Opinion. In this, as in many other of his prose works, Milton rises to an almost superhuman elevation of eloquence. It was published in 1644. About this time he began his History of England, a work which he abandoned quite at its commencement, he used the subject merely as a vehicle for attacking the abuses of Catholicism and the monastic orders. His father died in 1647.

§ 4 In 1649 Milton received the appointment of Latin Secretary to the Council of State, a post in which his skill in Latin Composition was employed in carrying on the diplomatic intercourse between England and other countries, such correspondence being at that time always couched in the universally-understood language of ancient Rome, but in these duties, in subsequent years after he had lost his sight, were joined with him in his office first Meadows, and afterwards the excellent and accomplished Marvell. The loss of the great poet's sight became total in 1652, though the gutta serena which caused it had been gradually coming on during ten years. His eyes, even from early youth, had been delicate, and in his intense devotion to study he had greatly overtasked them. In one of the noblest of his Sonnets he alludes, in a strain of lofty self-consciousness and religious resignation, to the fact of his loss of sight, which he proudly attributes to his having overtasked it in the defence of truth and liberty, and in the character of the blinded Samson, he undoubtedly shadows forth his own infirmity and his own feelings.

Connected with Milton's engagement in the service of the Republican Government are passages, both in prose and verse, in which he expresses his sympathy with the glorious administration and great personal qualities of Cromwell but his eulogy, though warm and enthusiastic, is free from every trace of adulation. He probably, though disapproving of the despotic and military character of the Protector's rule, gave his adherence to it as the least in a choice of many evils, and pardoned some of the unavoidable severities of a revolutionary government, in consideration of the great benefits which accompanied, and the patriotic spirit which animated it. It made England, for the time, the terror of the Continental nations and the representative of the Protestant interest.

Milton's most celebrated controversy was that with Salmasius (DeSaumaise) on the subject of the right of the English people to make war upon, to dethrone, and to decapitate their King, on the ground of his attempts to infringe the Constitution in virtue of which he reigned. The misfortunes and the tragic death of Charles I naturally excited in the minds of sovereigns at that time something of the same horror and alarm as the execution of Louis XVI afterwards spread throughout Europe and De Saumaise, one of the most learned men of the day, who was living chiefly at Leyden, in Holland, was employed by Charles II. to write what may be called a ponderous Latin pamphlet—for Latin was then the language of diplomacy in controversy, and science—invoking the vengeance of Heaven upon the regicide Parliament of England Milton replied in his Defensio pro Populo Anglicano, 1651, maintaining the right and justifying the conduct of his countrymen. His invectives are not less violent than those of his antagonist, his Latinity is not less elegant, but the controversy is as little honourable to the one as to the other combatant. The tone of literary warfare was then coarse and ferocious, and in their vehemence of mutual vituperation these two great scholars descend to personal abuse, in which exquisite Latinity forms but a poor excuse for brutal violence.

It would be tiresome to the reader, and inappropriate to a work like the present, to give a detailed list of all Milton's prose writings. Their subjects, for the most part, had only a temporary interest, and their style, whether Latin or English, generally resembles, in its wonderful power, grandeur, and picturesqueness, and in a sort of colossal and elaborate involution, that of the writings which I have already mentioned. I may, however, note the Apology for Smectymnus, in which Milton defends the conclusions of that famous pamphlet, the strange name of which is a kind of anagram composed of the initials of its five authors, the chief of whom was Thomas Young, Milton's deeply-venerated Puritan preceptor, the book called Eikonoklastes—or the Image-breaker—intended to neutralise the effect of the celebrated Eikon Basilike, written by Bishop Gauden in the character of Charles I, in which the piety, resignation, and sufferings of the Royal martyr were represented in so lively a manner that this work probably contributed more than anything else to excite the public commiseration. Other treatises, among which may be mentioned The Reason of Church Government Urged against Prelaty, The Ready and Easy Way to Establish a True Commonwealth, sufficiently exhibit in their titles the nature of their subjects. What is now most interesting to us in these controversial writings of Milton is firstly the astonishing grandeur of eloquence to which he occasionally rises in those outbursts of enthusiasm that are intermingled with drier matter, and secondly the notices of his own personal feelings, studies, and mode of life, which, in his eagerness to defend himself against calumnious attacks on his moral character, he has frequently interspersed. The Apology for Smectymnus and his pamphlet against Prelaty contain a most glorious epitome of his studies, his projects, and his literary aspirations. The only work that I need particularly mention, besides those already enumerated, is his curious tract Of Education. In this Milton has drawn up a beautiful, but entirely Utopian, scheme for remodelling the whole system of training, and reducing it to something like the antique pattern. Milton proposes the entire abolition of the present system both of School and University, he would bring up young men with as much attention to physical as to intellectual development, by a mechanism borrowed from the prytaneia of the ancient Greeks, public institutions in which instruction should have an encyclopedic character, and where all the arts, trades, and sciences should be taught, so as to produce sages, patriots, and soldiers. This treatise was published in 1644.

§ 5 With the Restoration, in 1660, begins the last, the most gloomy, and yet the most glorious period of the great poet's career. That event was naturally the signal of distress and persecution to one who by his writings had shown himself the most consistent, persevering, and formidable enemy of monarchy and episcopacy, and who had attacked, with particular vehemence, the character of Charles I. Though those who had taken any share in the trial and execution of the king were excepted from the general amnesty, Milton was only imprisoned, and liberated after a confinement of some months, and the indulgence with which he was treated may be attributed either to consideration for his learning, poverty, and blindness, or, perhaps, to the intercession of some who knew how to appreciate his virtues and his genius. It is said that Sir W. Davenant successfully used his influence to spare the aged poet any further persecution. From this period till his death he lived in close retirement, busily occupied in the composition of Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained. The former, published 1667, was finished in 1665, and had been his principal employment during about seven years. The companion epic, a work of much shorter extent, as well as the noble and pathetic tragedy of Samson Agonistes, were published in the year 1671. On the 8th of November, 1674, Milton died, at the age of 66, and was buried in Cripplegate churchyard. He had been three married, first to Mary Powell, by whom he had three daughters, all of whom survived him, and who are said to have treated him in his old age with harshness and disrespect. There is a tradition of his having employed his daughters to read to him and to write under his dictation—irksome drudgery to them, as there are documents which prove them to have been almost entirely without education. His second wife, Katharine Woodcock, he espoused in 1656, and this union, though of short duration, appears to have been far better suited than the first, his wife Katharine died two years after, in childbirth, and Milton had also the grief of losing his infant. He married for the third time at the advanced age of 54, probably with a view of obtaining that comfort and care which his helpless state so much required. The lady was Elizabeth Minshull, and was much younger than the poet, whom she survived.

§ 6 Milton's literary career divides itself naturally into three great periods—that of his youth, that of his manhood, and that of his old age. The first may be roughly stated as extending from 1623 to 1640, the second from 1640 to 1660, the date of the Restoration; and the third from the Restoration to the poet's death in 1674. During the first of these he produced the principal poetical works marked by a graceful, tender character, and on miscellaneous subjects, during the second he was chiefly occupied with his prose controversies, and in the third we see him slowly elaborating the Paradise Lost, the Paradise Regained, and the Samson Agonistes. I will now examine, somewhat more in detail, the works belonging to each phase of his intellectual development, promising only that the first epoch is mainly characterized by grace, the second by force, and the third by unapproachable sublimity.

In the early, almost boyish productions of Milton's muse—as the Verses at a Solemn Music, the poetical exercises written at school and college, the Hymn on the Nativity—no reader can fail to remark that this author already exhibits qualities of thought and expression which distinguish him from all poets of any age or country. The chief of these qualities is a peculiar majesty of conception, combined with consummate though somewhat austere harmony and grace. His poetry is like his own life—a perfect type of loveliness, uniting the severe yet sensuous beauty of classical sculpture with the ideal and abstracted elevation of Christian art. In all these works we see a scholarship so vast and complete that it would have overwhelmed and crushed a power of original conception less mighty than that of Milton, and a power of original expression that derives a duly subordinate adornment from inexhaustible stores of erudition. Above all there is visible, in even the first elaborate of Milton's poems, a peculiar solemn weighty melody of versification that fills and satisfies the ear like the billowy sound of a mighty organ. How wonderfully has he, in the Hymn on the Nativity, combined with the pictures of simple rural innocence the shepherds sitting ere the break of dawn, the picturesque legends connected with the cessation of the Pagan oracles at the period of our Lord's incarnation, the pictures of the horrible rites of Molech and Osiris, the grand image of universal peace that then reigned throughout the world, with the Lungs sitting still with “awful eye” of expectation, and the ghiras into the unspeakable splendours of heaven, the “helmed cherubim and seraphim harping in loud and solemn quire” before the throne of the Almighty. This magnificent ode is a fitting prelude to the Paradise Lost.

In my remarks upon the dramatic literature of the age of Elizabeth and James I, I took occasion to speak of that peculiar and exquisitely fanciful species of entertainment called the Masque, on which Ben Jonson and other poets had produced such delicious examples. It was reserved to Milton to equal the great poets who preceded him in the elegance and refinement which characterise this kind of half-dramatic half-lyric composition, while he far surpassed them in loftiness and purity of sentiment. They had exhausted their courtly and scholarlike fancy in inventing elaborate compliments to some of the most worthless and contemptible of princes, Milton communicated to what was originally a mere vehicle for elegant adulation a pure and lofty ethical tone that soars into the very empyrean of moral speculation. The Masque of Comus was written to be performed at Ludlow Castle, in the presence of the Earl of Bridgewater, then President of the Welsh Marches, an accomplished nobleman, and one of the most powerful personages of the time. That his daughter, Lady Alice Egerton, and his two sons had lost their way in the woods may be a real incident which suggested the plot, or, again, the story may have grown out of the masque. It was represented by the young people who were the heroes of the incident whether legendary or no, and the Attendant Spirit was acted by Milton's friend Henry Lawes, a composer who had studied in Italy, and who furnished the graceful music that accompanied its lyric portions. The characters are few, consisting of the lady, the two Brothers, Comus (a wicked enchanter, the allegorical representative of vicious and sensual pleasure), and the Attendant Spirit, disguised as a shepherd, which part was acted by Lawes (alluded to in ll. 84-91 of the poem). The plot is exceedingly simple, rather lyric than dramatic. The delineation of passion forms no part of the poet's aim, and perhaps the very abstract and ideal nature of the characters—their impersonality, so to say—adds to the intended effect by raising the mind of the reader into the pure and ethereal atmosphere of philosophical beauty. The dialogues are inexpressibly noble, not however as dialogues, for they must rather be regarded as a series of exquisite soliloquies setting forth, in pure and musical eloquence, like that of Plato, the loftiest abstractions of love and virtue. They have the severe and sculptural grace of the Grecian drama, combined with the warmest colouring of natural beauty, for the frequent descriptions of rural objects possess the richness, the accuracy, and the fancifulness of Fletcher, or Jonson, or of Shakspeare himself. While the dialogue itself is lyrical in its character, the songs interspersed are of consummate melody. For instance, the drinking chorus of Comus's rout, the Echo-song, and the admirable passages with which the Attendant Spirit opens and concludes the piece. The general character of this production Milton undoubtedly borrowed from Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess, from Jonson's Masques and his delicious fragment of a pastoral drama, and probably also from the same Italian sources as had suggested to those great poets the general tone and construction of the pastoral allegory, but in elevation, purity, and dignity, if not also in exquisite delineation of natural beauty, Milton has surpassed Fletcher and Jonson as much as they surpassed Tasso, or as Tasso had surpassed Guarini. In a somewhat similar strain to Comus, Milton composed a fragment, entitled Arcades, performed at Harefield before the Countess of Derby, by different members of her illustrious family. In this masque Milton's poetry had but a small share, most of the entertainment, as was frequently the case on such occasions, being made up of dances, music, and scenic transformations. Though the portion contributed by the poet is comparatively inconsiderable, it exhibits all his usual characteristics.

§ 7 The pastoral elegy entitled Lycidas was a tribute of affection to the memory of Milton's friend and fellow-student Edward King, lost at sea in a voyage to Ireland, where he was about to visit his friends and relatives. He was a young man of virtue and accomplishments, and the pastoral form of elegy was not inappropriate either to symbolise early conformity of studies between him and his elegist, or to the profession to which he was about to devote himself. In the general tone of the poem, and in the irregular and ever-varying music of the verse, Milton imitated those Italian models with whose scholarlike and elaborate spirit he was so deeply saturated. The poem is a Canzone, and one of which even the greatest poets of Italy might well have been proud. Throughout we meet with a mixture of rural description, classical and mythological allegory, and theological allusions borrowed from the Christian system, and nothing is more singular than the skill with which the poet has combined such apparently discordant elements into one harmonious whole. The shock given to the reader's taste by this apparent incongruity is in a great measure softened away by the abstract and poetical air of the whole, by the art with which the transitions are managed, and in some degree by the exquisite descriptions of natural scenery, flowers, and the famous rivers immortalised by the great pastoral poets of antiquity. Nevertheless the ordinary reader is somewhat surprised to find St Peter making his appearance among the sea-nymphs, and allusions to the corruptions of the Episcopal Church and the happiness of just men made perfect brought into connexion with the fables of pagan mythology. But the force of imagination and the exhaustless beauty of imagery which is displayed from the beginning to the end make the truly sensitive reader entirely forget what are inconsistencies only to the logical reasoning. In this poem we see how great was Milton's mastery over the whole scale of melody of which the English language is capable. From a solemn and psalm-like grandeur to the sweetest and most delicate playfulness, every variety of music may be found in Lycidas, and the poet has shown that our Northern speech, though naturally harsh and rugged, may be made to echo the softest melody of the Italian lyre.

§ 8. The two descriptive poems, L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, as they form a sort of pair of cabinet pictures, the one the complement and counterpart of the other, will be most advantageously examined under one head. They are of nearly the same length, written in the same metre, and consisting, with the exception of a few longer and irregular lines of invocation at the beginning of each, of the short-rhymed octosyllabic measure. In the Allegro the poet describes scenery and various occupations and amusements as contemplated by a man of joyous and cheerful temperament, in the Penseroso not dissimilar objects viewed by a person of serious, melancholy, and studious character. The individuality of the poet is seen in the calm and somewhat grave cheerfulness of the one, as well as in the tranquil though not sombre moroseness of the other. His joy is without frivolity, as his melancholy is without gloom. It would be interesting to compare these two poems with minute detail, paragraph by paragraph; for every picture, almost every phrase, in the one corresponds, with close parallelism, to something similar in the other. Thus the beautiful opening lines in which the poet drives away Melancholy to her congenial dwelling in hell, correspond to the opening of the Penseroso, and the invocation to Joy and her retinue of Quips and Cranks and wanton Wiles, Sport, Liberty, and Laughter, form the pendant to the sublime impersonation of Melancholy, which is indeed in poetry what the Night of Michael Angelo is in sculpture. The Cheerful Man is greeted by the lark, the cock, and the hunter's horn, and walks out, "by Ledge-row elms on hillocks green" to see the gorgeous sunrise. The sounds and sights of early morning are represented with wonderful beauty and reality, and the gradual unfolding of the landscape, under the growing radiance of the dawn, is perfectly magical. We then have a charming picture of rustic life, and this is succeeded by a village festival, where every line seems to sound responsive to the jovous bells and the sound of the rebeck. The day terminates with ghost stories and fairy legends related over the "nut-brown ale" round the farm-house fire. Having completed the picture of rural pleasures ("the bounds and horn" are but heard afar as they "cheerily rouse the slumbering morn"), the poet goes on to describe the more courtly and elaborate pastimes of the great city—the tourney, the drama, the marriage-feast, and the poem terminates with one of the most admirable of those many passages in which Milton has at once celebrated and exemplified the charms of music. Music was his favourite art. He inherited from his father an intense love for and no mean skill in it, it was afterwards his best—perhaps his highest—consolation.

tion in his poverty and blindness; and assuredly no poet in any language has shown such a deep sensibility to its enchantments. The passage in the Allegro in which he speaks of it is the most perfect representation that words have ever given of the consummate execution of the highest Italian vocal music. Among the pleasures of the city Milton has not forgotten the glories of the stage, and here he pays a compliment to Jonson's "learned sock," and to the "wood-notes wild" of Shakspeare. In the Penseroso we have, instead of the walk by the bright dawn, the contemplative wandering in the moonlit forest, the song of the nightingale, and the solemn sound of the curfew "over some wide-watered shore, swinging slow with sullen roar," and the meditation over the glowing embers in some solitary chamber. The contemplative man passes the long watches of the night in penetrating the sublime mysteries of philosophy with Plato, in studying the solemn scenes of the great dramatists of Greece, in following the wild and wondrous legends of chivalric tradition and poetry, and the daily walk is amid the deep recesses of some fairy-haunted forest, where the imagination is filled with the half-seen glories beside some stream round which floats a mysterious music. The poem ends with an aspiration after an old age of hermit-like repose and contemplation.

No analysis will give any idea of the immense riches of description with which these poems are crowded. There is hardly an aspect of external nature, beautiful or sublime, terrible or smiling, which is not expressed here, sometimes, as is ever the case in poetry of the highest order, in an incredibly condensed form. There are many examples of a whole picture exhibited in a single word, stamped, with one accurate expression, by a single stroke. As, for example, the "dappled dawn," the cock which "stoutly struts his dames before," the sun, at his rising, "robed in flames and amber light," the hill "hoar" with the floating mists of dawn, the "fallows grey," the towers of the ancient manor "bosomed high in tufted trees," the "tanned haycock," the peasants "dancing in the chequered shade." In like manner does the Penseroso abound with notable examples of picturesque word-painting. What a figure is that of Melancholy! "all in a robe of darkest grain, flowing with majestic train," fixed in holy rapture, till she "forgets herself to marble," and the song of Philomel "smoothing the rugged brow of night," "the wandering moon riding near her highest noon," and "stooping through a fleecy cloud"! All have seen this how few have embodied it in verse! The glewing embers that "teach light to counterfeit a gloom," or Tragedy "sweeping by in sceptred pall," the "iron tears" drawn down the cheek of Pluto by the song of Orpheus, and "minute drops" falling as the shower passes away, the "high-embowed roof" and "storied windows" of a Gothic cathedral, with their "dim religious light" What poet has so vividly painted all that is most striking in nature and in art? Be it remembered, too, that the strokes so rapidly enumerated are merely examples of happy expressions concentrated into a single word. The two poems abound in pictures not inferior in beauty to these, but developed at a length which precludes my quoting them here. Indeed to quote the beauties of these two works would be to transcribe them from beginning to end. The Allegro and Penseroso have been justly called not so much poems as stores of imagery from which might be drawn materials for volumes of picturesque description. Like all Milton's works, admirable as they are in themselves, they are a thousand times more valuable for their peculiarly suggestive character—filling the mind, by allusion to other images, natural and artificial, with impressions of tenderness or grandeur.

§ 9 The Latin and Italian productions of Milton may not unsuitably be considered in this place, as their composition belongs almost solely to the youth of the poet. In the felicity with which he has reproduced the diction of classical antiquity, Milton has rarely had an equal among the modern writers of Latin verse. Not even Buchanan, far less such authors as Johannes Secundus, has reached a more consummate purity of expression, or attained—which is far more difficult—the style of antique thought, and avoided the intrusion of modern ideas. He not only writes like Tibullus and Propertius, but he also feels like them: we never meet with the incongruity of modern ideas clumsily masquerading in classical costume. Among the Latin poems of Milton none are more interesting than the Epistolæ addressed to his literary friends—as, for example, the exquisite Mansus, and the elegiacs addressed to Charles Diodati. These, from their personal and intimate character, possess the charm of bringing us nearer to the thoughts, the tastes, and the individual occupations of the poet. They are totally free from that air of being a cento or a pasticcio, which is the prevailing defect of modern Latin poetry, their author seems always to think and feel as well as to write in the language he employs. In many passages, too, of these poems we see striking examples of that powerful conception which distinguishes Milton, as in his verses on the Gunpowder Plot there are impersonations which give us a foretaste of the Paradise Lost. The Italian poems of Milton are chiefly sonnets, and exhibit the same acquaintance with the forms and spirit of that species of composition, though perhaps hardly so much ease as the Latin works.

As a writer of sonnets it would be unjust to try Milton by any other standard than by his English productions in this department. Though a few are playful and almost ludicrous in their subject, the majority of the sonnets are of that lofty, grave, and solemn character which seems most congenial to the spirit of Milton. In the universal taste for imitating the types of Italian poetry, English writers, almost from the beginning of our literature, had cultivated this delicate exotic Sidney, Spenser, Shakspeare, and a host of inferior poets, had written sonnets, some of a very high degree of beauty, but it was reserved to Milton to transport into his native country the Italian sonnet in its correct form Macaulay justly observes that Milton's sonnets have none of that enamel-like brilliancy of expression which marks the sonnets of Petrarch: they are also free from the cold and pedantic conceits, and from that tone of scholastic ingenuity which frequently deform the conceptions of the lover of Laura Milton's sonnets are hardly ever on the subject of love, religion, patriotism, domestic affection, are his themes, and the great critic I have just quoted has most happily compared them to the Collects of the English Liturgy Among the finest of them I may specify the following — I To the Nightingale, VIII When the Assault was intended to the City, XIII addressed to his friend Lawes, in which Milton at once describes and exemplifies the sweetness of Italian song, XVI. a noble recapitulation of Cromwell's victories, XVIII on the Massacre of the Piedmontese Protestants, XIX on his own blindness, one of the sublimest as well as the most interesting from its personal subject, XX. a charming invitation to his friend Lawrence, describing the pleasures of an Attic and philosophic festivity Both Horace and Juvenal have similar passages, and I know not whether Milton, though infinitely more concise, has not described more beautifully than they the unbending of a wise and cultivated mind The XXIInd sonnet is on the same subject as the XIXth, and the poet has treated his blindness in a no less awful spirit of religious resignation mingled with patriotic pride In the XXIIIrd sonnet, which in spirit is not unlike many passages in the l'ita Nuova of Dante, and will fully bear a comparison with the famous Levommi il mio Pensier of Petrarch, the poet describes a dream in which he saw in a vision his second wife, whose death he so deeply deplored

§ 10 The second period of Milton's literary life is filled with political and religious controversy In the very voluminous prose works belonging to this epoch we see at once the ardour of his convictions, the loftiness of his personal character, and the force and grandeur of his genius Those who are unacquainted with his prose works are utterly incapable of forming an idea of the entire personality of Milton Whether written in Latin or in English, these productions bear the stamp of his mind They are crowded with vast and abstruse erudition, and the learning is, as it were, fused into a burning mass by the fervour of enthusiasm. The prose style of Milton is remarkable for a weighty and ornate magnificence, which in any other hands would be cumbrous and pedantic, but under the burden of which he moves with as much ease as did the champions of the Round Table under their ponderous panoply. When lashed to anger by the calumnies directed against the purity of his personal life, he gives us, in majestic eloquence, a picture of his own studies, labours, and literary aspirations, interesting in themselves, and striking from the beauty of the language. Glorious bursts of piety and patriotism, "a sevenfold chorus of halleluias and harping symphonies," show him ever and anon rising to a superhuman height. No style presents so hopeless a subject for imitation as that of Milton's prose. The immense length and evolution of the sentences, its solemn and stately march, deft all manner, consequently there is no style so characteristic of its author—none which so completely stands alone in literature. Even when writing English, Milton seems to think in Latin. His frequent inversions, and his general preference for words of Latin origin, contribute to make him in some respects the most Roman of all English authors. This quality, however, while it testifies to his learning and his originality, has undoubtedly tended to exclude Milton's prose writings from that place among the popularly-read English classics to which their eloquence undoubtedly entitles them. There is no doubt that they are becoming every day better known to the general reader, and that their popularity is certain to extend still farther. The finest of them, at least the most calculated to attract the notice of the literary student, are the Areopagitica, the Defensio Secunda, the Defensio pro Populo Anglicano, the Reasons of Church Government urged against Prelaty, the Apology for Sme'tymnus, and the tract Of Education.

§ 11 There is no spectacle in the history of literature more touching and sublime than Milton blind, poor, persecuted, and alone, "fallen upon evil days and evil tongues, with dangers and with darkness compassed round," retiring into obscurity to compose those immortal Epics which have placed him among the greatest poets of all time. The calm confidence with which he approached his task was the fruit of long meditation, profound study, and fervent prayer. The four great Epic Evangelists, if we may so call them without irreverence, respectively symbolize the four great phases of the history of mankind. Homer is the poetical representative of the boyhood of the human race, Virgil of its manhood. These two typify the glory and the greatness of the antique world, as exhibited under its two most splendid forms—the heroic age in Greece, and the majesty of Roman empire. Christianity is the culminating fact in the history of mankind—it is like the mountain ridge from which diverge two rivers running in opposite directions. As the antique world produced two great epic types, so did Christianity—Dante and Milton. Dante represents the poetical side of Catholic, Milton of Protestant Christianity, Dante its infancy, its age of faith and heroism, Milton its virile age, its full development and exaltation. Dante is the Christian Homer, Milton the Christian Virgil. If the predominant character of Homer be vivid life and force, and of Virgil majesty and grace, that of Dante is intensity, that of Milton is sublimity. Even in the mode of representing their creations a strong contrast may be perceived. Dante produces his effect by realising the ideal, Milton by idealising the real.

The Paradise Lost was originally composed in ten Books or Cantos, which were afterwards so divided as to make twelve. Its composition, though the work was probably meditated long before, occupied about seven years, that is from 1658 to 1665. I will give a rapid analysis of the poem, condensed from Milton's own plan prefixed to the various cantos. In Book I, after the proposition of the subject, the Fall of Man, and a sublime invocation, is described the council of Satan and the infernal angels, their determination to oppose the designs of God in the creation of the Earth and the innocence of our first parents, and the description of the erection of Pandemonium, the palace of Satan. Book II describes the debates of the evil spirits, the consent of Satan to undertake the enterprise of temptation, his journey to the Gates of Hell, which he finds guarded by Sin and Death. Book III transports us to Heaven, where, after a dialogue between God the Father and God the Son, the latter offers himself as a propitiation for the foreseen disobedience of Adam. In the latter portion of this canto Satan meets Uriel, the angel of the Sun, and inquires the road to the new-created Earth, where, disguised as an angel of light, he descends. Book IV brings Satan to the sight of Paradise, and contains the picture of the innocence and happiness of Adam and Eve. The angels set a guard over Eden, and Satan is arrested while endeavouring to tempt Eve in a dream. He is, however, allowed to escape. In Book V Eve relates her dream to Adam, who comforts her, and they, after their morning prayer, proceed to their daily employment. They are visited by the angel Raphael, sent to warn them, and he relates to Adam the story of the revolt of Satan and the disobedient angels. In Book VI the narrative of Raphael is continued, and the triumph of the Son over the rebellious spirits. Book VII is devoted to the account, given by Raphael at Adam's request, of the creation of the world. In Book VIII is pursued the conference between the angel and Adam, who describes his own state and recollections, his meeting with Eve, and their union. The action of Book IX is the temptation first of Eve, and then, through her, of Adam. Book X contains the judgment and sentence, by the Son, of Adam and Eve, who are instructed to clothe themselves. Satan, triumphant, returns to Pandemonium, but not before Sin and Death construct a causeway through Chaos to Earth. Satan recounts his success, but is with all his angels transformed into serpents Adam and Eve bewail their fault, and determine to implore pardon Book XI relates the acceptance of Adam's repentance by the Almighty, who, however, commands him, to be expelled from Paradise The angel Michael is sent to reveal to Adam the consequences of his transgression Eve laments her exile from Eden, and Michael shows Adam in a vision the destiny of man before the Flood Book XII continues the prophetic picture shown to Adam by Michael of the fate of the human race from the Flood Adam is comforted by the account of the Redemption and rehabilitation of man, and by the destinies of the Church The poem terminates with the wandering forth of our first parents from Paradise

The peculiar form of blank verse in which this poem, as well as the Paradise Regained, is written, was, if not absolutely invented by Milton, at least first employed by him in the narrative or epic form of poetry Though consisting mechanically of precisely the same elements as the dramatic metre employed by Shakspeare and his contemporaries, this kind of verse acquires, in the hand of Milton, a music of a totally different tone and rhythm It is exceedingly solemn, dignified, and varied with such inexhaustible flexibility that the reader will hardly ever be able to find two verses of similar structure and accentuation—at least except at a considerable distance from each other Every modification of metrical foot, every conceivable combination of emphasis, is employed to vary the harmony, and in this respect Milton has given to his metrical structure an ever-changing cadence, as beautiful in itself, and as delicately responsive to the impressions required to be conveyed, as can be found in the multitudinous billow-like harmonies of the Homeric hexameter, whose regular yet varied cadence has been so well compared to the roll of the ocean

§ 12 In the incidents and personages of the poem we find extreme simplicity united with the richest complexity and inventiveness. Where it suited his purpose, Milton closely followed the severe condensation of the Scriptural narrative, where the whole history of primitive mankind is related in a few sentences, and where his subject required him to give a loose to his invention, he showed that no poet ever surpassed him in fertility of conception The description of the fallen angels, the splendours of Heaven, the horrors of hell, the ideal yet natural loveliness of Paradise, exhibit not only a perception of all that is awful, sublime, or attractive in landscape and natural phenomena, but the power of overstepping the bounds of our earthly experience, and so realising scenes of superhuman beauty or horror, that they are presented to the reader's eye with a vividness rivalling that of the memory itself The characters introduced, the Deity and His celestial host, Satan and his infernal followers, and, perhaps, above all the ideal and heroic, yet intensely human personages of our first Parents in their state of innocence, bear witness alike to the fertility of Milton's invention, the severity of his taste, and the loftiness of what we may style his artistic morality. In Dante and Tasso the evil spirits, powerfully and picturesquely as they may be described, are composed of the common elements of popular superstition: they are monsters and bugbears, with horns, and tails, and eyes of glowing brass: and in their action we see nothing but savage malignity exaggerated to colossal proportions. Milton's Satan is no caricature of the popular demon of vulgar superstition: he is not less than Archangel, though archangel ruined, and in him, as well as in his attendant spirits, the poet has given sublimity as well as variety to his infernal agencies, by investing them with the most lofty or terrible attributes of the divinities of classical mythology. In employing this artifice he was able to pour out upon this department of his subject all the wealth of his incomparable learning, and to make his descriptions as suggestive as they are beautiful. Indeed, the mode by which he impresses the imagination is partly derived from the power, grandeur, and completeness of his own conceptions, and partly by the indirect allusions wherein his subsidiary illustrations revive in our minds all the impressions left in them by natural beauty, by the finest passages of other poets, and by all that is most striking in art, in history, and in legend. Milton is pre-eminently the poet of the learned: for however imposing may be his pictures even to the most uncultivated intellect, it is only to a reader familiar with a large extent of classical and Biblical reading that he displays his full powers. Of him may be eminently said that "he who reads, and to his reading brings not a spirit," if not "equal" yet trained at least in discipline somewhat similar to his own, the half of his beauties will be imperceptible. In the personages and characters of Adam and Eve he has solved perhaps the most difficult problem presented by his undertaking—that of representing two human beings in a position which no other human beings ever did or ever can occupy, and endowed with such feelings and sentiments as they alone could have experienced. They are beings worthy of the Paradise they inhabit, and though raised to heroic and ideal proportions, their moral and intellectual qualities are such as we can understand and consequently sympathise with. There is nothing more admirable than the intense humanity with which Milton has clothed them, while at the same time they are truly ideal impersonations of love, innocence and worship. Like the finest relics of ancient sculpture, or the noblest works of early Italian painting, they reach the full majesty of the divine without forfeiting the human and the real.

In the conduct and development of the plot of his poem Milton unites the merits of simplicity and complexity. He follows closely, when it suits his purpose, the severe concision of the Biblical narrative, and at the same time gives a loose to his mighty invention in the scenes of hell, of Heaven, and particularly in the episodic description of the revolt and punishment of the Fallen Angels. It has been objected that Adam is only the nominal hero of Paradise Lost, and that the real protagonist is Satan, and it is certainly true that the necessarily inferior nature of man, as compared with the tremendous agencies of which he is the sport, reduces him, apparently at least, to a secondary part in the drama, but this difficulty is surmounted by the dignity and moral elevation which Milton has given to his human personages, and by his making them the central pivot round which revolves the whole action. To speak of particular passages, either of sentiment or description, in which Milton exhibits beauty or sublimity would be quite inappropriate in an essay whose limits are confined. I may remark, that in every instance where his imagination and plastic power are seen at work, we find him at once soaring from the sensible into the abstract.

If the genius of Dante be eminently analytic, that of Milton is as obviously synthetic: where the former takes captive your credulity by the intense realisation—of an attained by the most matter-of-fact details of measurement or comparison—of the awful objects which he sets, as it were, before your bodily eye, the latter hurries your imagination into the realms of the ideal by suggesting what you dimly conceive rather than have ever seen. Thus in a somewhat parallel passage of the two poets, Dante, wishing to convey the conception of the size of a monstrous giant, gives you an exact measurement of some of its parts, and compares them to some well-known and familiar object, Milton, on the other hand, makes the giant bulk of the thunder-smitten demon lie extended "many a rood" upon the burning billows, and instantly goes off into picturesque details of the "small night-foundered skiff" moored to the "scaly rind" of the whale to which Satan is compared or again, in that passage of unequalled grandeur where the evil spirit defies the archangel who has detected him —

——— "On the other side, Satan, alarmed,
Collecting all his might, dilated stood,
Like Teneriffe or Atlas, unremoved
His stature reached the sky, and on his crest
Sat Horror plumed."

The whole poem is crowded with similar examples of the idealising tendency, which no poet ever possessed in an equal degree, and which is always united with Milton's peculiar taste for illustrating his pictures by means of subsidiary allusions suggesting the finest and most imposing objects in art, in legend, in nature, and in poetry.

§ 13 The companion-poem to the great Epic, the Odyssey to the Christian Iliad, is the Paradise Regained. It is much shorter than the first work, and consists of only Four Books or Cantos. The subject is the Temptation of Christ by Satan in the Wilderness, and the poet has closely followed the narrative of that incident, as recorded in the fourth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel. It is, however, evident that the only event comparable in importance to the Fall of Man was the Redemption of Man through the voluntary sacrifice of the Saviour, and that the Cross is the natural counterpart to the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, Calvary the true pendant to Eden. It is uncertain whether to attribute to advanced age or the consciousness of failing powers Milton's selection for the subject of his second epic, of an event in the history of Our Lord which, however important in itself, is unquestionably far less momentous than the consummation of the great act of human redemption. Some have ascribed this choice to certain modifications of belief experienced by the poet in the decline of life, and which prevented him from selecting the Crucifixion as a subject. Into this mysterious question it would be misplaced to enter here, I will content myself with noting that the universal consent of readers places the Paradise Regained, in point of interest and variety, very far below the Paradise Lost. The inferiority of interest is, of course, attributable to its want of action, the whole poem being occupied with the arguments carried on between Christ and the Tempter, and the description of the kingdoms of the earth as contemplated from the summit of the mountain. Even in Paradise Lost the long and sublime dialogues, frequently turning on the most arduous subtleties of theology, though they probably enjoyed a great popularity in Milton's own day, when such subjects formed topics of universal discussion, are now often found to be tedious, but in that poem they are relieved by the perpetual interference of action. In Paradise Regained the genius of Milton appears in its ripest and completest development: the self-restraint of consummate art is everywhere apparent, and in the descriptions of Rome, Athens, Babylon, and the state of society and knowledge, the great poet has reached a height of solemn grandeur which shows him to have lost nothing either of imagination or of learning. Nevertheless the effect of the poem upon the general reader is less powerful than that of Paradise Lost. A rapid analysis of the poem would be as follows.—Book I. After being baptised, Jesus, meditating on His birth and His Divine mission, retires into the wilderness. Satan appears under the disguise of an old peasant, and endeavours to justify himself. Book II contains a consultation of the evil spirits, after which Satan tempts Our Lord with a banquet and afterwards with riches. In Book III Satan pursues his attempts, endeavouring to excite ambition in the mind of the Saviour, and shows him the kingdoms of Asia Book IV exhibits the greatness of Rome and the intellectual glories of Athens, and Our Lord, after being conveyed back to the desert, is exposed to a pitiless storm, Satan again appears, and, after carrying him to the pinnacle of the Temple, is again defeated and reduced to silence. The poem terminates with a triumphant hymn of the angels ministering to Our Lord after His fast. In grandeur, elevation, and a kind of subdued sentiment, the Paradise Regained in no sense yields to its immortal companion, but in brilliancy of colouring and intensity of interest it is inferior. It may be said that the beauties of Paradise Regained will generally be more perceptible as the reader advances in life, and to those minds in which the contemplative faculty is more developed than the imagination.

§ 14. To this, the closing period of Milton's literary career, belongs the Tragedy of Samson Agonistes, constructed according to the strictest rules of the Greek classical drama. In the character of the hero, his blindness, his sufferings, and his resignation to the will of God, Milton has given a most touching embodiment of himself. As in the Greek tragedies, the action is simple, the persons few, the statuesque severity of the dialogue is relieved by majestic outbursts of lyric verse placed in the mouth of the Chorus, and the catastrophe, which could not be represented worthily on the stage, is, after the Greek fashion, related by a messenger. The whole piece breathes the somewhat harsh but lofty patriotism and religion of the Old Testament, and the lyric-choruses are sometimes inexpressibly sublime. So closely has Milton copied all the details, literary as well as mechanical, of the ancient dramas, that there is no exaggeration in saying that a modern reader will obtain a more exact impression of what a Greek tragedy was, from the study of Samson Agonistes, than from the most faithful translation of Sophocles or Euripides. The ancient tragedies had always a religious or mythological element, and the Biblical character, for us, has a sanctity like that of the heroic legends for a Greek, and therefore Samson is to us a personage not dissimilar to what Prometheus or Hercules would have been to a Greek.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

CONTEMPORARIES OF MILTON

Closely connected principally in a political but in some degree also in a literary relation with Milton is the truly venerable name of ANDREW MARVELL (1621-1678). He was born in 1621, educated at Cambridge, and employed the earlier part of his life in the diplomatic service, having been for some time attached to the English embassy at Constantinople. He afterwards gave instruction in the family of Fairfax and was recommended by Milton to the President Bradshaw as a person very fit to be joined with himself in the execution of his office of Latin Secretary. This appointment he obtained, though not till some time after in 1657, and Marvell appears to have all along entertained the strongest admiration for his great colleague, an admiration founded on community of taste as well as conformity in political and religious opinions. Not long before the Restoration Marvell was sent to the House of Commons as representative for the town of Hull and down to his death in 1678, he continued to fulfil the duties of a good patriot and an honest man. Many striking anecdotes are related of his incorruptible integrity, of the constancy with which he resisted both the menaces and the caresses of the Court, of whose arbitrary proceedings he was a vigorous opponent. But though many of these stories do not rest upon very good authority, their general similarity proves the character he enjoyed not only for virtue but for a pleasant and festive wit. He is said not to have been eloquent, but to have been listened to by all parties with respect, and his character seems to have conspicuously combined the severest rectitude with good nature and intelligence. He took an active part in the controversies of the day, and in several pamphlets powerfully denounced the arbitrary and papistical tendencies of the government. His works contain many interesting details of his long and familiar intercourse with Milton. He also deserves an honorable place among the minor poets of his time. His Lamentation of the Symphonist on the Death of her Faun, his song of The Emigrants (the Puritan exiles) to Bermuda, his Thoughts in a Garden are full of sweet and pleasant fancies, and exhibit a great delicacy of expression often exquisite from its very quaintness, as, for example, where he represents the oranges hanging in the tropic shade like golden lamps in a green light," or again, the fawn which "trod as if on the four winds," a most delicate hyperbole. In his satirical verses on the Dutch he has a droll exaggeration and ingenious buffoonery, many of the ideas are worthy of the quaint and learned fancy of Butler. It is difficult to find a more complete contrast than that presented by the conduct of Marvell as compared with that of Waller. They were both men of rare attainments, but while Marvell will always remain the type of the best incorruptible politician, faithful to his convictions and the warm advocate of liberty and toleration, Waller is the ideal of the cowardly and selfish time-server.

Another political writer of this period is JAMES HARRINGTON (1611-1677) the author of the once famous republican theory embodied in the Oceana which may be regarded as forming the counterpart to Hobbes's monarchical scheme of the Leviathan. He was learnedly brought up at Oxford, where he is said to have been the disciple of Chillingworth and for a long time resided abroad in the diplomatic service, being at various times attached to the legations in Holland, Denmark, the Hague and Venice. He was appointed one of the attendants upon King Charles I. when that unfortunate prince was a prisoner in the hands of the Parliament in 1647, and succeeded in inspiring the captive sovereign with feelings of confidence and attachment. He himself felt strong admiration for those high qualities of patience and magnanimity which misfortune developed in Charles's character. His great work, the Oceana was published in 1656. It contains an elaborate project for the establishment of a pure republic upon philosophical principles, carried out to those minute details which are so frequently met with in paper constitutions, and which are so impracticable when attempted to be put in actual execution. His organization is based upon landed property, which he maintains, is the only solid foundation for power, and the distinguishing characteristic of his plan is the principle of an elective administration, whose members are to go out of office by a complicated system of rotation. His exposition is clear and logical but the method he proposes has the never failing defect of all these scientific systems of ideal constitution makers viz., that of calculating upon results as if they could be predicted with unerring certainty upon mathematical premises. Political projectors, from Plato down to the Abbé Sieyès invariably forget that they have to do with the capricious elements of human nature and not with ciphers or the unvarying forces of inanimate nature. Harrington was the founder of the celebrated Rota Club, a society of political enthusiasts who met to discuss their theories, and to which belonged most of the philosophical republicans of that day—the Girondins of our English Revolution. In these discussions Harrington's mind was so heated that at last his reason gave way while undergoing an imprisonment to which he had been condemned; and in 1677 he died after having been liberated from confinement and restored to the care of his friends in consideration of his insanity.

ALFRED SOMERSET (1621-1693), another celebrated republican writer the son of Robert, Earl of Leicester and executed in the reign of Charles II., wrote a work entitled Discourses on Government, which was not published till 1693. It is a refutation of the patriarchal theory which is most fully propounded in the Patriarcha of Sir ROBERT FILMER, written in the reign of Charles I but not published till 1680. Filmer's fundamental principle is that the paternal authority is absolute, and that the first kings being fathers of families have transmitted this power to their descendants. Filmer's work was answered by Locke immediately after the Revolution (p. 272).

Our Revolution, so fertile in striking events and great orators, statesmen, and soldiers, was not without many noble instances of virtue and intellect exhibited by women. On the side of the friends of liberty appear two female figures glowing with the purest radiance—those of LADY RACHEL RUSSELL, wife of the illustrious patriot and martyr, and of LUCY HUTTON, son, perhaps the most perfect idea of conjugal affection and constancy. Both occupy an honourable place in the literature of their times, the former by the admirable collection of letters written to her friends after the cruel bereavement she so nobly supported and the latter by the memoirs which are among the most valuable and interesting documents of that agitated time. Lady Russell, whose husband was executed in 1643, survived till 1723, and her correspondence was collected and published after her death.

CHAPTER XII.

THE AGE OF THE RESTORATION

- § 1 SAMUEL BUTLER his life § 2 Subject and nature of Hudibras
 § 3 Butler's miscellaneous writings § 4 JOHN DRYDEN his life.
 § 5 His dramas § 6 His poems Absalom and Achitophel The Medal
Mac-Flectnoe § 7 Religio Laici and the Hind and Panther § 8 Odes Translations of Jænenal and Virgil § 9 Fables § 10 Dryden's prose works § 11 JOHN BUNYAN his life § 12 His works Grace abounding in the Chief of Sinners § 13 The Pilgrim's Progress § 14 The Holy War § 15 EDWARD HIDE, EARL OF CLARENDON § 16 His History of the Great Rebellion § 17 IZAAK WALTON His Lives and Complete Angler § 18 MARQUESS OF HALIFAX. JOHN EVELYN § 19 SAMUEL PEYS § 20 SIR ROGER L'ESTRANGE.

§ 1 If the greatest name among the Puritan and Republican party be that of Milton, the most illustrious literary representative of the Cavaliers is certainly SAMUEL BUTLER (1612-1650). However opposed in political opinions, and however different in the nature of their works, these two men have some points of resemblance, in the vastness of an almost universal erudition, and in the immense quantity of thought which is embodied in their writings. The life of Butler was melancholy, the great wit was incessantly persecuted by disappointment and distress, and he is said to have died in such indigence as to have been indebted for a grave to the pity of an admirer. He was born of respectable but not wealthy parentage in 1612, and began his education at Worcester Free School. Great obscurity rests upon the details of his career: thus there are contradictory traditions as to whether he studied at Oxford or at Cambridge, or even whether he enjoyed the advantages of a University training at all. In all probability the latter supposition is the truth, and lack of means deprived him of any lengthened opportunity of acquiring, at either University, any portion of that immense learning which his works prove him to have possessed. As a young man he performed the office of clerk to Jaffies, a country Justice of the Peace, and there is no doubt that he made himself acquainted with the details of English law procedure. He was afterwards—most likely by the protection of Selden, who knew and admired his talents, and who is said to have employed him as an amanuensis—preferred to the service of the Countess of Kent, in whose house Selden long resided, and to whom indeed he is said to have been secretly married. Here Butler enjoyed one of the few gleams of sunshine that cheered his unhappy lot, he possessed good opportunities for study in tranquil retirement, and he had the advantage of conversing with accomplished men. It is nearly certain that he was for some time in the service—in the capacity of tutor or clerk—of Sir Samuel Luke, a wealthy and powerful county magnate, and who figured prominently in those troubled times as a violent republican member of Parliament. He was an extreme Presbyterian, and his name appears in the list of excluded members after "Pride's Purge." In the house of Luke, Butler had the opportunity of accumulating those innumerable traits of bigotry and absurdity which he afterwards interwove into his great satire on the Puritans and Independents, and Luke himself, it seems almost indubitable, was the original of Butler's inimitable caricature of Hudibras, in which he embodies all that was odious, ridiculous, and vile in the politics and religion of the dominant party. His great work, the burlesque satire of Hudibras, was published in detached portions and at irregular intervals: the first part, containing the first three cantos, in 1663, the second part in the following year, and the third not until 1678. Though composed, in all probability, long before, the first instalment of this inimitable satire was obliged to await the Restoration to make its first appearance: for it was only that event, by inaugurating the triumphs of Butler's loyal opinions, that could have secured the author from serious danger. The poem instantly became the most popular book of the age, for it gratified at once the taste for the highest wit and ingenuity, and the vindictive triumph of the Royalists over their enemies and tyrants. Charles II, with all his vices, was a man who could appreciate wit and learning. He carried about Hudibras in his pocket, was incessantly quoting and admiring it, and Butler's poem became as fashionable at court as the not superior satire of Rabelais had been in a former age. Very little solid recompense, however, accrued to Butler for his work. He was named Secretary to Lord Carbury, and in that capacity held for some time the office of Steward of Ludlow Castle, where the Comus of Milton had been presented before the Earl of Bridgewater by his accomplished children, but soon after Butler lost this place. It is said that Clarendon, then Chancellor, and Buckingham, as well as the King, had intended to do something for the illustrious supporter of their cause, but that a sort of fatality combined with the usual ingratitude of that profligate court to leave Butler in his former poverty, and the great wit is reported to have died, in extreme poverty, in a miserable lodging in Rose Street, Covent Garden (1680). He was buried, at the expense of his friend and admirer Longueville, in the churchyard of St Paul's in that poor neighbourhood.

§ 2 Butler's principal title to immortality is his burlesque poem of Hudibras, a satire upon the vices and absurdities of the fanatic or republican party, and particularly of the two dominant sects of the Presbyterians and Independents. It is indeed to the English Commonwealth Revolution what the Satire Menippée is to the troubles and intrigues of the League. Its plan is perfectly original, though the leading idea may be in some measure referred to the Don Quixote of Cervantes, but as the object of Butler was totally different from that of the immortal Spanish humourist, so the execution is so modified as to leave the English work all the glory of complete novelty. The aim of Cervantes was to make us laugh at the extravagances of his hero, but without losing our love and respect for his noble and heroic character, that of Butler was to render his personages as odious and contemptible as was compatible with the sentiment of the ludicrous. Don Quixote, though never ceasing to be laughable, is in the highest degree amiable and respectable; indeed it is only the discordance between his lofty chivalric sentiments and the low and prosaic incidents which surround him, that makes him ridiculous at all. Transport him to the age of the Round Table, and he is worthy to ride by the side of Lancelot or Galahad. Butler's hero—the combination of all that is ugly, cowardly, pedantic, selfish, and hypocritical—is on the very verge of being an object, not of ridicule, but of hatred and detestation, and hatred and detestation are tragic and not comic feelings. Butler has shown consummate skill in stopping short just where his aim required it. All comic writing, the object of which is to excite laughter, attains its effect by the principle of discordance or disharmony between its subject and treatment, for as harmony is a fundamental principle of the beautiful, so is discord a fundamental principle of the ludicrous; consequently comic representations, whether written, painted, or sculptured, naturally divide themselves into two categories, both attaining their end by the same principle, though exhibiting that principle in two different ways. In one we have a lofty and elevated subject intentionally treated in a low and prosaic manner, in the other a low and prosaic subject treated in a lofty and pompous manner, and in either case the contrast, or discord, between the subject and the treatment, being suddenly presented to the imagination, provokes that mysterious emotion which we call the sense of the ludicrous. In the former case is produced what we name Burlesque, in the second what we designate Mock-heroic.

The poem of Hudibras describes the adventures of a fanatic Justice of the Peace and his clerk, who sally forth to put a stop to the amusements of the common people, against which the Rump Parliament had in reality passed many violent and oppressive acts. Not only were the theatres suppressed, and all cheerful amusements proscribed during that gloomy time, but the rougher pastimes of the lower classes, among which bear-baiting was one of the most favourite, were violently suppressed by authority. The celebrated story of Colonel Pride causing the bears to be shot by a file of soldiers furnished the enemies of the puritan government with inexhaustible materials for epigram and caricature. Be it observed that these severe measures were in no degree prompted by any motive drawn from the brutal cruelty of the sport, but simply from a systematic hostility to everything that bore a semblance of gaiety and amusement. Sir Hudibras, the hero of Butler, and who, as already remarked, is in all probability a caricature of Sir Samuel Luke, is described, both in his person and equipment, and in his moral and intellectual features, as a combination of pedantry, cowardice, ugliness, and hypocrisy, such as, for completeness, oddity of imagery, and richness of grotesque illustration, no comic writer, neither Lucian, nor Rabelais, nor Voltaire, nor Swift, has surpassed. He is the type or representative of the Presbyterian party. His clerk Ralph—the Sancho Pança of this odious Quixote—is the satiric portrait of the sour, wrong-headed, but more enthusiastic Independent sect. The versification adopted by Butler, as well as the name of his hero, is drawn from the old Anglo-Norman Trouvère poets, and the legends of the Round Table, and the baseness of the incidents, the minuteness of the details, and the long dialogues between the personages, form a parody the comic impression of which is heightened when we think of the stately incidents of which the poem is a burlesque. Sallying forth to stop the popular amusements, Sir Hudibras and his Squire encounter a procession of ragamuffins conducting a bear to the place of combat. They refuse to disperse at the summons of the knight, when a furious mock-heroic battle ensues, in which, after varying fortunes, Hudibras is victorious, and succeeds in incarcerating in the parish stocks the principal delinquents. Their comrades return to the charge, liberate them, and place in durance in their stead the Knight and Squire, who are in their turn liberated by a rich widow, to whom Sir Hudibras, purely from interested motives, is paying his court. Hudibras afterwards visits the lady, and receives a sound beating from her servants disguised as devils, and he afterwards consults a lawyer and an astrologer to obtain revenge and satisfaction. The merit, however, and the interest of this extraordinary poem by no means consist in its plot. Such incidents as are introduced are indeed described with extraordinary animation and a grotesque richness of invention, but there is a complete want of unity and connexion of interest, and there cannot be traced any general combination of events into an intrigue, or leading to a catastrophe.

A long interval elapsed between the publication of the first and last canto, and in that interval the politics of the day had undergone a complete change. Butler, whose main object was to satirise the follies and wickedness of the reigning party, was obliged to direct his shafts against quite other vices and totally different persons; thus in the last canto he describes the general breaking up of the Rump Parliament, and the events immediately preceding the Restoration. His poem in general, like the adventure of the Bear and Fiddle which it contains, "begins, and breaks off in the middle." But no reader probably ever regretted the irregular and undecided march of the story, for the pleasure given by Hudibras is quite independent of the gratification of that kind of curiosity which finds its aliment in a well-developed intrigue. The astonishing fertility of invention displayed in the descriptions both of things and persons, the analysis of character exhibited in the long and frequent dialogues (principally between Hudibras and Ralph), the vivid and animated painting of the incidents, and above all the immeasurable flood of witty and unexpected illustration which is poured forth throughout the whole poem—these are the qualities which have made Butler one of the great classics of the English language. Wit is the power of tracing unexpected analogies, whether of difference or resemblance; the faculty of bringing together ideas, apparently incongruous, but between which, when so brought together, the ordinary mind, though itself totally incapable of bringing them into contact, at once perceives their relation, and this perception, suddenly excited, is accompanied by a flash of pleasure and surprise. From the juxtaposition of the two poles of the galvanic wire, each previously cold and inert, darts forth a lightning-like spark of heat and radiance. The reader, being made the conducting body of this magic flash of wit, feels for the moment all the pleasure of the discoverer of the hidden relation. This power of associating ideas and images apparently incongruous, no author ever possessed in so high a degree as Butler; his learning was portentous in its extent and variety, and he appears to have accumulated his vast stores, not only in the beaten tracks, but in the most obscure corners and out-of-the-way regions of books and sciences. The amount of thought as well as reading he displays is almost terrifying to the mind, and he surprises not only by the unexpected images supplied by his immense reading, but quite as often by what is suggested by his fertile and ever-working imagination. The effect of the whole is augmented by the easy, rattling, conversational tone of his language, in which the most colloquial, familiar, and even vulgar expressions are found side by side with the pedantic terms of art and learning. The metre, too, is singularly happy, the short octosyllable verse carries us on with unabating rapidity, and the perpetual recurrence of odd and antithetic rhymes, whose ingenuity is artfully concealed under an appearance of the most unstudied ease, produces a series of pleasant shocks that awaken and satisfy the attention

Butler is at once intensely concise and abundantly rich. His expressions, taken singly, have the pregnant brevity of proverbs, while the fertility of his illustrations is perpetually opening new vistas of comic and witty association. He is as suggestive in his manner of writing as Milton himself, but while our great epic poet fills the mind, by indirect allusion, with all images that are graceful, awful, or sublime, Butler brings to bear upon his satiric pictures an unbounded store of ideas drawn from the most recondite sources. Milton leads the reader's mind to wander through all the realms of nature, philosophy, and art, Butler brings the stores of his knowledge and reading to our door. It is this marvellous condensation in his style, combined with the quaintness of his rhymes, that have caused so many of Butler's couplets to become proverbial sayings in common conversation, and to be frequently employed by people who perhaps do not know whence these sparkling fragments of wit and wisdom are derived. The contrast of characters in Hudibras and Ralph is of course far less dramatic than that between Don Quixote and his imitable Squire, yet the delicacy and vivacity with which Butler has distinguished between two cognate varieties of pedantry and fanaticism is worthy of great admiration. The sophistries and rascally equivocations which abound in the long arguments between the Knight and his attendant are admirable. It is not to be expected that Butler, whose object was exclusively satirical, should have taken into consideration any of the nobler qualities of the fanatics whom he attacked, and therefore we must not be surprised to find their intense religious zeal painted otherwise than as hypocritical greed, and their undoubted courage transformed into cowardice. The poem is crowded with allusions to particular persons and events of the Civil War and Commonwealth, and consequently its merits can be fully appreciated only by those who are acquainted with the minute history of the epoch, for which reason Butler is eminently one of those authors who requires to be studied with a commentary, yet the mere ordinary reader, though many delicate strokes will escape him, may gather from Hudibras a rich harvest of wisdom and of wit. However specific be the direction of much of the satire, a very large proportion will always be applicable as long as there exist in the world hypocritical pretenders to sanctity, and quacks in politics or learning. Many of the scenes and conversations are universal portraiture, as, for example, the consultation with the lawyer, the dialogues on love and marriage with the lady, the scenes with Sidrophel, and a multitude of others. From Butler's writings alone there would be no difficulty in drawing abundant illustrations of all the varieties of wit enumerated in Barrow's famous enumeration the

"pat allusion to a known story, the reasonable application of a trivial saying, the playing in words and phrases, taking advantage from the ambiguity of their sense, or the affinity of their sound. Sometimes it is wrapped in a dress of humorous expression, sometimes it lurks under an odd similitude, sometimes it is lodged in a sly question, in a smart answer, in a quirkish reason, in a shrewd intimation, in cunningly diverting or cleverly retorting an objection, sometimes it is couched in a bold scheme of speech, in a trait irony, in a lusty hyperbole, in a startling metaphor, in a plausible reconciling of contradictions, or in acute nonsense, sometimes an affected simplicity, sometimes a presumptuous bluntness, giving it being, sometimes it riseth only from a lucky hitting upon what is stranger, sometimes from a crafty wresting obvious matter to the purpose."

§ 3 A large mass of Butler's miscellaneous writings has been published, and a curious discovery was made long after his death, of the common-place book in which he entered the results of his reading, and such thoughts and expressions as he intended to work up into his writings. The posthumous miscellaneous consists of prose and verse. Among the former are sketches of a series of characters somewhat in the manner of Theophrastus, Fuller, More, and Tillam. They are marked by that extreme pregnancy of wit and allusion which is so characteristic of his genius. The poems are in many instances bitter ridicule of the punile pursuits which he attributes to the physical investigation of that day, and he is particularly severe upon the then recently-founded Royal Society, but he seems to be unjust to the ardour and success with which such researches were then carried on, and to have confounded with the sublime outburst of experimental philosophy the quackery and pedantry with which such movements are necessarily accompanied.

§ 4 The great name of JOHN DRYDEN (1631-1700) forms the connecting link between the English literature of the seventeenth century and the completely different turn of thought and style of writing, which were introduced at the Restoration. His life in its general features occupies the quarter of a century succeeding that of Butler. He was born, of an ancient and wealthy county family, in 1631, and his father being an ardent Puritan, it is not surprising that he should have entered upon his literary career a partisan of the same religious and political doctrines, and gained his first laurels by composing, in heroic stanzas, a warm eulogium on Cromwell. He was solidly educated, first under the famous Busby at Westminster School, and afterwards at Trinity College, Cambridge. At the approach of the Restoration he abandoned, as was to be expected, his predilections in favour of Puritanism, and attached himself thenceforward to the Royalist party, which was not only more likely to reward literary and poetical merit, but the spirit of which was an atmosphere far more congenial to his character. The whole life of Dryden is filled with vigorous and unremitting literary labour, and presents but few events unconnected with the successive composition of his works. Theatrical pieces were then the best-rewarded and productive form of intellectual labour, and, therefore, though conscious of his own deficiency in some important elements of dramatic genius, Dryden principally devoted himself to the stage, making a legal engagement with the King's Company of Players to supply them regularly with three dramas every year. It proves his wonderful readiness and fertility, as well as his extraordinary industry, that he was long able to fulfil so arduous a contract, and the mind is struck with astonishment on contemplating the rapid succession of dramatic works in which, by majestic versification, brilliant dialogue, striking situations, romantic and picturesque incidents, he contrived to compensate for his want of pathos and delicate analysis of human nature. His dramatic works constitute a very large portion of his entire compositions, and both in their merits and their faults they are at once strikingly characteristic of the peculiar genius of their author, and of the state of taste at the period when they were written. His dramatic career began about the year 1662 with the Wild Gallant, the Rival Ladies, the Indian Emperor, and many other pieces, tragic, comic, and romantic.

In 1663 the poet married Lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the Earl of Berkshire, a union which is not supposed to have much contributed to his happiness, the lady having been of a sour and querulous disposition, and whether from his own unfavourable experience, or from natural disposition, Dryden generally exhibits himself in the light if not of a professed misogynist, yet of one who delighted to gird at marriage.

In 1667 he produced his first great poem of a kind other than dramatic, the Annus Mirabilis, intended to commemorate the great calamities of the preceding year, the Fire of London and the War with the Dutch, then the rivals of England for supremacy by sea. This poem, written in the peculiar four-lined stanza which Davenant had employed in his poem of Gondibert, Dryden made the vehicle for much ill-deserved eulogium upon the King, and much equally ill-founded glorification of the conduct of a naval war which was one of the most humiliating episodes of our history. The poem, however, gave abundant proof of the vigour, majesty, and force of Dryden's style, and proved him to be the rightful heir to the vacant throne of English poetry. At this time he wrote his Essay on Dramatic Poetry, in which he formally maintains the superiority of rhyme in theatrical dialogue, thus ranging himself openly on the side of the then dominant literary party, who endeavoured to subject the English stage to the rules and principles of French tragedy.

The theory he maintained in argument he at this time exemplified in practice, by composing many pieces, as Tyrannic Love, in rhyme. His good taste, however, afterwards enabled him to shake off the shackles of prejudice in this respect, and he returned to the far finer and more national system of blank verse which had been consecrated by the authority of the great dramatists of the Elizabethan era. At this period Dryden was appointed Poet Laureate and Historiographer to the King, and for some time enjoyed the moderate salary of 200*l* attached to the office.

During the whole of his life Dryden was engaged in literary and political squabbles, sometimes with envious rivals, as with Settle, a bad poet, whom the public and patrons sometimes preferred to him, sometimes with more powerful and dangerous adversaries, as with the Duke of Buckingham, who, with the assistance of zealous poetasters, caricatured him on the stage in the famous burlesque of the Rehearsal. In 1679, the Earl of Rochester revenged himself for Dryden's Essay on Satire, by causing the poet to be waylaid by night and severely beaten by a number of braves, such as were often in the pay of the great men in those odious times. The incident, like the slitting of Sir John Coventry's nose, is disgracefully characteristic of a state of society, the tone of which, particularly in the higher and more fashionable classes, was, to use a popular but expressive term, eminently blackguardly.

In 1681 appeared the first part of one of Dryden's noblest and most original works, the political satire of Absalom and Achitophel, in which, under a transparent disguise of Hebrew names and allusions, he attacks the factious policy of the Chancellor Shaftesbury, and his intrigues with the Duke of Monmouth on the subject of the succession of the Duke of York. The second part of this poem was published one year after, but was principally written by Tate, Dryden having only contributed 200 lines, and probably also revised the rest. To the same period belongs also the Medal, directed against the same bold and unscrupulous politician. The purely literary satire, Mac-Flecknoe, in which Dryden takes a terrible revenge upon his rival Shadwell, and which is as original in design as it is forcible in execution, belongs to the year 1682. Dryden's fertility was almost inexhaustible. In 1682 he produced the Religio Laici, an eloquent and vigorous defence of the Anglican Church against the Dissenters, and one of the finest controversial poems in any language. In 1686 Dryden abandoned the faith he had so powerfully defended and embraced the Catholic doctrines, in which act he is unfortunately suspected of having been swayed in some degree by interested motives, as the change most suspiciously coincides with the efforts made by the King, James II., to convert everyone, by threats or corruption, to the faith of which he was so bigoted a professor Dryden, nevertheless, may have been sincere in thus changing his religion, at all events he produced in defence of it a polemical poem which, in spite of the fundamental absurdity of its plan, exhibits in a high degree his unequalled power of combining vigorous reasoning with sonorous verse and rich illustration. The poem was entitled the Hind and Panther, and will form the subject of some critical remarks in our general review of his works. It was published in 1687. In the following year the Revolution deprived the poet of that court favour which no Catholic or partisan of absolute monarchy could hope to retain, but this event was incapable of arresting the activity or chilling the fire of the great poet. He continued to write dramatic pieces, and gave to the world his excellent translation of Juvenal and Persius, with the former of which satirists his genius had many points of similarity. His translation of Virgil appeared in 1697, and seems to have been one of his most profitable literary ventures, it has been said that he gained 1200*l* by this publication. At the same time he composed his Ode on St Cecilia's Day, one of the noblest lyrics in the English language. Old age and broken health seem not to have been able to interrupt his career, for in 1700 he produced his Fables, a collection of tales either borrowed and modernised from Chaucer or versified from Boccaccio, in which his invention, fire, and harmony appear in their very highest power. In this year he died of a mortification in the leg, combined with dropsy, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, followed to the grave by the admiration of his countrymen, who saw that in him they had lost incomparably the greatest poet of the age.

§ 5 In considering the voluminous writings of Dryden, it will be advisable to review, first his dramas, then his various works in other departments of poetry, and lastly his prose.

In the drama Dryden is the chief representative of that great revolution in taste which followed the Restoration, when the sweet and powerful style of the romantic drama of the Elizabethan type was supplanted by an imitation of French models. The comic pieces of Dryden are marked by all and more than all the profound immorality which corrupted fashionable society at that odious period, and at the same time his deficiency in humour renders his pieces dull and stupid in spite of their extravagance, giving the reader no pleasantry to compensate for their grossness. The most flagrant instance of his ill-success in this branch was his comedy of Limberham, while it is but fair to remark that in the Spanish Friar there are scenes and characters of considerable merit. As the most popular and fashionable species of entertainment, the theatre was, of course, exposed to the full influence of the prevailing immorality, which was the reaction after the exaggerated severity of the Puritan times, and being a vice to which the stage is always of itself especially prone, this immorality was further intensified by the shameless profligacy of the court. Dryden, in yielding to this detestable tendency, merely followed the prevailing fashion, and though not perhaps personally a man of high spirit, showed, by the submission with which he received Jeremy Collier's well-merited rebuke on the indecency and irreligion of his plays, that he had the grace to be ashamed of faults which he had not the virtue to avoid.

The tragedy of this period forms a most amusing contrast to the comedy while in the latter the vilest indecency was paraded with unblushing impudence, tragedy affected a tone of romantic enthusiasm and superhuman elevation far removed from nature and common sense. The heroes were incessantly represented as supernaturally brave, as involving themselves in the most abstruse casuistry of amorous metaphysics, originally traceable to the wire-drawn subtleties of the romances of the sixteenth century, and which in their turn had their origin in the Arrêts d'Amour of the Provençal troubadours. Self-sacrifice is pushed to the verge of caricature, and all the ordinary feelings of nature are violated to attain a sort of impossible ideal of heroic and amorous perfection. In the Rival Ladies, the Indian Emperor, Tyrannic Love, Aureng-zebe, All for Love, Clcomenes, Don Sebastian, and similar pieces, we see Dryden's dramatic genius, as we see the dramatic spirit of the age, in its power and in its weakness. Dryden had very little mastery over the tender emotions, and very little skill in the delineation of character nor was he ignorant of his deficiencies in this respect he tried, and with no mean success, to compensate for them by striking, unexpected, and picturesque incidents, by powerful declamatory dialogue, and by a majesty, ease, and splendour of versification. The kind of scenes in which Dryden exhibits his nearest approach to dramatic excellence are dialogues in which the speakers begin by violent recriminations and finish with reconciliation, scenes, in short, similar to the quarrel between Brutus and Cassius in the Julius Cæsar of Shakspeare. Conscious of his power, Dryden has frequently repeated situations of this kind, examples of which are the dispute between Antony and Ventidius in All for Love, a piece founded upon Antony and Cleopatra, and the still finer specimen of the same kind of writing between Dorax and the King in Don Sebastian. In such scenes Dryden reaches if not the level of Shakspeare, at least that of Massinger or Fletcher. In his eagerness to supply constant food to the craving for novelty, Dryden sometimes forgot that veneration for the genius of his predecessors which on other occasions he has eloquently expressed, thus, in conjunction with Davenant, he condescended to make alterations and additions to Shakspeare's Tempest, transforming that pure and ideal creation into a brilliant and meretricious opera, full of scenic effects, and containing, beside Miranda, the addition of a young man who has never seen a woman, giving full opportunity for those prurient allusions which were then so vehemently applauded. Similarly he did not scruple to transform the Paradise Lost into an operatic entertainment, in which the sublimity and purity of Milton are strangely disfigured. This piece was styled the State of Innocence. In those days Prologues and Epilogues formed an essential and favourite accompaniment to theatrical pieces, and they were written with great skill, containing either allusions to the topics of the moment or judgments on the great authors of the earlier stage, and, when delivered by a fascinating actress or a graceful tragedian, were received with enthusiastic applause. Dryden was equally adroit and fertile in this class of composition, and many of his prologues and epilogues are masterpieces both in the comic and elevated style. In many of the comic productions of this nature he unfortunately panders to the prevailing taste for loose allusion and equivocation, particularly in those which were delivered by Nell Gwynne and other frail but fascinating beauties.

§ 6 Even in the earliest productions of this poet, as in his Heroic Stanzas in praise of Cromwell, it is easy to perceive that force, vigour, and majestic melody of style which distinguish him above all the writers of his age, above all the writers of any age, perhaps, in the English literature. In some of his first attempts he adopted the form of the stanza, generally, as in his Annus Mirabilis, the four-lined alternately-rhymed stanza of the Gondibert of Davenant. But he ultimately preferred the rhymed heroic couplet of ten-syllabled lines, a measure which he carried to the highest perfection of which it is capable, and even in his stanzas we may clearly see that they possess the essential elements of this last form of versification, as each can be resolved into two sonorous couplets. This kind of metre Dryden wielded with singular force and mastery: whether he reasons, or describes, or declaims, or narrates, he moves with perfect freedom, and the regularity of the structure of his verse, and the recurrence of the rhyme, so far from appearing to shackle his movements, seem only to give majesty and impetus to his march. He frequently intersperses a third line, rhyming with the two preceding, and forming a triplet, and this third line, which is often an Alexandrine of twelve instead of ten syllables, winds up the period with a roll of noble harmony—

“The long majestic march and energy divine”

{ Perhaps the greatest among his longer poems are those in which the subject is half-polemic and half-satirical. The Absalom and Achitophel contains a multitude of admirably drawn portraits, among which those of Shaftesbury, the Duke of Buckingham, Settle, Shadwell, and the infamous Titus Oates, remain in the memory of every reader. Nothing can better prove the extreme difference between the descriptive and dramatic manner of drawing characters than a comparison between the astonishing vivacity of these delineations and Dryden's weakness when endeavouring to represent human beings on the stage. In order to fully appreciate all the merits of this poem it is necessary to read it in connection with the history of the time, and to follow Dryden into his innumerable allusions to the questions and persons of the day. But even the general student, who will examine it from a purely literary point of view, will find in it the noblest examples of moral painting, always vigorous though not always just, and will perceive all the highest qualities of the English language as a vehicle for reasoning and description. The Medal, a satire directed, like the former, chiefly against the factious turbulence of Shaftesbury, contains passages not inferior Dryden has given us, in Mac-Flecknoe, the first example of purely literary and personal satire. Its object was his rival Shadwell, and the poet supposes his victim to be the successor in the supremacy of stupidity to a wretched Irish scribbler named Flecknoe, giving him to indicate this succession the title of Mac, the Celtic or Irish form of the patronymic. The satire is undoubtedly coarse and violent, but it contains numerous interesting details concerning the literature, and particularly the drama, of the day, and many passages are powerfully and bitterly original.

§ 7 The two great controversial poems Religio Laici and the Hind and Panther exhibit in its highest perfection Dryden's consummate mastery in perhaps the most difficult species of writing, namely poetry in which close reasoning on an abstract subject like theology should be combined with rich illustration and picturesque imagery. With the nature of his arguments it is not necessary to meddle, they are, both on the Protestant and Catholic side, the same that naturally present themselves to the disputant, and are based upon Scripture or tradition, upon induction or experience, as may best serve the writer's purpose. But the powerful and unfettered march of the reasoning, the abundance of picturesque illustration, and the noble outbursts of enthusiasm make us alternately converts to the one faith and to the other, and prove Dryden to be one of the greatest of ratiocinative poets. In the Hind and Panther we very soon get over the preliminary absurdity of the fable, in which the two animals that give the title to the poem are represented as engaging in an elaborate argument in favour of the two churches whose emblems they are—the "milk-white Hind" the Catholic, and the Panther the Church of England—as well as the representation of the other sects under the guise of wolves, bears, and a whole menagerie of animals The opening of the Religio Larci is incomparably fine, as well as the allusions more than once made in both poems to the writer's own religious convictions What is very curious is that Dryden, though unquestionably a man of strong pious aspirations, has always given a very unfavourable character of the clergy, and does not confine his satirical invectives to the priests of any one religion, but classes pagan augurs, Turkish imams, Egyptian hierophants in one common reprobation with Christian ministers of all sects, orthodox as well as sectarian

§ 8 The lyric productions of this poet are not numerous in proportion to their excellence. Interspersed among the scenes of his romantic dramas are many beautiful and harmonious songs, but his most celebrated production of this kind is his Ode on St Cecilia's Day, written for music, and celebrating the powers and the triumph of the art The narrative portion of this noble lyric is a description of the various passions excited by the Greek harper Timotheus in the mind of Alexander the Great, as he is feasting with his victorious chieftains in the royal halls of Persepolis Joy, pleasure, pride, pity, terror, and revenge successively arise under the "mighty master's" touch, and the various strophes at once describe and exemplify the sentiment they paint The poem concludes with an allusion to the fabled invention of sacred music by St. Cecilia Dryden is said to have written this admirable poem at a single jet, and in the space of a few hours It will always be regarded as one of the most energetic lyrics in the English language. In spite of some inequalities of expression, it rushes on with a flow and a swing like that of Pindar himself, and in many places the sound is an echo to the sense. It is the Sinfonia Eroica of Beethoven in words

The translation into English verse of the Satires of Juvenal and Persius exhibits Dryden's power of transferring to his own language not perhaps the exact sense of those difficult authors, but their general spirit There was a considerable similarity between the tone of Dryden's mind and that of Juvenal, the same force, the same somewhat declamatory character, and the same unscrupulous boldness in painting what was odious and detestable but the plain-spoken frankness of the Roman, in delineating the incredible corruption of the times of Domitian, degenerates into licentiousness in Dryden, who seems sometimes to gloat over descriptions which Juvenal introduced purely with an intention of exhibiting in all its horror the vice which he lashes Our poet's most extensive work of poetical translation was his English version of Virgil, and though he has produced what will always be regarded as one of the great standard monuments of our literature, it may be regretted that the author he selected for translation was not one more accordant with his peculiar genius Virgil's predominant quality is majesty indeed, but majesty always tempered with consummate grace, and Dryden, however characterized by majesty, was certainly deficient in grace and elegance. He seems himself to have become conscious of his error, and to have lamented that he had not rather chosen Homer. Two of our most illustrious poets, Dryden and Pope, have respectively translated Virgil and Homer—their glory would have been greater had they exchanged subjects. The robust and somewhat masculine genius of Dryden could not perfectly assume the virginal and ideal refinement of the Diana-like Muse of Mantua.

§ 9 The highest qualities of Dryden's literary genius never blazed out with greater splendour than when about to set for ever in the grave. His Fables, as he called them, though they are in no sense fables, but rather tales in verse, exhibit all his noblest qualities, and are in general free from his defect of occasional coarseness. The subjects of these narratives are either modernised and paraphrased from Chaucer, or taken from the same sources whence Chaucer drew his materials, the Decameron of Boccaccio, and other French and Italian novelle. Among the revivals of Chaucer may be specified Palamon and Arcite (the Knight's Tale), The Wife of Bath, The Cock and the Fox (the Nun's Priest's Tale), a paraphrase of Chaucer's character of the Good Parson, and The Flower and the Leaf, among the latter category the stories of Cymon and Iphigenia and Theodore and Honoria. These works are for the most part of considerable length, and it is curious to see how Dryden, with all his deep and sincere veneration for Chaucer, has failed to reproduce the more delicate and subtler qualities of his model. The splendour, the force, the picturesqueness of the original are indeed there, but the tender naïveté, the almost infantine pathos of the original, have quite evaporated, like some subtle perfume, in the process of transfusion. How far this is to be attributed to Dryden's own character—always deficient in tenderness—how far to the general tone of the age in which he lived, an age the very antipodes of sentiment, it is difficult to decide. In some degree, perhaps, that evanescent and subtle fragrance may be intimately connected with Chaucer's archaic language; but all who have attempted to modernise the father of our poetry have in a greater or less degree encountered the same insuperable difficulty. The diminution of tenderness is peculiarly perceptible in such passages as the dying speech of Arcite, and in many traits of the portrait of the Parson, to whom Dryden has communicated quite a modern air. These narratives, therefore, in order to produce their full effect, should be read as independent works of Dryden, without any reference either to Chaucer or Boccaccio. In which case they cannot fail to excite the liveliest admiration. The flowing ease with which the story is told, the frequent occurrence of beautiful lines and happy expressions, will ever make them the most favourable specimens perhaps of Dryden's peculiar merits

§ 10 Besides poetry, Dryden produced a very large quantity of prose, much of it of great value, not only for the style, but in many instances also for the matter. The form of his prose works was generally that of Essays or Prefaces prefixed to his various poems, and discussing some subject in connexion with the particular matter in hand. Thus in his Essay on Dramatic Poetry he investigates the then hotly-argued question as to the employment of Rhyme in Tragedy, his Juvenal was accompanied with a most amusing treatise on Satire, indeed few of his poetical works appeared without some prose disquisition. In this way he has travelled over a vast field of critical inquiry, and given us invaluable appreciations of poets of his own and other countries. Dryden must be regarded as the first enlightened critic who appeared in the English language. His judgments concerning Chaucer, Shakspeare, and his mighty contemporaries, Milton and a multitude of other authors, do equal honour to the catholicity of his taste and the courage with which he expressed his opinions. His decisions may, indeed, sometimes be erroneous, but they are always based upon reflection and a ground, specious at least, if not solid. These works, besides, are admirable specimens of lively, vigorous, idiomatic English, of which no man, when he chose to avoid the occasional pedantic employment of fashionable French words, was a greater master. The Dedications of many of his works to great and influential patrons, however little honour they may do to Dryden's independence of character, are singularly ingenious and well-turned, and in judging the tone of servility which such things display, we must not forget that it was the fashion of the time, and that a professional author, who lived by his pen, could hardly afford to sacrifice his interest to an assertion of dignity which no one at that time could understand.

§ 11 Literature presents no more original personality than that of JOHN BUNYAN (1628-1688), the greatest master of allegory that ever has existed. He was born at the village of Elstow, near Bedford, in 1628. His father was a tinker, and the son in his youth followed the same humble calling. Though born in the very lowest rank of social life, and consequently enjoying very limited advantages of education, which appear in Bunyan's case to have extended no further than simple reading and writing, he had before him the example of piety and morality, and at about the age of eighteen entered the military service in the Parliamentary army. In the strange and interesting religious autobiography which he wrote under the title of Grace Abounding in the Chief of Sinners Bunyan has given a curious picture of his internal struggles, his despair, his conversion, and his acceptance by God, and the whole range of mystical literature does not offer a more touching confession. Like all enthusiasts, he much exaggerates the sinfulness of his original state, and the peace and confidence in Divine mercy, which he attained at the price of agonies such as almost overthrew his reason, and which are of themselves an evidence of the natural strength of his feelings, form a contrast with the gloom and despair from which he imagined himself to have been rescued by a miraculous interposition of heavenly grace. But it is certain that the irregularities he so deeply deplores were venial, if not altogether trifling, and that his conduct had always in the main been virtuous and moral. He married very young, and his worst vices appear to have been a habit of swearing, and a taste for ale-drinking and the pastime—always so popular among the English peasantry—of bell-ringing and playing at hockey and tip-cat. After experiencing the fearful internal struggles usual when strongly imaginative and impressionable minds are first brought under religious conviction, he joined, in 1655, the sect of the Baptists, one of the most enthusiastic among the innumerable Calvinistic sects with which England was then seething, and he gradually attracted notoriety by the fervour of his piety and the rude eloquence of his discourses. Deeply sincere himself, and of a benevolent and loving disposition, he was eager to communicate to others those “glad tidings of great joy” which had been, as he imagined, divinely brought home to his own soul, and his powerful genius, combined with his religious ardour, must have given him vast power over the humble enthusiasts who composed his congregations.

At the time of the Restoration the government began to persecute with extreme severity the dissenting sects, which were in most cases identified with the political doctrines of the recently overthrown Commonwealth, and Bunyan, as a leading man among the Baptists, was necessarily exposed to these trials. After undergoing some minor persecutions, he was convicted of frequenting and upholding conventicles, and imprisoned for upwards of twelve years in the jail of Bedford. During this long confinement, the rigour of which, however, was gradually much relaxed towards its close, he supported himself by making tagged laces, and acquired the veneration of his companions by the benevolence with which he consoled them, and by the fervour of his religious exhortations. In prison, too, he enjoyed the society of his family, and particularly of his little blind daughter, of whom he was passionately fond. It was during this confinement that he composed his immortal allegory the Pilgrim's Progress. In the eleventh year of his imprisonment, when he was frequently allowed to leave the jail, he was chosen preacher of the Baptist congregation. The persecution against the sects having been gradually relaxed, in consequence of the jesuitical policy of James II., who under the mask of general toleration wished insensibly to relieve the proscription that weighed upon the Catholics, Bunyan was at last liberated altogether, and in 1672 he had become a venerated and influential leader in his sect, preaching frequently both in Bedford and London. His sufferings, his virtues, his genius as a writer, and his eloquence as a pastor contributed to his fame. He died in 1688, in London, it is said in consequence of a cold caught in a journey undertaken by him in inclement weather with the object of reconciling a father and a son. His character appears to have been essentially mild, affectionate, and animated by a truly evangelical love to all men. He was kind and indulgent, and free from that narrow-minded sectarian jealousy which loves to confine the privileges of salvation to its own little coterie, and, though a leading member of a most fanatical and enthusiastic persuasion, he exhibited a rare example of Christian charity and a truly Catholic love for all mankind. In spite, however, of the real mildness and gentleness of his character, his external manners and appearance, as he has himself recorded, had something austere and forbidding, but this was only apparent, and, apart from a few of those childish and almost technical scruples in matters really indifferent, which may be called the badges of sectarian societies, Bunyan showed none of the sour and peevish narrowness which is the vice of such bodies. This is as honourable to him as it is extraordinary in itself, when we reflect upon his limited education and upon the almost irresistible tendency of the circumstances which surrounded him.

§ 12 The works of Bunyan are numerous, but there are only three among them upon which it will be necessary for us to dwell. These are the religious autobiography entitled Grace Abounding in the Chief of Sinners, to which I have slightly alluded above, and the two religious allegories, the Pilgrim's Progress and the Holy War. In the first of these works Bunyan has given the minutest and most candid account of his own spiritual struggles and conversion. It is a book of the same order with the mystic writings of St Theresa, with the Confessions of St Augustine, and not inferior in interest and originality to the Confessions of Rousseau. The author lays bare before us all the recesses of his heart, and admits us to the tremendous spectacle of a human soul working out by unspeakable agonies its liberation from the bonds of sin and worldliness. It is evident that Bunyan has enormously exaggerated the criminality of his unregenerate state, and that the enthusiasm of his character has, though in perfect simplicity and good faith, intensified both the lights and shades of the picture. The delineation, however, can never fail to possess interest either for the religious student or for the philosopher who loves to investigate the mysterious problems of our moral and spiritual nature. The gloom and the sunshine, the despair and the triumph are alike reflected in the simple and fervent language of Bunyan, and the book abounds with those little inimitable touches of natural feeling and description which have placed its author among the most picturesque of writers.

§ 13 But it is in his allegories that Bunyan stands unrivalled, and particularly in the Pilgrim's Progress. This book, which is in two parts, the first beyond comparison the finest, narrates the struggles, the experiences, and the trials of a Christian in his passage from a life of sin to everlasting felicity. "Mr Christian," dwelling in a city, is incited by the consciousness of his lost state, typified by a heavy burthen, to take a journey to the New Jerusalem—the city of eternal life. All the adventures of his travel, the scenes which he visits, the dangers which he encounters, the enemies he combats, the friends and fellow-pilgrims he meets upon his road, typify, with a strange mixture of literal simplicity and powerful imagination, the vicissitudes of religious experience. Shakspeare is not more essentially the prince of dramatists than Bunyan is the prince of allegorists. So intense was his intellectual vision that abstract qualities are instantly clothed by him with personality, and we sympathize with his shadowy personages as with real human beings. In the fair or terrible scenes which he sets before us we feel our belief captivated as with real incidents and places. Thousands of readers, from the child to the accomplished man, have trembled and rejoiced, have smiled and wept, in sympathy with the joys and sufferings of Bunyan's personages. Dante possesses a somewhat similar power of realising the conceptions of the imagination; but Dante took for his subjects real human beings, whom he placed in extraordinary positions, where they still retain their personality, while Bunyan clothes with flesh and blood the abstract and the imaginary. Spenser was a great master of allegory, but it is not with his persons, so much as with the brilliant and picturesque accessories that surround them, that we interest ourselves. The Red-Cross Knight, Una, Malbecco, and Britomart do not excite any very lively anxiety about their fate as persons, we follow their adventures with pleasure and curiosity, as we follow the unfolding incidents of a dramatic spectacle, but we no more identify ourselves with their fate than we do with that of so many actors after the fall of the curtain. But Bunyan's dramatis personæ we follow with a breathless sympathy, somewhat like that with which we read Robinson Crusoe for the first time. This result is indeed in some degree to be ascribed to the simple, direct, unadorned style in which Bunyan wrote, and to the reality with which he himself conceived his persons and adventures.

The popularity of the Pilgrim's Progress was immediate and immense: it has continued to the present day, and the tale is one of the most fascinating to children and peasants. Indeed there is hardly a cottage in England or Scotland where Bunyan's fiction does not find a place on the scanty book-shelf, between the Bible and the Almanac. Encouraged by the success of the first part, Bunyan was induced to compose a continuation, in which the wife and children of Christian go over nearly the same ground and meet with nearly similar adventures. The charm, however, of the second part is far inferior to that of the first, the invention displayed, though remarkable, is devoid of the freshness which marks the persons and incidents of Christian's journey. A great many scenes and characters in Bunyan's books, though intended to embody allegorical meanings, are evidently drawn from real life. The description of Vanity Fair, many of the landscapes so beautifully and vividly painted, and a large number of the personages and dialogues, bear all the marks of being transcripts from Bunyan's actual experience. The agitated times in which the book was written were abundant in strongly-marked characters, both good and bad, and we may accept, for example, the lifelike scene of the accusation before the court of justice as a faithful picture of the incredible brutality and corruption of the tribunals of those evil days. Bunyan, like all great creators, was gifted with a lively sense of the humorous, and in the characters and adventures we frequently see a comic element of no inconsiderable merit. The sublime and the grotesque, the tender, the terrible, and the humorous, were alike tasted by this truly popular genius. In the largeness of his nature, as well as in the forcible and idiomatic picturesqueness of his language, he perfectly sympathises with the people, and he has expressed their sentiments in their natural tongue. His knowledge of books was very small; but the English version of the Bible, in which our language exhibits its highest force and perfection, had been studied by him so intensely that he was completely saturated with its spirit. He wrote unconsciously in its style, and the innumerable Scriptural quotations with which his works are incrustated like a mosaic, harmonise, without any incongruity, with the general tissue of his language. Except the Bible, from which he borrowed, consciously or unconsciously, the main groundwork of his diction, he probably was little acquainted with books. Fox's Martyrs and a few popular legends of knights errant, such as have ever been a favourite reading among the English peasantry, probably furnished all such materials as he did not find in the Scriptures. The Bible, indeed, he is reported to have known almost by heart.

With such intellectual training, applied to a mind naturally sensitive and enthusiastic, the style of a writer might be rude, harsh, nay, even sometimes ungrammatical, but it was sure to be perfectly free from vulgarity and meretricious ornament, and Bunyan is the most perfect representative of the plain, vigorous, idiomatic, and sometimes picturesque and poetical language of the common people. It resembles in its masculine breadth and solidity that ancient style of architecture which is improperly called Saxon its robust pillars and stout arches, its combination of rugged stone and imperishable heart of oak giving earnest of illimitable duration. It is surprising how universally Bunyan's diction is drawn from the primitive Teutonic element in our language for pages together we sometimes meet with nothing but monosyllable and dissyllable words, with the exception of a few theological terms, his structure is built up of the solid granite that lies at the bottom of our speech. Of course it was impossible that the allegory could always be maintained, in a work of such length the spiritual type could not always be kept distinct from the bodily antitype, but the reader seldom experiences any difficulty from this cause, being carried forward by the vivacity of the narrative. The long spiritual discussions, expositions of theological questions, and exhortations addressed by one interlocutor to the others, not only afford curious specimens of the religious composition of those days, but increase the verisimilitude of the persons. These passages, too, show Bunyan's profound acquaintance with the language and the spirit of the Scriptures, and place in the strongest light his benevolent and evangelical Christianity. In his descriptions he is equally powerful whether the object he paints be terrible or attractive, the Valley of the Shadow of Death is placed before us with the same astonishing reality as the Delectable Mountains—a reality strongly recalling the Hell and Paradise of Dante. No religious writer has analyzed more minutely and represented more faithfully every phase of feeling through which the soul passes in its struggles with sin the clearness of these pictures is rather increased than diminished by the allegorical dress in which they are clothed. In them Bunyan did but draw upon his own memory, and narrate his own experiences. He exhibits, too, that inseparable characteristic of the higher order of creative power, a constant sympathy with the simpler objects of external nature, and a preference of the great fundamental elements of human character.

§ 14 The Holy War is an allegory typifying, in the siege and capture of the City of Mansoul, the struggle between sin and religion in the human spirit. Diabolus on the one hand and Immanuel on the other, are the leaders of the opposing armies. In this narrative we see frequent traces of Bunyan's personal experience in military operations, such as he had witnessed while serving in the ranks of Cromwell's stout and God-fearing army. The narrative, viewed as a tale, is far less interesting than the Pilgrim's Progress, our sympathies not being excited by the dangers and escapes of a single hero. and in many points the allegory is too refined and complicated to be always readily followed. The style, though similar in its masculine vigour to that of the former allegory, is less fresh and animated.

§ 15 One of the most prominent figures in the Long Parliament and the Restoration was EDWARD HYDE, afterwards Chancellor, better known by his title of EARL OF CLARENDON (1608-1674). Not only was he an actor in the political drama of that momentous epoch, but he holds an honourable place among English historians by means of his history of the events in which he had taken part. Descended from a gentle stock, and educated at Oxford, he soon abandoned the profession of a barrister for the more exciting struggles of political life. He sat in the Short Parliament of 1640, when he was a member of the moderate party in opposition to the court, and afterwards, in the same year, was a conspicuous orator in the Long Parliament, at first supporting opposition principles, but after a violent quarrel with Hampden and the more advanced adherents of the national cause, he gradually passed over to the Royalist side. Finding himself at last in open rupture with the constitutional party, and even in imminent danger of arrest, he fled from London and joined the king at York. From this time Clarendon must be regarded among the most faithful, though certainly among the most moderate adherents of the Royalist cause. In 1644 he was appointed member of the Council named to advise and take charge of the Prince, whom he accompanied to Jersey, and whose exile and vicissitudes he shared from the execution of Charles I. to the Restoration in 1660. During the Republic and Protectorate Hyde remained abroad, generally in close attendance upon the exiled Prince and his little disreputable court, and generally giving such advice, as, if followed by his master and his companions, would have spared them much disgrace and many embarrassments. He was also rewarded with the title—then but an empty name—of Chancellor, and he was employed in several diplomatic services, one to the Court of Madrid, with the object of inducing the European cabinets to interfere actively on behalf of the exiled house. In this mission he was unsuccessful, so great was the terror inspired by the vigour of the great soldier and statesman who then swayed the destinies of England, and who first placed his country among the first-class powers of Europe. During this time Hyde had frequently, like many of his companions, and like the king himself while wandering in France and Holland, to support extreme poverty and privation. With the death of Cromwell crumbled to pieces the structure maintained as well as raised by his genius and patriotism. The Restoration took place; and in the frenzy of triumph which greeted the re-established monarchy, it was natural that Hyde should reap the reward of his services. He was installed in the high office of Chancellor, made first a Baron and afterwards, in 1661, Earl of Clarendon, and for some time was among the most powerful advisers of the court. His popularity, however, as well as his favour with the king, soon began to decline, for both his virtues and his faults were such as to render him disliked. The gravity and austerity of his morals formed a strong contrast to the extreme profligacy of the court, his advice, generally in favour of prudence and economy, could not but be distasteful to the king, and his lectures had the additional disadvantage of being tedious, while, like many other statesmen who have returned to power after a long exile, he was not able to accommodate himself to the altered state of opinion. At the same time the people looked with envy and distrust upon the great wealth which he was accumulating, not always by the most scrupulous means, and upon the spirit of nepotism which was making the House of Hyde one of the richest and most splendid in the country. The magnificence, too, of his palaces and gardens gave additional umbrage to public dislike, which was carried to the highest pitch when a secret marriage was divulged between his daughter Anne and the Duke of York, brother and heir-apparent of the king. This alliance between a family that every one remembered to have risen from the rank of country gentleman and the Royal House was looked upon with strong displeasure. Clarendon by it, became the progenitor of two queens of England, Mary and Anne. The minister's unpopularity was completed by the share he had in advising Charles to sell Dunkirk to Louis XIV., a measure which excited the intensest feeling of national humiliation, and Clarendon was accused by popular rumour of receiving a share of the proceeds of this disgraceful compact. His splendid palace in London received the bitter nickname of "Dunkirk House." Charles was not a man to sacrifice an atom of popularity for the purpose of screening a minister, even had he been personally attached to Clarendon. The Chancellor was impeached for High Treason, went into exile, and passed the remainder of his life in France, where he died, at Rouen, in 1674.

§ 16 Clarendon was the author of many state papers and other official documents, which exhibit a grave and dignified eloquence, but his great work is the History of the Great Rebellion, as he naturally, in his quality of a Royalist, designated the Civil War. This review of events embraces a detailed account, rather in the form of Memoirs than regular history, of the proceedings from 1625 to 1633, together with a narrative of the incidents which led to the Restoration. As the materials were derived from the author's personal experience, the work is of high value, and places Clarendon among the leading historical writers of his age, while the dignity and liveliness of the style, in spite of occasional obscurity, will ever rank him among the great classical English prose-writers. Impartial he cannot be expected to be, but his partiality is less frequent and less flagrant than could fairly have been anticipated. The moderation of his character has occasionally led him to hesitate between two conclusions, and even when convicted of partiality he may be said to be rather negatively than positively unfair. If we take into consideration the number and complexity of the events he had to treat, we shall find fewer serious inaccuracies than could have been looked for in his account of facts. Above all he is excellent in the delineation of character. These are the parts of his work most carefully elaborated, and in them we often find penetration in judging and skill in portraying varieties of human nature.

§ 17 There is perhaps no character, whether personal or literary more perfectly enviable than that of IZAAK WALTON-(1593-1683). He was born at Stafford in 1593, and passed his early manhood in London, where he carried on the humble business of a "sempster" or linendraper. At about 50 he was able to retire from trade, probably with such a competency as was sufficient for his modest desires, and lived till the great age of 90 in ease and tranquillity, enjoying the friendship of many of the most learned and accomplished men of his time, and amusing himself with literature and his beloved pastime of the angle. His marriage with a sister of the truly apostolic Bishop Ken probably brought him into contact with such men as Donne, Hales, Wotton, Chillingworth, Sanderson, and Ussher, and the exquisite modesty and simplicity of his character soon ripened such acquaintance into solid friendships. He produced at different times the Lives of five persons, all distinguished for their virtues and accomplishments, namely, Donne, Wotton, Hooker, Herbert, and Bishop Sanderson, with the first, second, and last of whom he had been intimate. These biographies are unlike anything else in literature: they are written with such a tender and simple grace, with such an unaffected fervour of personal attachment and simple piety, that they will ever be regarded as masterpieces. But Walton's great work is the Complete-Angler, a treatise on his favourite art of fishing, in which the precepts for the sport are combined with such inimitable descriptions of English river scenery, such charming dialogues, and so prevailing a tone of gratitude for God's goodness, that the book is absolutely unique in literature. The passion of the English for all kinds of field-sports and out-of-door amusements is closely connected with sensibility to the loveliness of rural nature, and the calm home-scenes of our national scenery are reflected with a loving truth in Walton's descriptions of those quiet rivers and daisied meadows which the good old man haunted roe in hand. The treatise, with a quaint gravity that adds to its charm, is thrown into a series of dialogues, first between Piscator, Venator, and Auceps, each of whom in turn proclaims the superiority of his favourite sport, and afterwards between Piscator and Venator, the latter of whom is converted by the angler, and becomes his disciple. Mixed up with technical precepts, now become a little obsolete, are an infinite number of descriptions of angling-days, together with dialogues breathing the sweetest sympathy with natural beauty and a pious philosophy that make Walton one of the most eloquent teachers of virtue and religion. The expressions are as pure and sweet and graceful as the sentiment, and the occasional occurrence of a little touch of old-fashioned innocent pedantry only adds to the indefinable fascination of the work, breaking up its monotony like a ripple upon the sunny surface of a stream. No other literature possesses a book similar to the Complete Angler, the popularity of which seems likely to last as long as the language. A second part was added by CHARLES COTTON (see p 186), a clever poet, the friend and adopted son of Izaak, and his rival in the passion for angling. The continuation, though inferior, breathes the same spirit, and, like it, contains many beautiful and simple lyrics in praise of the art.

§ 18 GEORGE SAVILE, MARQUESS-OF HALIFAX (1630-1695), one of the most illustrious statesmen of the Restoration, deserves notice on account of his political tracts, which, says Macaulay, "well deserve to be studied for their literary merit, and fully entitle him to a place among English classics."

One of the most charming, as well as solid and useful, writers of this period was JOHN EVELYN (1620-1706), a gentleman of good family and considerable fortune, whose life and character afford a model of what is most to be envied and desired. Virtuous, accomplished, and modest, he distributed his time between literary and philosophical occupations and the never-cloying amusements of rural life. He was one of the founders of the delightful art, so successfully practised in England, of gardening and planting. His principal works are Sylva, a treatise on the nature and management of forest-trees, to the precepts of which, as well as to the example of Evelyn himself, the country is indebted for its abundance of magnificent timber, and Terra, a work on agriculture and gardening. In both of these books we see not only the practical good sense of the author, but the benevolence of his heart, and an exquisite sensibility to the beauties of nature, as well as a profound and manly piety. In his feeling for the art of gardening he is the worthy successor of Bacon and predecessor of Shenstone. Evelyn has left also a Diary, giving a minute account of the state of society in his time, and his pictures of the incredible infamy and corruption of the court of Charles II, through the abominations of which the pure and gentle spirit of Evelyn passed, like the Lady in Comus, amid the bestial rout of the Enchanter. His description of the tremendous fire of London in 1665, of which he was an eyewitness, is the most detailed as well as trustworthy and picturesque account of that awful calamity. It was at the country house of Evelyn, at Sayes Court, near Deptford, that Peter the Great was lodged during his residence in England, and Evelyn gives a lamentable account of the dirt and devastation caused in the dwelling and the beautiful garden by the barbarian monarch and his suite. Indeed he obtained from Government compensation for the injury done to his property. The Diary, as well as all the other works of this good man, abounds in traits of personal character. He, his family, and his friends, seem to have formed a little oasis of piety, virtue, and refinement, amid the desert of rottenness offered by the higher society of those days, and his writings will always retain the double interest derived from his personal virtues, and the fidelity with which they delineate a peculiar phase in the national history.

§ 19. An original and even comic personality of this era is SAMUEL PEPYS (1632-1703), whose individual character was as singular as his writings. He was the friendless cadet of an ancient family, but born in such humble circumstances that, after receiving some education at the University, he is supposed to have for some time exercised the trade of a tailor, and during his whole life he retained a most ludicrous passion for fine clothes, which he is never weary of describing with more than the gusto of a man-milliner. By the protection of a distant connexion, Sir Edward Montagu, he was placed in a subordinate office in the Admiralty, and by his punctuality, honesty, and knowledge of business, he gradually rose to the important post of Secretary in that department. He remained many years in this office, and must be considered as almost the only honest and able public official connected with the Naval administration during the reigns of Charles II and James II. In the former of these the English marine was reduced, by the corruption and rapacity of the Court, to the very lowest depth of degradation and inefficiency. The successor of Charles was by profession a seaman, and on his accession employed all his efforts to restore the service to its former vigour. Perhaps the only portion of that miserable King's administration which can be regarded with anything but contempt and horror, is the effort he made to improve the condition of the Fleet. To this object the honesty and activity of Pepys contributed, and after acquiring a sufficient fortune without any serious imputation on his integrity, the old Secretary retired from the service to pass the evening of his life in well-earned ease. During the whole of his long and active career, Pepys had amused himself, for the eternal gratitude of posterity, in writing down, day by day, in a sort of cypher or shorthand, a Diary of everything he saw, did, or thought. After having been preserved for about a century and a half, this curious record has been decyphered and given to the world, and the whole range of literature does not present a record more curious in itself, or exhibiting a more singular and laughable type of human character. Pepys was not only by nature a thorough gossip, curious as an old woman, with a strong taste for occasional jollifications, and a touch of the antiquary and curiosity-hunter, but he was necessarily brought into contact with all classes of persons, from the King and his ministers down to the poor half-starved sailors whose pay he had to distribute. Writing entirely for himself, Pepys, with ludicrous naïveté, sets down the minutest details of his gradual rise in wealth and importance, noting every suit of clothes ordered by either himself or his wife, which he describes with rapturous enthusiasm, and chronicling every quarrel and reconciliation arising out of Mrs. Pepys's frequent and not unfounded fits of jealousy, for he is suspiciously fond of frequenting the pleasant but profligate society of pretty actresses and singers. The Diary is a complete scandalous chronicle of a society so gay and debauched that the simple description of what took place is equal to the most dramatic picture of the novelist. The statesmen, courtiers, players, and demureps actually live before our eyes, and there is no book that gives so lively a portraiture of one of the extraordinary states of society that then existed. All the minutiae of dress, manners, amusements, and social life are vividly presented to us, and it is really alarming to think of the uproar that would have taken place if it had come to light that a careful hand had been chronicling every scandal of the day. Pepys's own character—an inimitable mixture of shrewdness, vanity, good sense, and simplicity—infinately exalts the piquancy of his revelations, and his book possesses the double interest of the value and curiosity of its matter, and of the colouring given to that matter by the oddity of the narrator.

§ 20 As a type of the fugitive literature of this age may be mentioned the writings of SIR ROGER L'ESTRANGE (1616-1704), an active pamphleteer and hack writer in favour of the Royalist party. His savage diatribes against the opponents of the Court are now almost forgotten, but they are curious as exhibiting a peculiar force of slang and vulgar vivacity which were then regarded as smart writing. His works are full of the familiar expressions which were current in society, and though low in taste, are not without a certain fire. Like another writer of the same stamp, Tom Brown, he has given an example of how ephemeral must always be the success of that soi-disant humorous style which depends for its effect upon the employment of the current jargon of the town. In every age there are authors who trust to this for their popularity; and the temporary vogue of such writers is generally as great as is the oblivion to which they are certain to be condemned. L'Estrangé has curiously exemplified his mode of writing in a sort of prose paraphrase of the ancient Fables attributed to the mysterious name of Æsop, and his Life of that imaginary person is a rare specimen of the pert familiarity which at that time passed for wit.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

OTHER WRITERS.

DR WALTER CHARLETON (1619-1707), physician to Charles II and president of the College of Physicians. He was a man of science and a theologian, a philosopher and an antiquarian. In 1676 he published A brief Discourse concerning the different Wits of Men. One of his best productions was a translation of Epicurus's Morals, 1670. The rendering is accurate and the English idiomatic. He was among the first who accounted for the differences in men's minds by the size and form of the brain.

WILLIAM WALSH (1663-1708) chiefly a critic, scholar, and patron of men of letters but he himself published some fugitive pieces. He was member of Parliament for

Worcestershire, and is mentioned by Pope in the well known lines —

'But why then publish? Granville the polite
And knowing Walsh would tell me I could write.

CHARLES MONTAGU, EARL OF HALIFAX (1661-1715) a great patron of letters during the reigns of William III. and Anne. He himself wrote some poems, but oftener his name appeared on the early pages of authors' works, "fed with soft dedication all day long." He assisted Prior in the City Mouse and the Country Mouse. He rose to great distinction as a politician in the reign of William III. when he filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was raised to the peerage in 1711 soon after the accession of George I.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE NEW DRAMA AND THE CORRECT POETS.

- § 1 Contrast between the drama of Elizabeth and that of the Restoration
- § 2 SIR GEORGE ETHEREGE § 3 WILLIAM WYCHERLEY his life and works The Country Wife and the Plain Dealer § 4 SIR JOHN VANBRUGH. The Relapse, the Provoked Wife, the Confederacy, and the Provoked Husband § 5 GEORGE FARQUHAR The Constant Couple, the Inconstant, the Recruiting Officer, and the Beaux' Stratagem § 6 WILLIAM CONGREVE his life § 7 His works The Old Bachelor The Double Dealer Love for Love The Mourning Bride § 8 JEREMY COLLIER'S attack of the stage Congreve's reply Congreve's Way of the World § 9 THOMAS OTWAY The Orphan and Venice Preserved § 10 NATHANIEL LEE THOMAS SOUTHERNE Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage, and Oroonoko JOHN CROWNE § 11 NICHOLAS ROWE Jane Shore and the Fair Penitent § 12 MRS APHRA BEHN, THOMAS SHADWELL, and GEORGE LILLO Lillo's George Barnwell, the Fatal Curiosity, and Arden of Feversham § 13 Character of English poetry of this era Noble poets EARL of ROSCOMMON EARL of ROCHESTER SIR CHARLES SEDLEY DUKE of BUCKINGHAMSHIRE EARL of DORSET
- § 14. JOHN PHILIPS and JOHN POMFRET

§ 1 In a previous chapter I have endeavoured to sketch the immense revolution in dramatic literature, which is exemplified in the contrast between the age of Elizabeth and that of the Restoration. The theatre of the latter period, representing, as the theatre always must, the prevailing tone of sentiment and of society, is marked by the profound corruption which distinguishes the reign of Charles II., and which was the natural reaction after the strained morality of the Puritan dominion. The new drama differed from the old not only in its moral tone, but quite as widely in its literary form. The aim of the great writers who are identified with the dawn of our national stage was to delineate nature and passion, and therefore, as nature is multiform, they admitted into their serious plays comic scenes and characters, as they admitted elevated feelings and language into their comedies. But at the Restoration the artificial distinction between tragedy and comedy was strongly marked, and generally maintained with the same severity as upon the stage of France, which had become the chief model of imitation. In the place of the Romantic Drama arose the exaggerated, heroic and stilted tragedy on the one hand, and on the other the Comedy of artificial life, which, drawing its materials not from nature but from society, took for its aim the delineation not of character but of manners, which is indeed the proper object of what is correctly termed comedy in the strictest sense. Wit, therefore, now supplanted Humour, and England produced, during the seventeenth and part of the eighteenth centuries, a constellation of splendid dramatists. Their works are, it is true, now become almost unknown to the general reader, which is to be attributed to their abominable profligacy; but no one can have any conception of the powers of the English language and the brilliancy of English wit, who has not made acquaintance with these pieces.

§ 2. This class of writers may be said to begin with SIR GEORGE ETHEREGE (1633-1639), who was a man of fashion, and employed as a diplomatist. He died of a fall at Ratisbon, where he was residing as plenipotentiary. His principal work was entitled the Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter, that character being the impersonation of the fashionable coxcomb of the day. Great vivacity of dialogue, combined with striking and unexpected turns of intrigue, form the general peculiarity of all the comedies of this time. Dryden and his once popular rival Shadwell must be regarded as the link connecting the elder drama with the new style, and Etherege is the first who embodied the merits and defects of the latter; though Etherege was destined to be far outstripped both in the wit and gaiety and in the immorality of his scenes.

§ 3. A greater writer than Etherege, but exhibiting similar characteristics, was WILLIAM WYCHERLEY (1640-1715), born in 1640, of a good Shropshire family. His father, probably disgusted with the gloomy puritanism of the reigning manners, sent the future dramatist to be educated in France, where he was brought up in the brilliant household of the Duke of Montausier. Here the young man abandoned his national faith and embraced Catholicism, probably regarding the latter as more especially the religion of a gentleman and man of fashion. Returning to England, adorned with all the graces of French courtliness, and remarkable for the beauty of his person, Wycherley, while nominally studying the Law, became a brilliant figure in the gay and profligate society of the day. In his literary career we do not find indications of any great precocity of genius: his first comedy, Love in a Wood, was not acted until he had reached the age of about 32; and the small number of his dramatic works, as well as the style of their composition, seems to prove that he was neither very original in conception, nor capable of producing anything otherwise than by patient labour and careful revision. Love in a Wood was followed, in 1673, the next year, by the Gentleman Dancing-Master, the plot of which was borrowed from Calderon. His two greatest and most successful comedies are the Country Wife, acted in 1675, and the Plain Dealer, in 1677.

Moving in the most brilliant society of his time, Wycherley was engaged in many intrigues, the most celebrated being that with the infamous Duchess of Cleveland, one of the innumerable mistresses of Charles II. His grace and gaiety attracted the notice of the king, and he was selected to superintend the education of the young Duke of Richmond, Charles's natural child, but a secret marriage which he contracted with the Countess of Drogheda, caused him to lose the favour of the court. His union with the lady, which commenced in an accidental and even romantic manner, was not such as to secure either his happiness or his interest, and after her death Wycherley fell into such distress as to have remained several years in confinement for debt. He was at last liberated partly by the assistance of James II., and on this occasion, probably to gratify the king, he again rejoined the Catholic church, from which he had been temporarily reconverted. The remainder of Wycherley's life is melancholy and ignoble. Having long survived the literary types which were in fashion in his youth, with a broken constitution and an embarrassed fortune, he continued to thirst with vain impotence after sensual pleasure and literary glory. With the assistance of Pope, then a mere boy, but who had blazed out upon the world with sudden splendour, Wycherley concocted a huge collection of stupid and obscene poems, which fell dead upon the public. The momentary friendship and bitter quarrel of the old man and the young critic form a curious and instructive picture. Wycherley died in 1715, at an advanced age, having, on his very death-bed, married a young girl of 16, with the sole purpose of injuring his family, and preventing them from receiving his inheritance.

It is by the Country Wife and the Plain Dealer that posterity will judge the dramatic genius of Wycherley. Both these plays indicate great deficiency of original invention, for the leading idea of the first is evidently borrowed from the Ecole des Femmes of Molière, and that of the second from the same author's Misanthrope. As Macaulay has excellently observed, nothing can more clearly indicate the unspeakable moral corruption of that epoch in our drama, and the degree in which that corruption was exemplified by Wycherley, than to observe the way in which he has modified, while he borrowed, the data of the Great French dramatist. The character of Agnès is so managed as never to forfeit our respect while the corresponding personage, Mrs Pinchwife, is in the English comedy a union of the most incredible immorality with complete ignorance of the world, while the leading incident of the piece, the stratagem by which Horner blinds the jealousy of the husband, is of a nature which it is absolutely impossible to qualify in decent language. Nevertheless the intrigue of the piece is animated and amusing, the sudden and unexpected turns seem absolutely to take away one's breath, and the dialogue, as is invariably the case in Wycherley's productions, is elaborated to a high degree of liveliness and repartee. In the Plain Dealer is still more painfully apparent that bluntness of feeling, or rather that total want of sensibility to moral impressions, which distinguishes the comic drama of the Restoration, and none of the writers in that drama more signally than Wycherley. The tone of sentiment in Molière, as in all creators of the highest order, is invariably pure in its general tendency. Alceste, in spite of his faults, is a truly respectable, nay, a noble character. Those very faults indeed are but a proof of the nobility of his disposition. "divino dolce e l'aceto forte," says the Italian adage, and a generous heart, irritated past endurance by the smooth hypocrisy of social life, and bleeding from a thousand stabs inflicted by a cruel coquette, claims our sympathy even in the outbursts of its outraged feeling. But Wycherley borrowed Alceste, and in his hands the virtuous and injured hero of Molière has become "a ferocious sensualist, who believes himself to be as great a rascal as he thinks everybody else." "And to make the whole complete," proceeds our admirable critic, "Wycherley does not seem to have been aware that he was not drawing the portrait of an eminently honest man. So depraved was his moral taste, that, while he firmly believed that he was producing a picture of virtue too exalted for the commerce of this world, he was really delineating the greatest rascal that is to be found, even in his own writings."

§ 4. The second prominent name in this constellation of brilliant comic writers, the stars of which bear a strong general resemblance to each other, is that of SIR JOHN VANBRUGH (1666-1726). He was the son of a rich sugar-baker in London, probably, as his name indicates, of Dutch descent, and was born, it is not quite certain whether in France or England, in 1666. He unquestionably passed some part of his youth in the former country, and he united in his own person the rarely combined talents of architect and dramatist. As an architect he is one of the glories of the English school of the seventeenth century, and to his picturesque imagination we owe many works which, though open to criticism on the score of irregularity and a somewhat meretricious luxuriance of style, will always be admired for their magnificent and princely richness of invention. Among the most remarkable of these are Castle Howard and Blenheim, the latter being the splendid palace constructed at the national expense for the Duke of Marlborough. While engaged in this work Vanbrugh was involved in violent altercations with that malignant old harpy the Duchess Sarah, and his account of the quarrel is almost as amusing as a scene in one of his own comedies. Vanbrugh was appointed King-at-Arms, and was employed, both in this function and as an architect, in many honourable posts. Thus he was deputed to carry the insignia of the Garter to the Elector of Hanover, and was afterwards knighted by that prince when he became King of England as George I, who also appointed him Comptroller of the Royal Works. He died in 1726, just before the close of that reign.

Vanbrugh's comedies, the production of which commenced in 1697, are the Relapse, the Provoked Wife, Æsop, the Confederacy, and the first sketch of the Provoked Husband, left unfinished, and afterwards completed by Colley Cibber. It still keeps possession of the stage, and is one of the best and most popular comedies in the language. Vanbrugh's principal merit is inexhaustible liveliness of character and incident. His dialogue is certainly less elaborate, less intellectual, and less highly finished than that of Wycherley. But he excels in giving his personages a ready ingenuity in extricating themselves from sudden difficulties, and one great secret of the comic art he possesses to a degree hardly surpassed by Molière himself, viz., the secret depending upon skilful repetition—an infallible talisman for exciting comic emotions. His fops, his booby squires, his pert chambermaids and valots, his intriguing ladies, his romps, and his blacklegs, are all drawn from the life, and delineated with great vivacity, but there is a good deal of exaggeration in his characters, an exaggeration which we easily pardon in consideration of the amusement they afford us and the consistency with which their personality is maintained—the more easily perhaps as these types no longer exist in modern society, and we look upon them with the same sort of interest as we do upon the quaint costumes and fantastic attitudes of a collection of old portraits. In the Relapse Lord Foppington is an admirable impersonation of the pompous and suffocating coxcomb of those days, Sir Tunbelly Clumsy, the dense, brutal, ignorant country squire, a sort of prototype of Fielding's Western, forms an excellent contrast with him, and in Hoyden Vanbrugh has given the first specimen of a class of characters which he drew with peculiar skill, that of a bouncing rebellious girl, full of animal spirits and awaiting only the opportunity to break out of all rule. A variety of the same character is Corinna in the Confederacy, with the difference that Hoyden has been brought up in the country, while Corinna, in spite of her inexperience, is already thoroughly corrupted, and, as she says herself “a devilish girl at bottom.” The most striking character in the Provoked Wife is Sir John Brute, whose drunken uproarious blackguardism was one of Garrick's best impersonations. The Confederacy is perhaps Vanbrugh's finest comedy in point of plot. The two old usurers and their wives, whose weakness is played upon by Diok Amlet and his confederate sharper Brass, Mrs. Amlet, the marchande de la toilette, the equivocal mother of her graceless scamp, Corinna, and the maid Flippanta—all the dramatis personæ are amusing in the highest degree. We feel indeed that we have got into exceedingly bad company, for all the men are rascals, and the women no better than they should be, but their life and conversation, "pleasant but wrong," are invariably animated and gay and perhaps the very profligacy of their characters, by forbidding any serious sympathy with their fate, only leaves us freer to follow the surprising incidents of their career. The unfinished scenes of the comedy left by Vanbrugh, and afterwards completed under the title of the Provoked Husband, promised to be elaborated by the author into an excellent work. The journey to London of the country squire, Sir Francis Wronghead, and his inimitable family, is worthy of Smollett himself. The description of the cavalcade, and the interview between the new "Parliament-Man" and the minister, are narrated with the richest humour. All the sentimental portions of the piece, the punishment and repentance of Lady Townley, and the contrast between her and her "sober" sister-in-law Lady Grace, were the additions of Colley Cibber, who lived at a time when the moral or sermonising element was thought essential in comedy. This part of the intrigue, however, had the honour of being the prototype of Sheridan's delightful scenes between Sir Peter and Lady Teazle in the School for Scandal. In brilliancy of dialogue Vanbrugh is inferior to Wycherley, but his high animal spirits, and his extraordinary power of contriving sudden incidents more than compensate for the deficiency. In Vanbrugh perhaps there is more of mind but less of intellect.

§ 5 GEORGE FARQUHAR (1678-1707) was born at Londonderry in Ireland in 1678, and in his personal as well as his literary character he exemplifies the merits and the defects of his nation. He received some education at college, but at the early age of eighteen embraced the profession of an actor. Having accidentally wounded one of his comrades in a fencing-match, he quitted the stage and served for some time in the army, in the Earl of Orrery's regiment. His military experience enabled him to give very lively and faithful representations of gay, rattling officers, and furnished him with materials for one of his pleasantest comedies. His dramatic productions, which were mostly written after his return to his original profession, are more numerous than those of his predecessors, and consist of seven plays: Love and a Bottle, the Constant Couple, the Inconstant, the Stage Coach, the Twin Rivals, the Recruiting Officer, and the Beaux' Stratagem. These were produced in rapid succession, for the literary career of poor Farquhar was compressed into a short space of time—between 1698, when the first of the above pieces was acted, and the author's early death about 1708. The end of this brief course, which terminated at the age of thirty, was clouded by ill health and poverty, for Farquhar was induced to marry a lady who gave out, contrary to truth, that she was possessed of some fortune.

The works of Farquhar are a faithful reflexion of his gay, loving, vivacious character, and it appears that down to his early death, not only did they go on increasing in joyous animation, but exhibit a constantly augmenting skill and ingenuity in construction, his last works being incomparably his best. Among them it will be unnecessary to dwell minutely on any but the Constant Couple (the intrigue of which is extremely animated), the Inconstant, and chiefly the Recruiting Officer and the Beaux' Stratagem. In Farquhar's pieces we are delighted with the overflow of high animal spirits, generally accompanied, and, in its nature, by a certain frankness and generosity. We readily pardon the peccadillos of his personages, as we attribute their excess to innate depravity than to the heat of blood and the early influence of youth. His heroes often engage in deceptions and tricks, but there is no trace of the deep and deliberate rascality which we see in Wycherley's intrigues, or of the thorough scoundrelism of Vanbrugh's sharpers. The Beaux' Stratagem is decidedly the best-constructed of our author's plays, and the expedient of the two embarrassed gentlemen, who come down into the country disguised as a master and his servant, though not perhaps very probable, is extremely well conducted, and furnishes a series of lively and amusing adventures. The contrast between Archer and Amwell and Dick Amlet and Brass in Vanbrugh's Confederacy, shows a higher moral tone in Farquhar, as compared with his predecessor, and the numerous characters with whom they are brought in contact—Boniface the landlord, Cherry, Squire Sullen, and the mimic Scrub, not to mention Gibbet the highwayman, and Father Fogard the Irish-French Jesuit—are drawn with never-failing vivacity. Passages, expressions, nay, sometimes whole scenes, may be found among the dramas of Farquhar, stamped with that rich humour and oddity which engrave them on the memory. Thus Boniface's laudation of his ale, "as the saying is," Squire Sullen's mimic conversation with Scrub, "What day of the week is it? Scrub Sunday, sir. Sul Sunday? Then bring me a dram!" And Scrub's suspicions, "I am sure they were talking of me, for they laughed consumedly"—such traits prove that Farquhar possessed a true comic genius. The scenes in the Recruiting Officer, where Sergeant Kite inveigles the two clowns to enlist, and those in which Captain Plume figures, are also of high merit. In those plays upon which I have not thought it necessary to insist, as the Constant Couple and the Inconstant, the reader will not fail to find scenes worked up to a great brilliancy of comic effect, as, for example, the admirable interview between Sir Harry Wildair and Lady Lurewell, when the envious coquette endeavours to make him jealous of his wife, and he drives her almost to madness by dilating on his conjugal happiness. Throughout Farquhar's plays the predominant quality is a gay geniality, which more than compensates for his less elaborate brilliancy in sparkling repartee. He seems always to write from his heart, and therefore, though we shall in vain seek in his dramas for a very high standard of morality, his writings are free from that inhuman tone of blackguard heartlessness which disgraces the comic literature of the time.

§ 6 The dramatic literature of this epoch naturally divides itself into the two heads of Comedy and Tragedy, and having now to speak of an author whose reputation in his own day was unrivalled in both departments, I shall place him here as a sort of link connecting them together. This was WILLIAM CONGREVE (1670-1729), who will always stand at the very head of the comic dramatists, while he certainly occupies no undistinguished place among the tragedians. He was born in Yorkshire of an ancient and honourable family, in 1670, and his father being employed in a considerable post in Ireland, the youth received his education in that country, first at a school in Kilkenny, and afterwards at the University of Dublin. Here he acquired a degree of scholarship, particularly in the department of Latin literature, which placed him far above the generality of contemporary writers of belles lettres, and he came to London, nominally to study the law in the Temple, but really to play a distinguished part in the fashionable and intellectual circles of the time. During his whole life he seems to have been the darling of society, and possessing great personal and conversational attractions, together with a cold and somewhat selfish character, was the perfect type of what Thackeray, adopting the expressive slang of our day, has qualified as the "fashionable literary swell." He thirsted after fame as a man of elegance and as a man of letters, but as the literary profession was at that time in a very degraded social position, he was tormented by the difficulty of harmonising the two incompatible aspirations, and it is related that when Voltaire paid him a visit he affected the character of a mere gentleman, upon which the French wit, with equal acuteness and sense, justly reproved his vanity by saying, "If you had been a mere gentleman I should not have come to see you." Congreve's career was singularly auspicious: the brilliancy of his early works received instant recompense in solid patronage. Successive and hostile ministers rivalled each other in rewarding him. he obtained numerous and lucrative sinecures, and by his prudence was able not only to frequent, as an honoured guest, the society of the greatest and most splendid of his time, but to accumulate a large fortune. A disorder of the eyes, under which he long suffered, ultimately terminated in blindness, but neither this infirmity nor the gout could diminish the grace and gaiety of his conversation, or render him less acceptable in company. He was regarded by the poets, from Dryden to Pope, with enthusiastic admiration. The former hailed his entrance upon the literary arena with fervent praise, and in some very beautiful and touching lines named Congreve his successor in that poetical throne he had so long and gloriously filled, imposing upon his friendship the task of defending his memory from slander, and Pope, when publishing his great work of the translation of Homer, passed over the powerful and the illustrious to dedicate his book to the patriarch of letters. Congreve, like most men of fashion at that time, was celebrated for many bonnes fortunes. His most durable connexion was with the fascinating and generous Mrs Bracegirdle, so famous for the excellency of her acting and the beauty of her person. In his old age, however, Congreve appears to have neglected her for the Duchess of Marlborough, daughter and inheritress of the great Duke, and at his death he bequeathed the bulk of his fortune, amounting to the large sum of 10,000*l*, not to the comparatively needy actress, nor to his own relatives, then comparatively poor, but to the Duchess, in whose immense revenue such a legacy was but as a drop in the ocean. This circumstance furnishes an additional proof that Congreve was more remarkable for ostentation than for generosity or warmth of heart. He died in 1729, and was honoured with a magnificent and almost national funeral. His body lay in state in the Jerusalem Chamber, and was followed to the tomb in Westminster Abbey by all that was most illustrious in England.

§ 7 The literary career of Congreve begins with a novel of insignificant merit, which he published under the pseudonym of Cleophil, but the real inauguration of his glory was the representation, in 1693, of his first comedy, the Old Bachelor. This work, the production of a young man of twenty-three, was received by the public and by the critics with a tempest of applause. In spite of the bad construction and improbability of the intrigue, and of the conventional and so to say mechanical conception of the characters, it was easy to foresee in it all the peculiar merits which belong to the greatest comic dramatists of the eighteenth century. The chief of these is the unrivalled ease and brilliancy of the dialogue. Congreve's scenes are one incessant flash and sparkle of the finest repartees, the dazzling rapier-thrusts of wit and satiric pleasantry succeed each other without cessation, and the wit, as is always the case when of the highest order, is allied to shrewd sense and acute observation of mankind. Indeed the main defect of Congreve's dialogue is a plethora of ingenious allusion, for he falls into the error of making his fools and coxcombs as brilliant as his professed wits—a fault common to most of the authors of his school. But the quality in which he stands alone is his skill in divesting this brilliant intellectural sword-play of every shade of formality and constraint. His conversations are an exact copy of refined and intellectual conversation, though of course containing far more brilliancy than any real conversation ever exhibited. This air of consummate ease and idiomatic vivacity gives to his style a peculiar flavour which no other author has attained; and perhaps no English writer furnishes so many examples of the capacity of our language as a vehicle for intellectual display. I have said that the characters in the Old Bachelor are conventional, they are nevertheless exceedingly amusing; as, for example, Captain Bluff, a reproduction of the bullying braggadocio so frequently placed upon the stage. This hero's mention of Hannibal is deliciously comic. "Hannibal was a very pretty fellow in those days, it must be granted. But, alas! sir, were he alive now he would be nothing—nothing in the earth!" This is of the strain of Parolles, of Bessus, and of Bobadil. We can hardly wonder at, though we may not confirm, the enthusiasm of Congreve's contemporaries, when, with Dryden at their head, they hailed this brilliant débutant as the successor and the more than rival of Fletcher and Shakspeare.

Congreve's second theatrical venture was the Double Dealer, acted in 1694. The success of this comedy was much less than that of its predecessor, and the comparative failure is to be attributed to the admixture, in the plot, of characters and incidents too gloomy and tragic to harmonise with the follies and vanities that form the woof of comedy. The wickedness of Lady Touchwood is of a tint too funereal to harmonise with the brilliant and shifting colours of comedy, and the villainous plots of Maskwell are so intricate and complex that the puzzled reader is unable to follow them. As in Shakspeare's Comedy of Errors, the confusion between the two pairs of twins is so complete that the reader, as much embarrassed as the personages in the piece, loses the thread of the story, and therefore the interest which is the source of pleasure, so in Congreve's play the abstruseness of the intrigue defeats its own purpose. Many of the minor scenes and characters, however, are full of comic verve.

Congreve's masterpiece is Love for Love, which was acted in 1695. This is one of the most perfect comedies in the whole range of literature. The intrigue is effective, and the characters exhibit infinite variety, and relieve each other with unrelaxing spirit. The pretended madness of Valentine, the unexpected turns in his passion for Angelica, Sir Simpson Legend, the dotting old astrologer Foresight, Mrs Frail, Miss Prue (a character something like Vanbrugh's Corinna, or Hoyerden), and above all the inimitable Ben—the first attempt to portray on the stage the rough, unseparated sailor—the whole dramatis personæ, down to the most insignificant, are a crowd of picturesque and well-contrasted oddities. The scene in which Sir Sampson endeavours to persuade his son to renounce his inheritance, that between Valentine and Trapland the old usurer (almost as good as Don Juan's reception of M. Dimanche), the arrival of Ben from sea, and his conversation with Miss Prue these, and many more, are the highest exaltation of comedy. Sir Sampson is one of those big blustering characters that make their way by noise and confidence, he has something in common with Ben Jonson's Mammon, and was the model whence Sheridan afterwards copied his Sir Anthony Absolute.

Two years after this triumph Congreve burst forth upon the world in a completely new department of the drama—that of tragedy. He produced the Mourning Bride, which was received with no less ardent encomiums than the comedies. This piece is written in that pompous, solemn, and imposing strain which the adoption of French or classical models had rendered universal, and which Dryden had adopted as far as his bold and muscular genius, so rebellious to authority, permitted. The distress in this tragedy is extremely deep, but Congreve does not succeed in touching the heart. The chief merits of the piece consist in dignified passages of declamation, or what the French call tirades, and there are several descriptive passages of considerable power and melody, though their merit is rather that of narrative than dramatic poetry. Of this kind is the perpetually quoted description of a temple, which the extravagant eulogy of Johnson, by absurdly comparing it to poetical passages in Shakspeare, has deprived of its due meed of applause. If "saint praise" "damns," exaggerated laudation crimes still more fatally

§ 8 About this time took place an event of equal importance to Congreve and to the literary character of that age. This was the attack directed by JEREMY COLTET (1650-1726), an ardent nonjuring clergyman, against the profaneness and immorality of the English stage. His pamphlet was written with extraordinary fire, wit, and energy, and the evil which he combated was so general, so inveterate, and so glaring, that he immediately ranged upon his side all moral and thinking men in the nation. He anatomized with a vigorous and unsparing scalpel the foul ulcer of theatrical immorality, and cauterized it with such merciless satire that Dryden, powerful as he was in controversy, remained silent out of shame. The gauntlet thrown down by Collier, and which conscious guilt prevented Dryden from lifting, was taken up by Congreve, but the defence he made was poor, and the victory remained, both as regards morality and wit, on the side of Collier. The controversy had the effect of inaugurating a better tone in the drama and in lighter literature in general, and from that period dates the gradual but rapid improvement which has ended in rendering the literature of England the purest and healthiest in Europe.

Congreve's last dramatic work was the Way of the World, performed in 1700. Its success was not great, although its dialogue exhibits the rare charm which never deserted him, and though it contains in Millamant one of the most delicious portraits of a gay triumphant beauty, coquette, and fine lady ever placed upon the stage. It is like the porcelain figures in old Dresden china, crisp, sparkling, highly yet delicately coloured, filling the mind with images of grace and fancy. In his old age the poet produced a volume of fugitive and miscellaneous trifles, which do not much rise above the level of a class of composition extremely fashionable at that period.

§ 9 Among the exclusively tragic dramatists of the age of Dryden the first place belongs to THOMAS OTWAY (1651-1685), who died, after a life of wretchedness and irregularity, at the early age of thirty-four. He received a regular education at Winchester School and Oxford, and very early embraced the profession of the actor, for which he had no natural aptitude, but which familiarized him with the technical requirements of theatrical writing. He produced in the earlier part of his career three tragedies, Alcibiades, Don Carlos, and Titus and Berenice, which may be regarded as his first trial-pieces, and about 1677 he served some time in a dragoon regiment in Flanders, to which he had been appointed by the protection of a patron. Dismissed from his post in consequence of irregularities of conduct, he returned to the stage, and, in the years extending from 1680 to his death, he wrote four more tragedies, Caius Marius, the Orphan, the Soldier's Fortune, and Venice Preserved. All these works, with the exception of the Orphan and Venice Preserved, are now nearly forgotten, but the glory of Otway is so firmly established upon these latter, that it will probably endure as long as the language itself. The life of this unfortunate poet was an uninterrupted series of poverty and distress, and his death has frequently been cited as a striking instance of the miseries of a literary career. It is related that, when almost starving, the poet received a guinea from a charitable friend, on which he rushed off to a baker's shop, bought a roll, and was choked while ravenously swallowing the first mouthful. It is not quite certain whether this painful anecdote is strictly true, but it is incontestable that Otway's end, like his life, was miserable. How far his misfortunes were unavoidable, and how far attributable to the poet's own improvidence, it is now impossible to determine. Otway, like Chatterton, like Gilbert, like Tasso, and like Cervantes, is generally adduced as an example of the miserable end of genius, and of the world's ingratitude to its greatest benefactors.

As a tragic dramatist Otway's most striking merit is his pathos, and he possesses in a high degree the power of uniting pathetic emotion with the expression of the darker and more ferocious passions The distress in his pieces is carried to that intense and almost hysterical pitch which we see so frequently in Ford and Beaumont and Fletcher, and so rarely in Shakspeare The sufferings of Monimia in the Orphan, and the moral agonies inflicted upon Belvidera in Venice Preserved, are carried to the highest pitch, but we see tokens of the essentially second-rate quality of Otway's genius the moment he attempts to delineate madness Belvidera's ravings are the expression of a disordered fancy, and not, like those of Lear or of Ophelia, the lurid flashes of reason and consciousness lighting up for an instant the tossings of a mind agitated to its profoundest depths In Venice Preserved Otway has not attempted to preserve historical accuracy, but he has succeeded in producing a very exciting and animated plot, in which the weak and uxorious Jaffier is well contrasted with the darker traits of his friend and fellow-conspirator Pierre, and the inhuman harshness and cruelty of the Senator Priuli with the ruffinly thirst for blood and plunder in Renault. The frequent declamatory scenes, reminding the reader of Dryden, as for instance the quarrels and reconciliation of Pierre and Jaffier, the execution of the two friends, and the despair of Belvidera, are worked up to a high degree of excellence, and Otway, with the true instinct of dramatic fitness, has introduced, as elements of the deep distress into which he has plunged his principal characters, many of those familiar and domestic details from which the high classical dramatist would have shrunk as too ignoble Otway in many scenes of this play has introduced what may be almost called comic matter, as in the amorous dotage of the impotent old senator and the courtesan Aquilina, but these, though powerfully and naturally delineated, are of too disgusting and odious a nature to be fit subjects for representation Otway's style is vigorous and racy, the reader will incessantly be reminded of Dryden, though the author of Venice Preserved is far superior to his great master in the quality of pathos, and in reading his best passages we are perpetually struck by a sort of flavour of Ford, Heywood, Beaumont, and other great masters of the Elizabethan era

§ 10 No account of the drama of this period would be complete without some mention of NATHANIEL LEE (d. 1692), a tragic poet who not only had the honour of assisting Dryden in the composition of several of his pieces, but who, in spite of adverse circumstances, and in particular of several attacks of insanity, one of which necessitated his confinement during four years in Bedlam, possessed and deserved a high reputation for genius He was educated at Westminster School and Cambridge, and was by profession an actor he died in extreme poverty in 1692 His original dramatic works consist of eleven tragedies, the most celebrated of which is The Rival Queens, or Alexander the Great, in which the heroic extravagance of the Macedonian conqueror is relieved by amorous complications arising from the attachment of the two strongly-opposed characters of Roxana and Statira. Among his other works may be enumerated Theodosius, Mithridates, and the pathetic drama of Lucius Junius Brutus, the interest of which turns on the condemnation of the son by the father. In all these plays we find a sort of wild and exaggerated tone of imagery, sometimes reminding us of Marlow, but Leo is far superior in tenderness to the author of Faustus, nay in this respect he surpasses Dryden. In the beautiful but feverish bursts of declamatory eloquence which are frequent in Lee's plays, it is possible to trace something of that violence and exaggeration which are perhaps derived from the tremendous malady of which he was so long a victim.

THOMAS SOUTHERNE (1659-1746) was born at Dublin, but passed the greater part of his life in England. He studied the Law in the Temple, but quitted that profession for the army. It is known that he served as a captain in one of the corps employed in the suppression of the unfortunate Duke of Monmouth's rebellion, and in all probability was present at the battle of Sedgemoor. The close of his life was tranquil and surrounded with competence. Southerne was the author of ten plays, the most conspicuous of which are the tragedies of Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage, and the pathetic drama of Oroonoko. The latter is founded upon the true adventures of an African prince, the subject is said to have been given to Southerne by Aphra Behn, of whom we shall have to say a few words presently, and who, being the daughter of a governor of Surinam, where the events took place, was personally acquainted both with the incidents and the individuals which form the groundwork of the story. The sufferings of the generous and unhappy African, torn by the slave-trade from his country and his home, and his love for Imoinda, furnish good materials to the pathetic genius of Southerne, who was the first English author to hold up to execration the cruelties of that infernal traffic that so long remained a stain upon our country. The distress in Isabella is also carried to a high degree of intensity, and tenderness and pathos may be asserted to be the primary characteristics of Southerne's dramatic genius.

Another minor, but not unimportant, name among the dramatists of this period is that of JOHN CROWNE (1661-1698). Among the seventeen pieces which he produced, I may mention the tragedy of Thyestes and the comedy entitled Sir Courtly Nice. Both of these works possess considerable merit, though the revolting nature of the legend which forms the subject of the first is of a nature that ought to exclude it from the dramatist's attempt. We may remember that these dreadful Greek traditions had previously been preferred by Chapman. Crowne is remarkable for the beauty of detached passages of sentiment and description, and in particular bears some resemblance to his predecessor in the dignity and elegance with which he inculcates those moral precepts which Euripides was so fond of introducing, and which in the Greek Drama are called γνώμαι

§ 11. In success in life and social position NICHOLAS ROWE (1673-1718) was a happy contrast to the wretched career of many dramatists by no means his inferiors in talent. He was born in 1673, and studied in the Temple, employing his leisure hours in writing for the stage. He was cordially received in the brilliant and literary society of his day, and was a member of that intellectual society which surrounded Pope, Swift, Arbuthnot, and Prior, and which was bound together by such strong ties of intimacy and friendship. It is said, however, that Rowe, though much admired for his social accomplishments, was regarded as of a somewhat cold and selfish nature, in short, there seem to be many elements of character in common between him and Congreve. He was not only in possession of an independent fortune, but was splendidly rewarded for his literary exertions by the gift of many lucrative places in the patronage of Government. Thus he was Poet-Laureate and Surveyor of the Customs, Clerk of the Council in the service of the Prince of Wales, and Clerk of the Presentations. He was an example of that mode which for some time was general in England, of rewarding with profitable or sinecure appointments merit of a literary kind. The profession of letters enjoyed a transient gleam of prosperity and consideration, the period preceding and that following this epoch being remarkable for the want of social consideration—nay, the degradation attaching to the author's profession. It was not till the vast extension of the reading public, by offering the writer the most honourable form of recompense and the purest motives for exertion, that he could be relieved from the humiliation of a servile dependence on individual patrons, on the one hand, and the fluctuations of temporary success and prevailing poverty, on the other. Rowe was the first who undertook an edition of Shakspeare upon true critical and philological principles, and, though his work is marked by the inevitable deficiency of an age when the art of the commentator, as applied to an author of the sixteenth century, was still in its infancy, yet his edition gives some earnest of better things, and has, at all events, the merit of exhibiting a profound and loyal admiration of the great poet's genius. Rowe died in 1718. His dramatic productions amount to eight, the principal being Jane Shore, the Fair Penitent, and Lady Jane Grey, all, of course, tragedies. Tenderness is Rowe's chief dramatic merit, in the diction of his works we incessantly trace the influence of his study of the manner of the great Elizabethan playwrights. This imitation is often only superficial, and it some cases, as, for example, in Jane Shore, extends little further than an aping of the quaintness of the elder authors, but in many points Rowe did all that a nature, I suspect not very impressionable, could do to catch some echo of those deep tones of pathos and passion that thrill through the writings of the great elder dramatists. In the Fair Penitent we have an almost intolerable load of sorrow accumulated on the head of the heroine. It is curious that the character of the seducer in this play, "the gallant, gay Lothario," should have become the proverbial type of the faithless lover—just as Don Juan has been in our own time—and should have furnished Richardson with the outline which that great painter of character afterwards filled up so successfully in his masterly portrait of Lovelace.

§ 12 MRS APHRA BEHN (d 1689), celebrated in her day under the poetical appellation of Astræa, enjoyed some reputation for the gaiety, and, I may add, for the immorality, of her comedies. She was one of those equivocal characters, half literary half political adventurers, who naturally appear in times of public agitation. The daughter of a governor of Surinam, she had passed her youth in that colony, and, coming to Europe, was much mixed up in the obscurer intrigues of the Restoration. She resided some time in Holland, and seems to have rendered services to Charles II as a kind of political spy. She died in 1689, and her novels, as well as comedies, though now forgotten, may be consulted as curious evidences of the state of literary and social feeling that prevailed at that agitated epoch.

The only other names that need be cited among the dramatists of this period are those of Shadwell and Lillo. THOMAS SHADWELL (1640-1692) wrote seventeen plays, but is now chiefly known by Dryden's satire as the hero of Mac-Flecknoe, and the Og of Absalom and Achitophel. On the Revolution, he succeeded Dryden as Poet-Laureate. GEORGE LILLO (1693-1739) is in many respects a remarkable and singular literary figure. He was a jeweller in London, and appears to have been a prudent and industrious tradesman, and to have accumulated a fair competence. His dramatic works, which were probably composed as an amusement, consist of a peculiar species of what may be called tragedies of domestic life, in some respects resembling those dramas which are at present so popular in France. The principal of them are George Barnwell, the Fatal Curiosity, and Arden of Feversham. Lillo composed sometimes in verse and sometimes in prose, he based his pieces upon remarkable examples of crime, generally in the middle ranks of society, and worked up the interest to a high pitch of intensity. In George Barnwell is traced the career of a London shopman—a real person—who is lured by the artifices of an abandoned woman and the force of his own passion first into embezzlement, and then into the murder of an uncle. The hero of the play, like his prototype in actual life, expiates his offences on the scaffold. The subject of the Fatal Curiosity, Lillo's most powerful work, is far more dramatic in its interest. A couple, reduced by circumstances, and by the absence of their son, to the lowest depths of distress, receive into their house a stranger, who is evidently in possession of a large sum while he is asleep, they determine to assassinate him for the purpose of plunder, and afterwards discover in their victim their long-lost son. It will be remembered that the tragic story of Arden of Feversham, a tissue of conjugal infidelity and murder, was an event that really took place in the reign of Elizabeth, and had furnished materials for a very popular drama, attributed, but on insufficient evidence, to Shakspeare among other playwrights of the time. It was again revived by Lillo, and treated in his characteristic manner—a manner singularly intense in spirit, though prosaic in form. Indeed, the very absence of imagination in this writer may have contributed to the effect he produced, by augmenting the air of reality in his conceptions. He has something of the gloom and sombre directness which we see in Webster or Tourneur, but he is entirely devoid of the wild fantastic fancy which distinguishes that great writer. He is real, but with the reality, not of Walter Scott, but of Defoe.

§ 13 From the time of Dryden to about the end of the first quarter of the eighteenth century English poetry exhibits a character equally removed from the splendid brilliancy of the epoch of Elizabeth and the picturesque intensity of the new Romantic school. Correctness and good sense were the qualities chiefly aimed at, and if the writers avoid the abuse of ingenious allusion which disfigures the productions of Cowley, Donne, and Quin, they are equally devoid of the passionate and intense spirit which afterwards animated our poetry. It is remarkable how many of the writers of this time were men of rank and fashion: their literary efforts were regarded as the elegant accomplishment of amateurs, and, though their more ambitious productions are generally didactic and critical, and their lighter works graceful and harmonious songs, they must be regarded less as the deliberate results of literary labour than as the pastime of fashionable dilettanti. EARL OF ROSCOMMON (1684-1685), the nephew of the famous Strafford, produced a poetical Essay on Translated Verse and a version of the Art of Poetry from Horace, which were received by the public and the men of letters with an extravagance of praise attributable to the respect then entertained for any intellectual accomplishment in a nobleman. EARL OF ROCHESTER (1647-1680), so celebrated for his insane debaucheries and the witty eccentricities which made him one of the most prominent figures in the profligate court of Charles II, produced a number of poems, chiefly songs and fugitive lyrics, which proved how great were the natural talents he had wasted in the most insane extravagance his deathbed conversion and repentance produced by the arguments of Bishop Burnet, who has left an interesting and edifying account of his penitent's last moments, show that, amid all his vices, Rochester's mind retained the capacity for better things. Many of his productions are unfortunately stained with such profanity and indecency, that they deserve the oblivion into which they are now fallen.

SIR CHARLES SEDLEY (1639-1701) was another glittering star in the court firmament, he was a most accomplished gentleman, and his life was far more regular, as well as more tranquil, than that of Rochester. his comedy, the Mulberry Garden, is not devoid of gaiety and wit, and contains several songs of merit. Many other slight lyrics prove that Sedley possessed the grace, airiness, and ingenuity, which are the principal requisites of this species of writing.

To the same category may be ascribed the DUKE of BUCKINGHAM (Sheffield) (1649-1721) and EARL of DORSET (1637-1706), perfect specimens of the aristocratic literary dilettante of those days. The former is best known by his Essay on Poetry, written in the heroic couplet; the latter by his charming, playful song—To all you ladies now on land, said to have been written at sea on the eve of an engagement with the Dutch fleet under Opdam. It is addressed by the courtly volunteer to the ladies of Whitehall, and breathes the gay and gallant spirit that animates the chanson militaire, in which the French so much excel.

§ 14 The only poets of any comparative importance, not belonging to the higher classes of society, were Philips and Pomfret, both belonging to the end of the seventeenth century. JOHN PHILIPS (1676-1708) is the author of a half descriptive, half-didactic poem on the manufacture of Cider, written upon the plan of the Georgics of Virgil, but he is now known to the general reader by his Splendid Shilling, a pleasant jeu d'esprit, in which the learned and pompous style of Milton is agreeably parodied, by being applied to the most trivial subject. Such parodies are common, and by no means difficult of execution, but among them there will always be some which, either from their originality as first attempts in a particular style, or from the peculiar felicity of the imitation, will excite and retain a higher popularity than generally rewards trifles of this nature. Such has been the peculiar good fortune of Philips. JOHN POMFRET (1667-1703) was a clergyman, and the only work by which he is now remembered is his poem of The Choice, giving a sketch of such a life of rural and literary retirement as has been the hœc erat in votis of so many. The images and ideas are of that nature that will always come home to the heart and fancy of the reader, and it is to this naturalness and accordance with universal sympathy, rather than to anything very original either in its conception or its execution, that the poem owes the hold it has so long retained upon the attention.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE SECOND REVOLUTION.

- § 1 JOHN LOCKE his life § 2 His works Letters on Toleration, Treatise on Civil Government § 3 Essay on the Human Understanding § 4 Essay on Education On the Reasonableness of Christianity On the Conduct of the Understanding § 5 ISAAC BARROW his life and attainments His Sermons § 6 Characteristics of the Anglican divines JOHN PEARSON § 7 ARCHBISHOP TILLOTSON § 8 ROBERT SOUTH. EDWARD STURLINGFLIT THOMAS SPRAT WILLIAM SHILLLOCK § 9 Progress of the physical sciences towards the end of the seventeenth century Origin of the Royal Society DR. JOHN WILKINS § 10 Scientific writers § 11 SIR ISAC NEWTON § 12 JOHN RAY ROBERT BOYLE THOMAS BURNET § 13 BISHOP BURNET His History of the Reformation and other works

§ 1 THE period of the great and beneficent revolution of 1688 was characterised by the establishment of constitutional freedom in the state, and no less by a powerful outburst of practical progress in science and philosophy. It was this period that produced Newton in physical and Locke in intellectual science. The latter, in his character and career, offers the most perfect type of the good man, the patriotic citizen, and the philosophical investigator. JOHN LOCKE, (1632-1704) was born in 1632, educated at Westminster School and Christ-Church, Oxford, where he particularly devoted himself to the study of the physical sciences, and especially of medicine. He undoubtedly intended to practise the latter profession, but was prevented from doing so by the weakness of his constitution, and a tendency to asthma which in after life obliged him to retire from those public employments for which his integrity and talents so well fitted him. The direction of his studies at Oxford must have tended to inspire him with distaste and contempt for that adherence to the scholastic method which still prevailed in the University, and to excite in him a strong hostility to that stationary or rather retrograde spirit which sheltered itself under the venerable and much-abused name of Aristotle. There is no question that Locke's investigations during the thirteen years of his residence at Oxford had been much turned to metaphysical subjects, and that he had seen the necessity of applying to this branch of knowledge that experimental or inductive method of which his great master Bacon was the apostle. In 1664 he accompanied Sir Walter Vane, as his secretary, on a diplomatic mission to Brandenburg, and returning to Oxford in the following year refused a flattering offer made him by the Duke of Ormond of considerable preferment in the Irish Church. His reasons for declining to take orders were equally honourable to Locke's good sense and to his high conscientious feeling. He declined the favour on the ground of his not experiencing that internal vocation without which no man should enter the priestly profession. In 1666 Locke became acquainted with Lord Ashley, afterwards Earl of Shaftesbury, and subsequently so celebrated for his political talents and for his unprincipled and fictitious conduct when Chancellor and the head of the Parliamentary opposition. He is said to have rendered himself useful to this statesman by his medical skill, and unquestionably secured his intimacy and respect by the charms of his conversation and the virtues of his character. He attached himself intimately both to the domestic circle and to the political fortunes of this statesman, in whose house he resided several years, having undertaken the education first of the Chancellor's son and afterwards of his grandson, the latter of whom has left no unworthy name as an elegant, philosophical, and moral essayist. Locke's acquaintance with Shaftesbury brought him into daily and intimate contact with many of the most distinguished politicians and men of letters of the day, among whom I may mention the all-accomplished Halifax, Sheffield, Duke of Buckinghamshire, and many others. Locke fully shared in the frequent and violent vicissitudes of Shaftesbury's agitated career. He was nominated, on his patron becoming Chancellor in 1672, Secretary of the Presentations, with which he combined another appointment; but these he lost in the following year on the first fall of his patron. In 1675 he visited France for his health, and his journals and letters are not only valuable for the accurate but very unfavourable account they give of the then state of French society, but are exceedingly amusing, animated, and gay. In 1679 Locke returned to England and rejoined Shaftesbury on his second accession to power during that stormy period when he was at the head of the furious agitation in favour of the Exclusion-Bill depriving the Duke of York, afterwards James II, and then Her-Apparent, of the right of succeeding to the throne, on the ground of his notorious sympathies with the Roman Catholic religion. The Chancellor again fell from power, was arraigned for High Treason, and though the bill of indictment was ignored by a patriotic jury, fled to Holland, where he died in 1683.

During the evil days of tyranny and persecution which followed this event, Locke found a safe and tranquil retreat in Holland, a country which had so long been the asylum of all who were brought, by the profession of free opinions on politics or religion, under the frown of power, and he enjoyed the friendship and society of Le Clerc and many other illustrious exiles for conscience' sake. During this time Locke, whose bold expression of constitutional opinions and whose ardent attachment to free investigation must have made him peculiarly obnoxious to the bigotry of Oxford, was deprived of his Studentship at Christ-Church, and denounced as a factious and rebellious agitator, and as a dangerous heresiarch in philosophy. The Revolution of 1688 was the triumph of those free principles of which Locke had been the preacher and the martyr, and he returned to England in the same fleet which conveyed Queen Mary from Holland to the country whose crown she had been called to share. From this period his career was eminently useful, active, and even brilliant. He was appointed a member of the Council of Trade, and in that capacity took a prominent part in carrying out Montague's difficult and most critical operation of calling in and reissuing the silver coinage, an operation of the most vital importance at the moment, and of which Macaulay has given in his history a narrative of the most dramatic interest. After a short service Locke retired from public employment and resided during the remainder of his life with his friend Sir F. Masham at Oates in Essex. Lady Masham, an accomplished and intellectual woman, was the daughter of the philosopher Cudworth, tenderly loved and respected by her illustrious guest, who enjoyed under her roof the ease and tranquillity he had so nobly earned. Locke died in 1704, and his personal character seems to have been one of those which approach perfection as nearly as can be expected from our fallible and imperfect nature. On his return to England in 1688 Locke became acquainted with the illustrious Newton, who like himself was employed in the public service, but somewhere about 1692 certain untoward events, among which one of the principal was the unfortunate accidental burning of his papers, seem to have shaken, if not overthrown for a season the balance of the great philosopher's mind, and his querulous and suspicious irritation appears to have vented itself in a most unfounded misunderstanding with Locke, whom he accuses of "embroiling him with women and other things." It is pleasing to think that Locke's conduct in the affair was delicate and forbearing, and that his manly expostulations and wise advice re-established a good understanding that was never again interrupted.

§ 2 The writings of this excellent thinker are numerous, varied in subject, all eminently useful, and breathing a constant love of humanity. In 1689 were published the Letters on Toleration, originally composed in Latin, but immediately translated into French and English. The author goes over somewhat the same ground as had been occupied by Jeremy Taylor in his Liberty of Prophesying, and by Milton in the immortal Areopagitica, but Locke deduces his arguments less from Scriptural and patristic authority than was done by the former, and depends more upon close reasoning and considerations of practical utility than Milton. Of course in Locke's work there is no trace of that gorgeous and imposing eloquence which glows and blazes through the Speech on Unlicensed Printing, but perhaps Locko's calm and logical proofs have not less powerfully contributed to fix the universal conviction as to the justice of his cause. The Treatise on Civil Government was undertaken to overthrow those slavish theories of Divine Right which were then so predominant among the extreme monarchical parties, and nowhere carried to such extravagance as in the University of Oxford. Locke's more special object was the refutation of Sir Robert Filmer's once famous book entitled Patriarcha, in which these principles were maintained in all their crudeness, and supported with some learning and much ill-employed ingenuity. Filmer maintains that the monarchical form of government claims from the subject an unlimited obedience, as being the representative of the patriarchal authority in the primitive ages of mankind, while the patriarchal authority is in its turn the image of the power naturally possessed over his offspring by the parent, that again being the same in nature as the power of the Creator over his creature. The last-named of these being essentially infinite, it follows, according to Filmer, that all the others are so likewise. Locko combats and overthrows this monstrous theory, and seeks for the origin of government, and consequently the ground of authority on the one hand and obedience on the other, in the common interest of society, showing that any form of polity which secures that interest may lawfully be acquiesced in, while none that does not secure it can claim any privilege of exemption from resistance. He investigates the origin of society, and finds it based—as it can only be solidly based—upon the great and fertile principle of property and individual interest.

§ 3 The greatest, most important, and most universally known of Locke's works is the Essay on the Human Understanding. In this book, which contains the reflections and researches of his whole life, and which was in the course of composition during eighteen years, Locke shows all his powers of close deduction and accurate observation. His object was to give a rational and clear account of the nature of the human mind, of the real character of our ideas, and of the mode in which they are presented to the consciousness. He attributes them all, whatever be their nature, to two, and only two, sources, the first of these he calls Sensation, the second Reflection. He thus opposes the notion that there are any innate ideas, that is, ideas which have existed in the mind independently of impressions made upon the senses, or of the comparison, recollection, or combination of those impressions made by the judgment, the memory, or the imagination. Locke is eminently an inductive reasoner, and was the first to apply the method of experiment and observation to the obscure phenomena of the mental operations, and he is thus to be regarded as the most illustrious disciple of Bacon, whose mode of reasoning he adopted in a field of research till then considered as totally unamenable to the à posteriori logic. The most striking feature in this, as in all Locke's philosophical works, is the extreme clearness, plainness, and simplicity of his language, which is always such as to be intelligible to a plain understanding. He is the sworn foe of all technical and scientific terms, and his reasonings and illustrations are of the most familiar kind, indeed he never scruples to sacrifice elegance to the great object of making himself understood. The following brief analysis of the work may be found not unacceptable to the reader —

In Book I, consisting of four chapters, Locke inquires into the nature of the understanding, and demonstrates that there exist neither innate speculative nor innate practical principles. Book II, containing thirty-three chapters, is devoted to an examination into the nature of ideas, respectively treated as simple, as of solidity, of space, of duration, of number, of infinity, and the like. He then considers the ideas of pleasure and of pain, of substance, of relations, as of cause and effect, and finally treats the important question of the association of ideas. Book III, divided into eleven chapters, is a most original and masterly investigation of the nature and properties of Language, of its relation to the ideas of which it is the vehicle, and of its abuses and imperfections. This is, in the present day, when some parts of Locke's general theory are regarded as no longer tenable, the most valuable portion of the work. Book IV, including twenty-one chapters, discusses knowledge in general, its degrees, its extent, and its reality. The philosopher then proceeds to consider the nature of truth, of our knowledge of existence, of our knowledge of the existence of a God, and of other beings. Then are investigated various important questions relating to judgment, probability, reason, faith, and the degrees of intellectual assent, and after some reflections on enthusiasm and on wrong assent, or error, Locke terminates with some valuable considerations on the Division of the Sciences.

It was unavoidable that the portion of the work devoted to the investigation of sensation should be more interesting and satisfactory than the portion treating of the obscure phenomena of reflection, but however we may dissent from particular details of Locke's theory we cannot fail to render full justice to the inimitable clearness of his exposition, and to the multitude of well-observed and well-arranged facts which form the ground-work of his arguments.

§ 4 The Essay on Education has, like the book just examined, a practical tendency, and may be said to have mainly contributed to bring about that beneficial revolution which has taken place in the training of the young. Locke powerfully discountenances that exclusive attention to mere philology which prevailed in the education of the seventeenth century, and in no country more than in England. He advocates a more generous, liberal and practical system, both in the choice of the subject-matter to be taught and in the mode of conveying instruction. He is therefore in favour of making the pupil's own conscientiousness a substitute for that tyranny of force and authority which formerly disgraced our schools. Much of what is humane and philosophical in Rousseau's celebrated Emile is plainly borrowed from Locke, who is not responsible for the absurdities and extravagances engrafted upon his plans by the Genevese theorist. Indeed, both the educational and metaphysical works of Locke were unceremoniously ransacked by many French writers of the end of the seventeenth century, who were frequently not solicitous to point out the sources whence they drew their ideas.

Besides the above works may be mentioned a treatise On the Reasonableness of Christianity, in which the calm piety and benevolence of the sentiments form a triumphant refutation of those bigots who, like De Maistre, have accused Locke of irreligious and materialistic tendencies, and a small but admirable little book On the Conduct of the Understanding, which was not published until after the author's death. It contains a kind of manual of reflections upon all those natural defects or acquired evil habits of the mind, which unfit it for the task of acquiring and retaining knowledge. It shows an acuteness and scope of observation not inferior to that exhibited in his great anterior work, together with the same calm but ardent spirit of humanity and benevolence which animates all the writings, as it did the whole life of this great and excellent man.

§ 5 I have now to consider a series of excellent writers who will always retain the place of classics in English prose, and who are equally worthy of admiration as Protestant theologians and as models of logical and persuasive eloquence. At the head of them stands ISAAC BARROW (1630-1677), a man of almost universal acquirements, and whose sermons are still studied as the most powerful and majestic prose compositions that the seventeenth century has produced. He was born in 1630, educated at the Charter-house, whence he passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was one of the most illustrious alumni. He is said to have been, as a boy, remarkable for a violent and quarrelsome disposition, and to have been perpetually fighting with his schoolfellows. Of this temper nothing remained in after life save great energy and vigour of character, and a degree of personal courage of which he gave

Their works are distinguished by merits varying both in kind and in degree; but they are all characterized in common by a spirit which I may call Protestant, or rather Anglican—a mixture of Christian fervour and extensive learning, with a practical acquaintance with the requirements and dangers of real life—a spirit equally remote from the fanatical gloom and mysticism of the Calvinistic extreme, and the dogmatic pedantry of the Romish writers. The first I shall mention is JOHN PEARSON (1613-1686), originally Professor of Theology and Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and afterwards Bishop of Chester. His most celebrated work is his Exposition of the Creed, which is still regarded as one of the most complete and searching treatises investigating the great fundamental principles of our faith. In our examination of the English divines we shall see that they are pretty equally shared between our two great Universities. The theological and political tendencies which predominated at one or another period in these two learned bodies are faithfully reflected in the writings of their children, for in that agitated epoch political and theological tendencies were intimately connected together, most of the great and exciting questions being tinged with a strong leaven of either spirit, but our Universities have no reason to be ashamed either of the learning or the conduct of their alumni.

§ 7 Next after Barrow, JOHN TILLOTSON (1630-1694) perhaps enjoys the highest and most durable popularity among the pulpit orators of this time. Indeed the popularity of his sermons has extended to the present day, and they are frequently read by pious Churchmen even now. But Tillotson, though a sound and classical English prose-writer, was a man of a calibre far inferior to Barrow. He studied at Cambridge, where he at first rendered himself conspicuous for his decided Puritan sympathies. He however afterwards made no difficulty in conforming to the rules and discipline of the Anglican Church, and ultimately rose to the dignity of Archbishop of Canterbury. He was a person of easy, good-natured, and amiable character, and his change of party seems to have left no other effect upon him than that of increasing his candour and indulgence for all shades of sincere opinion. In his conduct as a pastor and as a prelate he exhibited much zeal in correcting the abuses which had crept into the Church, and gave a notable example of liberal charity and episcopal virtue. He was renowned as a preacher, and his sermons, though falling far short of Barrow's in grasp of mind and vigour of expression, are precisely of such a nature as is most likely to command popularity. They show an easy flow of style, sometimes, it is true, carrying too far the affectation of familiarity, in consequence of which the images and illustrations are occasionally trivial, but there is a good deal of artifice and even sophistry in the reasoning, cunningly concealed under an air of candour which never deserts Tillotson His sentences, too, are often singularly unmusical, and are evidently made as colloquial in tone as possible Tillotson often preached to the higher classes, and in addressing such congregations he strove to conquer their fashionable indifference by adopting, as far as possible, the tone and air of a man of the world

§ 8 ROBERT SOUTH (1633-1716) enjoyed in his day the reputation of being the "wittiest Churchman" of the time His character was far less deserving of admiration than that of Tillotson, as he exhibited extreme violence in attacking the opinions of those from whom he differed At Oxford, where he was educated, he wrote a copy of Latin verses congratulating Cromwell upon having made peace with the Dutch, but this was a task imposed upon him as a college exercise, and is no proof that he was really an admirer of Cromwell's policy, as has often been asserted On the contrary, he embraced at the university the extreme Tory or monarchical opinions which had become prevalent at Oxford, where he filled the post of Public Orator, and indeed became one of the most characteristic specimens of that bigoted and unreasonable class of Churchmen who were called high-flyers in the party jargon of the day, and who went all lengths in maintaining the outrageous doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance He often preached before Charles II, and was much admired by the courtly audiences of those days for the animation and even gaiety of his manner, and the pleasant stories and repartees which he sometimes introduced into his sermons Many witty and jocose anecdotes are related of him, but in these cases it is necessary to accept such stories with some reserve, as there exists in the world a vast floating capital of such pleasantries, which are successively fathered upon any man who possesses a reputation for humour The gross adulation with which he was not ashamed to address Charles II, and in which he lauded the virtues of Charles I, and his unmeasured denunciations of the principles and convictions of the popular party, have deservedly laid South open to the attacks of the opposite side in politics and religion, but there is no reason to question his sincerity It is of more importance to our purpose to remark that he was a perfect master of English prose, and that his style combines both ease, vigour, and rhythm beyond that of any of his contemporaries.

EDWARD STILLINGFLET (1635-1699), Bishop of Worcester, is another name which must not be passed over without notice He is principally remembered for his controversy with Locke, some of whose propositions he attacked, on the ground of their being, as he maintained, hostile to the doctrine of the immateriality, and consequently of the immortality, of the soul Locke triumphantly replied to these objections, and the philosopher was so generally considered as having been victorious in this contest of argument over the divine, that the mortification of defeat is said to have shortened Stillingfleet's life

THOMAS SPRAT (1636-1713), Bishop of Rochester, was a man renowned in his time for the brilliancy and variety of his talents. He was an ardent cultivator of physical science, which had just then made its first sudden bound forwards in that splendid career of observation and discovery which has ever since gone on progressing with such portentous rapidity. He was one of the members of the Royal Society, then recently founded, and to which the glory of English science owes so much. He was distinguished as a poet, though his writings in this department are now little read, and as a biographer of poets, as the author of an excellent and interesting Life of Cowley. Besides these he was a theologian and preacher of no mean ability, and a very active contributor to the polemical and political literature of his day. Sprat was a member of the University of Oxford, and that his high reputation for brilliancy of eloquence and ardour of imagination was not to be entirely attributed to the partiality of contemporary admiration, may be proved by the honourable terms in which his talents are spoken of by two such critics as Johnson and Macaulay.

I shall conclude the present category of authors with the name of WILLIAM SHERLOCK (1641-1707), Master of the Temple, whose expositions of Scriptural doctrine have always been regarded with approval, and who in his own time was conspicuous as a polemic writer against the Dissenters. His best-known work is a Practical Discourse concerning Death.

§ 9 Though the aim of these pages is to give an account of Literature in its strict and proper sense, the subject of Science comes in contact with that object at so many points, that I should but ill perform my task without offering some notice of the writers who, though they devoted their chief attention to physical researches, yet occupy a place among English authors. It is true that at the period of which we are treating, important scientific works were generally given to the world in Latin, that language being then the universal medium, the intellectual money, so to say, current among the learned in all parts of Europe, but many of the great men who carried to so unequalled a height the glory of the human intellect and the honour of their native country, composed a portion of their works in their vernacular tongue, or at least published English versions of their learned labours, and thus deserve some mention in their capacity of English writers. There are few episodes in the history of human knowledge more surprising than the sudden and dazzling progress made in the physical sciences towards the end of the seventeenth century. This progress is visible in Germany, in Holland, in France, and in England. In none of these nations, indeed, more so than in our own. It was just and natural that the vivifying effect produced by the writings and by the method of Bacon should be peculiarly powerful in that country which gave birth to the great reformer of philosophy, and there is no doubt that the development of free institutions and open discussion exercised a powerful influence in facilitating research, in promoting a spirit of inquiry, and in rendering possible the open expression of opinion.

A very prominent part in the cultivation and dissemination of experimental research, in all branches of physics and natural history, was played by the Royal Society, that illustrious body which, originating in the meetings of a few learned and ingenious men at each others' houses, was incorporated by Charles II, in 1662, into the Society to the labours of which human knowledge owes so much.

Among the founders of this corporation one of the most active was Dr JOHN WILKINS (1614-1672), Bishop of Chester, a most energetic and ingenious man, whose vivacious inventiveness sometimes bordered upon extravagance, but who rendered great services, both in his writings and his conversation, to the cause of science. He was essentially a projector, and at a period when the first wonderful results of the employment of the experimental method had made even the calmest minds in some degree lose their balance, and become unable to distinguish between what was practicable and what was visionary, we can hardly feel surprise that the ardour of his genius should have carried him beyond the bounds of good sense, so far as to seriously propose, among other Utopian schemes, a plan by which it would be possible to fly to the moon. Wilkins was a theological writer and a preacher of high reputation, but his name is now chiefly associated with his projects and inventions, and in particular with the prominent part he took, together with Boyle and others, in the organization of the Royal Society*. He married the sister of Oliver Cromwell, and his stepdaughter was married to Tillotson.

§ 10 The progress of physical science had been very rapid before this time. The labours of WILLIAM GILBERT (1540-1603), whose researches in magnetism laid the foundation for all future investigations in that science, and the immortal discovery of WILLIAM HARVEY (1578-1658), the first demonstrator of the circulation of the blood, belong to an earlier period, but the concentration of the labours of many separate investigators upon one special branch of research was a result mainly to be attributed to the institution of our great scientific corporation. As a proof of this I may mention the contemporary, or nearly contemporary labours of Newton in optics, astronomy, and celestial mechanics, and those of Flamsteed, Halley, and others, in the combined departments of careful observation and the application of new and convenient mathematical formulas to the practical solution of problems in astronomy and navigation, while Boyle, embracing a wide extent and vast variety of research, particularly devoted himself to the investigation of chemical and pneumatic science, and Ray, Derham, Willoughby, and Sydenham brought valuable contributions to physiology, natural history, and medicine. Most of these great men, independently of their purely scientific writings, which, as in the case of the immortal Principia of the most illustrious among them, were in Latin, contributed in a greater or less proportion to the vernacular literature of their country. Thus Newton wrote, in English, upon the Prophecies, and other subjects connected with Biblical knowledge, and Boyle enjoyed a high reputation for his moral and religious writings. It is remarkable and consoling to see with what unanimous consent these illustrious philosophers, all men of extraordinary acumen and caution, and all accustomed, from the nature of their pursuits, to take nothing for granted, to weigh and balance evidence with the severest exactness, agreed in the intensity of their religious convictions. Those habits of physical investigation, which are so often ignorantly accused of being unfavourable to the habit of belief, seem to have led the most powerful and inquiring minds only the more irresistibly to a firm conviction of the truths of revealed religion.

* The chief works of Wilkins are —1 Discovery of a New World or a discourse tending to prove that it is probable that there may be another habitable World in the Moon, with a discourse concerning the possibility of a passage thither Published in 1638. 2 An Essay towards a Real Character and a Philosophical Language, printed by order of the Royal Society in 1668.

§ 11 SIR ISAAC NEWTON (1642-1727) was born in 1642, of a respectable but not opulent family, at Woolsthorpe in Lincolnshire. From his earliest boyhood he showed the greatest taste and aptitude for mechanical invention, and entering the University of Cambridge, in 1660, he made such rapid progress in mathematical studies that in nine years Barrow resigned in his favour the Lucasian professorship. The greater part of Newton's life was passed within the quiet walls of Trinity, of which College he is the most glorious ornament, and it was here that he elaborated those admirable discoveries and demonstrations in Mechanics, Astronomy, and Optics which have placed his name in the very foremost rank of the benefactors of mankind. He sat in more than one parliament as member for his university, but he appears to have been of too reserved and retiring a character to take an active part in political discussion. He was appointed Master of the Mint in 1695, and presided over that establishment at the critical period of Montagu's bold recall and reissue of the specie. It is delightful to see with what simplicity and readiness this illustrious philosopher abandoned all those sublime researches in which he stands almost alone among mankind, and devoted all his energy and attention to the public duties that had been committed to his charge. He even writes with a kind of pettish querulousness to upbraid friends who had consulted him about "mathematical things," as he calls them, when he was entirely occupied with the public service. In 1708 he was made president of the Royal Society, and knighted two years afterwards by Queen Anne. He died in 1727. His character, the only defects of which appear to have been a somewhat cold and suspicious temper, was the type of those virtues which ought to distinguish the scholar, the philosopher, and the patriot. His modesty was as great as his genius, and he invariably ascribed the attainment of his discoveries rather to patient attention than to any unusual capacity of intellect. His English writings, which are chiefly discourses upon the prophecies and chronology of the Scriptures, are composed in a manly, plain, and unaffected style, and breathe an intense spirit of piety, though his opinions seem to have in some measure inclined towards the Unitarian type of theology. His glory, however, will always mainly rest upon his purely scientific works, the chief of which are so well known that it is almost superfluous to enumerate them, the Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica and the invaluable treatise on Optics, of which latter science he may be said to have first laid the foundation.

§ 12 JOHN RAY (1628-1705), together with Derham and Wiltoughby, combined the descriptive department of Natural History with moral and religious eloquence of a high order. They seem never to be weary of proclaiming the wisdom and goodness of that Providence whose works they had so attentively studied. Ray was the first who elevated Natural History to the rank of a science. ROBERT BOYLE (1627-1691) was an able writer as well as a distinguished philosopher. "No Englishman of the seventeenth century, after Lord Bacon," observes Mr. Hallam, "raised to himself so high a reputation in experimental philosophy as Robert Boyle, it has even been remarked that he was born in the year of Bacon's death, as the person destined by nature to succeed him. An eulogy which would be extravagant if it implied any parallel between the genius of the two, but hardly so if we look on Boyle as the most faithful, the most patient, the most successful disciple who carried forward the experimental philosophy of Bacon. His works occupy six large volumes in quarto. They may be divided into theological or metaphysical and physical or experimental. The metaphysical treatises, to use that word in a large sense, of Boyle, or rather those concerning Natural Theology, are very perspicuous, very free from system, and such as bespeak an independent lover of truth. His Disquisition on Final Causes was a well-timed vindication of that palmary argument against the paradox of the Cartesians, who had denied the validity of an inference from the manifest adaptation of means to ends in the universe to an intelligent Providence Boyle takes a more philosophic view of the principle of final causes than had been found in many theologians, who weakened the argument itself by the presumptuous hypothesis that man was the sole object of Providence in the creation. His greater knowledge of physiology led him to perceive that there are both animal and what he calls cosmical ends in which man has no concern."

One of the most extraordinary writers of this period—at least in a purely literary sense—was THOMAS BURNET (1635-1715), Master of the Charter-house, author of the eloquent and poetic declamation Telluris Theoria Sacra, giving a hypothetical account of the causes which produced the various irregularities and undulations which we see in the earth's surface. These he attributes to the action of fire and water, and in language of indescribable picturesqueness he first describes the convulsions and cataclysms which have given to our earth its present form, and then goes on to picture the final destruction that is awaiting our globe in the mysterious abysses of the future. The geological and physical theories of Burnet are fantastic in the extreme, but the pictures which he has drawn of the devastation caused by the great unbridled powers of Nature are grand and magnificent, and give Burnet a claim to be placed among the most eloquent and poetical of prose-writers. In richness of fancy and melody of language he is no unworthy rival of Jeremy Taylor, with whose noble description of the final destruction of the earth Burnet's sublime painting will bear a comparison.

§ 13 This writer must not be confounded with GILBERT BURNET (1643-1715), born in Edinburgh, in 1643, and who was one of the most active politicians and divines during the period embracing the reigns of Charles II, James II, and the accession of William of Orange. By birth and personal predilections he occupies a middle space between the extreme Episcopalian and Presbyterian parties, and though a man of ardent and busy character he was possessed of rare tolerance and candour. He was much celebrated for his talents as an extempore preacher, and was the author of a very large number of theological and political writings. Among these his History of the Reformation is still considered as one of the most valuable accounts of that important revolution. The first volume of this was published in 1679, and the work was afterwards completed by the author. He also gave to the world an account of the Life and Death of the witty and infamous Rochester, whose last moments he attended as a religious adviser, and whom his pious arguments recalled to a sense of repentance. He at one time enjoyed the favour of Charles II, but soon forfeited it by the boldness of his remonstrances against the profligacy of the king and by his defence of Lord William Russell, whose execution was one of the great political of Winchester and rector of Buriton. His writings on the Inspiration of the Old and New Testaments, and Commentaries, were valuable additions to the theology of the age. He was the father of the well-known Bishop Lowth.

SCOTTISH DIVINES.

SAMUEL RUTHERFORD (1600-1661).
 THOMAS HALYBURTON (1674-1712).
 THOMAS BOSTON (1676-1732)

In this age occurred "the great Marrow controversy," occasioned by a book of Edward Fisher, a Calvinistic minister in Wales, entitled The Marrow of Modern Divinity 1645. This work was warmly received by a section of the church, while another portion rejected it. It gave rise to much disturbance and contest.

The three writers mentioned above, who took an active part in this controversy, were severe and sombre in their divinity; but there was a massiveness of thought, and a richness of expression which still make this age one of the most remarkable and valuable in the history of Christian theology.

(B) OTHER PROSE WRITERS.

BULSTRODE WHITELOCKE (1605-1676) an able lawyer, was sent by Cromwell as ambassador to Sweden, and held other high offices under the Protector. He wrote Memorials of English Affairs from the beginning of the reign of Charles I to the Restoration which work was first published in 1682.

HENRY NEVILE (1620-1694), the friend of Harrington the author of the Oceana, and a member of the republican party published in 1681 an able work, entitled Plato Redivivus or a Dialogue concerning Government. The dialogue is between a Venetian nobleman, an English doctor (supposed to be Harvey), and an English gentleman. Though formerly belonging to the republican party, Nevile in this work advocates a monarchical form of government.

SIR WILLIAM DUGDALE (1605-1686), a learned antiquary, who published the Baronage of England, The Antiquities of Warwickshire Illustrated, A History of St Paul's Cathedral, &c.

ELIAS ASHHOLE (1617-1692), also a learned antiquary, who married the daughter of Sir William Dugdale, published in 1672 The Institutions, Laws and Ceremonies of the Most Noble Order of the Garter. He wrote numerous other works, and was the founder of the Museum at Oxford which still bears his name.

ANTHONY WOOD (1632-1695), published in 1691 his Athenæ Oxonienses an account of the eminent men educated at Oxford.

JOHN AUBREY (1626-1697) collected materials for many works, but published only one, in 1696 entitled Miscellanea containing an account of popular superstitions, from which it appears that Aubrey was very credulous.

SIR MATTHEW HALE (1609-1676), the celebrated Chief-Justice of the King's Bench in the reign of Charles II, wrote several works, many of them of a moral and religious character of which his Contemplations Moral and Divine, are the best known.

SIR GEORGE MACKENZIE (1636-1691) Lord Advocate in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., was well acquainted with polite literature but was held in execration by the Covenanters for his enforcement of the cruel laws against them. His prose is better than his verse and his Moral Essays may still be read with pleasure.

singularly intel'lectual and expressive countenance, and his eyes were remarkable for their tenderness and fire. He exhibited an extraordinary precocity of intellect, and the literary ambition by which he was devoured even from his early boyhood at once pointed out the poetical career to which he was destined. He has said of himself, "I hisped in numbers, for the numbers came," and the earliest attempts at poetry were made by him when he had hardly emerged from the nursery. His father had acquired a competent fortune, which enabled the boy-poet to indulge that taste for study and poetical reading which continued to be the passion of his life. At the age of 12 he was so struck with reverence for the glory of Dryden, that he is said to have persuaded a friend to accompany him to Will's Coffee-house, which the glorious veteran was in the habit of frequenting, and to obtain a glance of the illustrious patriarch, whose death took place in that year. At 16 he commenced his literary career by composing a collection of Pastorals and by translating portions of Statius, which were published in 1705. In the same year he produced some modernized versions from Chaucer, as if he were desirous in all things to parallel his great master Dryden, namely, the not over moral story of January and May, which is in substance the Merchant's Tale of the great patriarch of our literature, and the Prologue to the Wife of Bath's Tale. From 1709 his literary activity was unremitting, and an uninterrupted succession of works, equally varied in their subjects and exquisite in their finish, placed him at the head of the poets of his age. His Essay on Criticism, published in that year, and highly praised by Addison, was perhaps the first poem that fixed his reputation, and gave him a foretaste of that immense popularity which he enjoyed during his whole life. The precepts of this work are the same as those inculcated by Horace, and repeated by Boileau, and all the poets and critics of the classical school, but they are expressed by Pope with such a union of force and delicacy, such ripeness of judgment, and such grace of expression and melody of verse, that the poem appears less like the effort of a young writer than the result of consummate experience and practice in composition. In 1711 he published the Temple of Fame, an imitation of Chaucer's House of Fame. It is to this period of Pope's career that we must ascribe the conception and first sketch of the most original and charming production not only of Pope, but of the century in which he lived, a perfect gem, or masterpiece, equally felicitous in its plan and execution—one of those happy thoughts that are to be attributed half to genius and half to rare and favourable accident. This was the mock-heroic poem The Rape of the Lock, justly described by Addison as "merum sal, a delicious little thing," to which I shall presently recur. This poem is the victorious rival of the Lutrin

'brilliant though refracted effulgence of the great Sun of Poetry, by studying the graceful couplets of Pope. It is unfortunate that in their selection of the two great epic writers as subjects of translation, Dryden and Pope had not exchanged parts. Dryden, though perhaps incapable of reproducing the wonderful freshness and grandeur of Homer, still possessed most of the Homeric quality of fire and animation, while Pope, in whom consummate grace and finish is the prevailing merit, would have far more successfully reproduced the unsurpassed dignity, the chastened majesty, of Virgil.

§ 3 In 1717 Pope published a volume of poems, containing, among others, the Elegy on an Unfortunate Lady, the Epistle from Sappho to Phaon, borrowed from the Heroides of Ovid, and the Epistle of Eloisa to Abelard, its subject taken from the romantic and touching story of mediæval times. These works are all artificial in their arrangement and in some degree also in their diction, but the passion they express is so intense, and illustrated with such varied, pathetic, and beautiful imagery, that they will ever be considered masterpieces. The subject of the first is very obscure, but it seems to have been derived from a real tale of disappointed love and suicide, though many passages in the Elegy are of consummate beauty, the Eloisa, as a whole is a finer and more sustained composition. The intense glow of unhappy passion lights up the gloom and horror of the cloister with a lurid splendour like that of the fabled lamps in sepulchres. During this part of his life Pope was living, with his father and mother, to whom he always showed the tenderest and most dutiful affection, at Chiswick, but on the death of the former parent he removed with his mother to a villa he had purchased at Twickenham, on a most beautiful spot on the banks of the Thames. Here he passed the remainder of his life, in easy, if not opulent circumstances, his taste for gardening, and his grotto and quincunxes in which he delighted amused his leisure, and he lived in familiar intercourse with almost all the most illustrious statesmen, orators, and men of letters of his day, Swift, Atterbury, Addison, Bolingbroke, Prior, Gay, and Arbuthnot. He was perhaps a little too fond of talking of his own independence, and alluding with affected indifference, to the great and titled guests whom he received, and like most men who live in a narrow clique, was very apt to treat all those who were outside the charmed bounds as wretches deserving only of contempt, and as if all virtue, wit, and honour, were exclusively confined to his own set. In 1725 he published an Edition of Shakspeare in six volumes, in the compilation of which he exhibited a deficiency in that peculiar kind of knowledge which is absolutely indispensable to the commentator on an old author. His work was judged by the public to be far inferior to the contemporary edition of Theobald's, who, though destitute of poetic genius, possessed more critical discernment, and produced a much more valuable result. For this Pope's jealous envy could never forgive Theobald, and we shall see by-and-bye how savagely he revenged himself. During the following years he was engaged, together with Swift and Arbuthnot, in composing that famous collection of Miscellanies (1727), to which each of the friends contributed. The principal project of the fellow-labourers was the extensive satire on the abuses of learning and the extravagancies of philosophy, entitled Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus. This was intended to be for literature something like what Don Quixote was for chivalry but the idea, though happily enough carried out in some of its parts by the festive and humourous wit of Arbuthnot, was not a very happy one. The contributors, and chiefly Pope, whose admirable satiric genius instantly deserted him when he abandoned verse for prose, often descend to personality and buffoonery, and perhaps, with the exception of Arbuthnot's inimitable burlesque History of John Bull, the prose portions of the Miscellanies are hardly worthy of the fame of their authors. Pope, however, supplied to this publication some of the finest and most brilliant of his poetical pieces, particularly in the department of satire.

§ 4 The brilliant success of Pope, his steady popularity, the tinge of vanity and malignity in his disposition, and above all the supercilious tone in which he speaks of the struggles of literary existence, then at a very low ebb of social respectability, all conspired to raise around him a swarm of enemies, animated alike by envy and revenge. He had been frequently engaged in squabbles, in some of which his conduct was far from estimable, and he determined to inflict upon his innumerable enemies, the gnats and mosquitoes of the press, a severe and memorable castigation. Under the mask of zeal for reason and good taste he could indulge to the extreme the pleasure of chastising men whom he feared or hated and in many cases there is no reason to doubt that he was in good faith when he identified the expression of personal spite with the indignant voice of taste and morality. He composed the satire of the Dunciad, the primary idea of which may have been suggested by Dryden's Mac-Fleckno, but which is incomparably the fiercest, most sweeping, and most powerful literary satire that exists in the whole range of literature. In it he flays and boils and roasts and dismembers the miserable scribblers. The attacks, with the ferocity of a Mohock execution, and with more than the ingenuity of Orcagna's pictures of the Last Judgment. Most of the persons attacked are so obscure that their names are now rescued from oblivion by being embalmed in Pope's satire, like worthless rubbish preserved in the lava of a volcano but in the latter part of the poem, and particularly in the portion added in the editions of 1742 and 1743, the poet has given a sketch of the gradual decline and corruption of taste and learning in Europe, which is one of the noblest outbursts of his genius. The plot of the poem—the Iliad of the Dunces—is not very ingenious, and was borrowed from Dryden. Pope supposes that the throne of Dulness is left vacant by the death of Eusden, and that the various aspirants to “that bad eminence” engage in a series of trials, like the Olympic Games of old, to determine who shall inherit it. In the original form of the poem, as it appeared in 1728 and 1729, the palm of pedantry and stupidity was given to Theobald, Pope’s successful rival in commenting Shakspeare. In the new edition of 1743, published just before the poet’s death, Theobald is degraded from the throne, and the crown is given to Colley Cibber, an actor, manager, and dramatic author of the time, and who, whatever were his vices and frivolity, certainly was in no sense an appropriate King of the Dunces. But in this, as in numberless other instances, Pope’s bitterness of enmity entirely ran away with his judgment. The poem is an admirable—almost a fearful—example of the highest genius applied to the most selfish of ends—the lightning of genius, under the guise of chastising bad literature, burning, scaring, and devouring the victims of self-love.

In the four years extending from 1731 to 1735 Pope was engaged in the composition of his Epistles, addressed to Burlington, Cobham, Arbutnot, Bathurst, and other distinguished men. These poems, half satirical and half familiar, were in their manner a reproduction of the charming productions of Horace. Indeed Pope may not unjustly be called the English Horace, as Dryden is the English Juvenal. With less good-humoured epicurean philosophy than the great Augustan satirist, Pope possesses a finer and more elaborate poetical spirit, in good sense, clearness, and neatness of diction it is difficult to give the palm of superiority. At the same period was produced the Essay on Man, in four epistles, addressed to Bolingbroke, a work of more pretension, and aiming at the illustration of important ethical and metaphysical principles. In the First Epistle Man is regarded in his relation to the Universe, in the Second in his relation to himself, in the Third in his relation to society, and in the Fourth with respect to his ideas of, and pursuit after happiness. In the whole poem the exquisite neatness and concision of the language, the unvarying melody of the verse, and the beauty and felicity of the illustrations, are far more perceptible than the originality or even soundness of the theory. But the Essay is an incomparable example of the highest skill in the art of so treating an abstract philosophical subject as to render it neither dry nor unpoetical. I have now arrived nearly at the end of Pope’s well-filled and brilliant literary life. The death of his mother, of whose “declining age” he had “rooked the cradle” with the tenderest assiduity, the loss of many friends, among whom was Swift, now sinking into hopeless idiocy, the increased complication of his own maladies, to whose number asthma and dropsy were now added, all these causes threw a gloom over his declining years and warned him of his approaching end. He gave to the world his highly-finished and brilliant Imitations of Horace, in which, like so many previous writers of his own and other countries, from Bishop Hall down to Boileau, he adapted the topics of the Roman satirist to the persons and vices of modern times.

§ 5 On the 30th of May, 1744, this great poet died, unquestionably the most illustrious writer of his age, hardly if at all inferior to Swift in the vigour, the perfection, and the originality of his genius. As a man he was a strange mixture of selfishness and generosity, malignity and tolerance. He had a peculiar tendency to indirect and cunning courses, and the intense literary ambition by which, like Voltaire, he was kept in an incessant fever, sometimes showed itself in personal and sometimes in literary meannesses and jealousies. Of this his quarrel with Addison is a characteristic specimen, while his dishonourable conduct towards Bolingbroke will ever be a blot upon his memory as a man. Among his works few of any importance have, I think, been left unnoticed. I should perhaps mention his Eclogue of the Messiah, a happy adaptation of the Pollio of Virgil to a sacred subject, the Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, in which he was bold enough to try his strength with Dryden, and though defeated yet without disgrace. Pope has selected as his illustration of the powers of Music the story of Orpheus, and particularly his descent into Hades for Eurydice. He composed a considerable number of Epitaphs, some of which are remarkable as exemplifying his consummate skill in the art of paying a compliment. In a multitude of passages throughout his works we find instances of this, and we may apply to him what Macaulay has so gracefully said of Voltaire: "No man ever paid compliments better than he. His sweetest confectionary had always a delicate, yet stimulating flavour, which was delightful to palates wearied by the coarse preparations of inferior artists." The Rape of the Lock, the Epistles, and even the Satires, abound in examples of the most artful and ingenious flatteries, often veiled, for greater piquancy, under an air of blame. One of the most perfect instances is in the closing lines in the Epitaph on young Harcourt.

§ 6 The subject of the Rape of the Lock, perhaps the most imitable of Pope's productions, is the rather cavalier frolic of Lord Petre, a man of fashion at the court of Queen Anne, in cutting off a lock of hair from the head of Arabella Fermor, a beautiful young maid of honour. This incident Pope treated with so much grace and delicate mock-heroic pleasantry, that on consulting Addison on the first sketch of the poem, the latter strongly advised him to refrain from altering a "delicious little thing," that any change would be likely to spoil Pope, however, fortunately for his glory, though the critic's counsel was as prudent as it certainly was sincere, incorporated into his poem the delicious supernatural agency of the Sylphs and Gnomes, beings which he borrowed from the fantastic theories of Paracelsus and the Rosicrucian philosophers. The action of these miniature divinities, being exquisitely proportioned to the frivolous persons and events of the poem, delightfully replaces the classical deities, some of whom favour, while others oppose, the heroes of epic story from Homer downwards, and is far more graceful as well as original than the hacknied personification of Sloth and other abstract qualities in the famous mock-heroic of Boileau. The poem is a little dwarf-epic in five books, and bears the same relation to the lofty and serious works of which it is a parody, as a Dresden china figure does to the Venus or the Apollo. It is all sparkling with the flash of diamonds and roguish glances, all a-flutter with hoop-petticoats, brocades, and powdered wigs. Book I, after a due Invocation, describes the counsel given by Ariel in a dream to Belinda, whose toilette is then imitabably described. Canto II relates the sacrifice offered by "the adventurous Baron" in the hope of succeeding in his designs on the Lock, after which Belinda goes upon the water, and there is a solemn council of the Sylphs, in which their chief, Ariel, warns them of the impending danger. In Canto III the courtly party arrives at Hampton Court, where they take coffee, and a game of Ombre is described with the minutest detail, and in the manner of a solemn tournament. After this the tremendous catastrophe is described, and the fatal scissors, furnished by a rival beauty, divide the fatal lock "from the fair head, for ever, and for ever!" Canto IV transports us to the gloomy abode of Spleen, and introduces us to the Gnomes. Sir Plume, "with earnest eyes and round unthinking face," is sent by Belinda to demand the restitution of the lock, which is refused. Canto V describes a terrific combat—in metaphor—between the beaux and belles. Many of the former perish by the cruel glances of their fair opponents, when, in the midst of the carnage, the Lock, the causa teterrima belli, is suddenly snatched up into the skies, where it has ever since glittered as the constellation called the Tress of Berenice.

§ 7 The most original genius, as well as the most striking character of this period, was JONATHAN SWIFT (1667-1745), who, whether as a man or as a writer, occupies a foremost place in the literary and political history of the time. He was born in Dublin, in 1667, of English family and descent, his father having the appointment of Steward of the King's Inns. His entrance into life was unfortunate and tended to aggravate a natural tendency towards haughty misanthropy and bitter self-reliance. His father died in very embarrassed circumstances, and Swift, a posthumous child, found himself from his earliest years a dependent upon the charity of distant relations. He passed three years of his infancy in England, and was afterwards sent to a school at Kilkenny, whence he proceeded, in 1681, to Trinity College, Dublin. Here he occupied himself with irregular and desultory study, and at last received his degree with the unfavourable notice that it was conferred "speciali gratiâ," indicating that his conduct had not satisfied the academical authorities. In 1689 he entered the household of Sir William Temple, a distant connexion of his family, who was then residing in luxurious retirement at his beautiful villa of Moor Park in Surrey, where the cautious and sybaritical old diplomatist amused himself with gardening and diletante literature. Swift remained in Temple's service as a sort of humble hanger-on, secretary, and literary subordinate, and there is no doubt he deeply felt the miseries of dependence which must have intensely rankled in the memory of so proud and ambitious a character. Temple was frequently visited and consulted by King William, from whom Swift, who had occasionally been employed as a messenger between his patron and that prince, expected, but in vain, some advancement. It is said that William offered Swift a commission in a troop of horse, and taught him the Dutch way of cutting and eating asparagus. Swift's residence at Moor Park continued down to Temple's death in 1699, with, however, one or two intervals, in which he took the degree of M.A. at Oxford, and entered into holy orders on the Irish Church establishment, having obtained a small preferment on which he found it impossible to live. These temporary absences were caused by quarrels with his patron, whose easy yet supercilious condescension his bitter and haughty spirit could not brook, but he swallowed his humiliation, and begged pardon in terms which show how he chafed against the yoke of dependence, and explain the mingled shame and anger with which in after life he recalled his connexion with Temple. During this period of his life he was industriously employed in study, and steady and extensive reading corrected the defects of his earlier education. His acquaintance with history, poetry, and science was considerable, and he possessed in the highest degree the power of rendering instantly available for a specific purpose the stores he had acquired. On Temple's death he became the literary executor of his patron, and prepared for the press the numerous works he left, which he presented, with a preface and dedication written by himself, to William III.

§ 8 Failing in obtaining any preferment from that sovereign, never remarkable for much sympathy with letters, Swift went to Ireland as chaplain to Earl Berkeley the Viceroy, and received the small livings of Laracor and Rathbeggan, altogether amounting to about 200*l* a year. At Laracor he lived till 1710, amusing himself with gardening and repairing his church and parsonage, and making yearly visits to England, where the brilliancy of his conversation, his vigorous aptitude for affairs, and his connexion with Temple, rendered him acceptable to the leading Whig statesmen who were the ministers of the day. He became the familiar companion of the most illustrious men of the time, Halifax, Godolphin, Somers, as well as Addison, equally famous in letters and in politics. Congreve had been his school-fellow at Kilkenny, and Dryden was a distant relation of Swift's family. Swift's persevering dislike to Dryden, whom he constantly underrated in after life, is said to have originated in the great poet's unfavourable estimate of some of Swift's verses which were submitted to him, on which occasion he said, "Cousin Swift, you will never be a poet!" His connexion with William III and Temple, as well as the predominance at that moment of Whig policy, naturally caused Swift to enter public life under the Whig banner, but he soon after deserted their side, partly no doubt because they had neglected to give him the preferment they had promised, and still more because their ecclesiastical views were strongly opposed to his own. Throughout his life he was a staunch supporter of the Established Church, and upheld the laws which excluded the Nonconformists from political power, while the Whigs were now agitating a repeal of the Test Acts.

In the last years of William III he published the letters of Temple, but his first important works were the Battle of the Books and The Tale of a Tub, which were published about the same time (1703-4). The latter was unquestionably his production, though never formally owned by him. It was a savage and yet exquisitely humorous pasquinade ridiculing the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians, and for the exaltation of the High Anglican party, the three churches being impersonated in the ludicrous and not very decorous adventures of his three heroes, Peter, Jack, and Martin. The Battle of the Books, though first published in 1703, appears to have been written as early as 1697, to support his patron, Sir William Temple, in what we may call the "Bye plot," that arose out of the celebrated Boyle and Bentley controversy on the letters of Phalaris. The dispute, originating in a mere personal squabble with Bentley, (who had been, though unjustly, accused of discourtesy in his capacity of librarian of the King), soon embraced the then violently-contested question of the relative superiority of the Ancients and the Moderns. This was a dispute which involved almost all the nations of the Continent, and Temple had engaged in the discussion on the side of the Ancients, exhibiting a lamentable deficiency of knowledge and common sense.*

* See a fuller account of this controversy in Notes and Illustrations to Ch. XVI.

Swift became the champion of the same side, and gave a striking foretaste of those tremendous powers of sarcasm and vituperation which made him the most formidable pamphleteer that ever existed. The merits of the case he does not attempt to touch, but with the wildest and most grotesque oddity of invention, and the unscrupulous use of everything coarse, familiar, and ludicrous in language, he strives to cover his opponents with ignominy and contempt. The plan of the pamphlet is in no respect original, it describes a general engagement between the Ancients and the Moderns, in a sort of parody of the Homeric battles, but the boldness and fertility of the abuse shows how great a master had appeared of the whole vocabulary of insult. Like a Chinese piratical junk, he gains his victory by the loathsome offensiveness of the stink-pots which he hurls.

In 1710 Archbishop King, Primate of Ireland, employed Swift to negotiate in the name of the Irish clergy with the English government for the abandonment of their claim to the first-fruits and tenths, a species of fines paid on the institution to benefices in the Church and with this intention he visited England, and exhibited great activity and intelligence, but without obtaining the result he desired. He had now rendered himself a prominent person both in his profession and in the general world of politics, was known and feared as a powerful and unscrupulous pamphleteer, and was the familiar associate of those who were at the head of affairs, but his hopes of preferment were not fulfilled. At this time he regarded Ireland with a mixture of contempt and detestation, and was eager for any advancement that would enable him to reside in England, near the focus of literary and political activity. For the reasons already mentioned he now broke off his connexion with the Whigs, and began to write, to intrigue, and to satirize, with even greater force, vehemence, and success, on the side of the Tories.

§ 9 Harley, afterwards created Earl of Oxford, and St John, better known as the brilliant but unprincipled Bolingbroke, were now at the head of affairs. So formidable a political pamphleteer as Swift they naturally received with open arms. As a deserter from the enemy's camp he brought with him not only the zeal of the apostate, but a damaging knowledge of the secrets of the adversary's tactics, and Swift was not a man to scruple to use any advantage he possessed. He became more useful to his present than he had ever been to his former party, and was caressed and flattered by the great, the fair, the witty, and the wise. He affected to treat men of the highest rank with the freedom and familiarity of an equal, and this somewhat parvenu air was forgiven in consideration of his undoubted talents and the services which he rendered with his terrible pen. His negotiation about the first-fruits and tenths was successfully terminated, and he poured forth with unexampled rapidity squib after squib and pamphlet after pamphlet, employing all the stores of his unequalled fancy and powerful sophistry to defend his party and to blacken and ridicule his antagonists. The great object of his ambition was an English bishopric, and the ministers would have been willing enough to gratify him, but he encountered secret hostility, such as a man of such a stamp could not fail to have aroused. Sharp, then Archbishop of York, represented to the Queen that high preferment could not with propriety be conferred upon a man whose writings, as in the case of the Tale of a Tub, verged upon the very brink of profanity and indecency, but a still more fatal hostility was that of the Queen's favourite, the Duchess of Somerset, whom Swift had lampooned in a manner that the meekest of her sex could not forgive. Swift's bitter and cruel verses had indeed been suppressed as soon as printed, but the Duchess threw herself at the Queen's feet with a copy of the pasquinade, and he learned furens quid femina possit. In spite of the strongest desire to do more for their supporter, the ministers were obliged to confine his recompence to the deanery of St. Patrick's, Dublin, to which he was nominated, to his extreme disappointment, in 1713. He was soon recalled from Ireland, whither he had been called by the business of his installation, by the news of an irremediable breach between Harley and Bolingbroke. Swift vainly interfered to reconcile the statesmen, upon whose union depended the whole stability of the government; he found Harley timid, pompous, and reserved, and St. John volatile and insolent, and after intense but fruitless efforts to heal their dissension Swift again retired. This took place in 1714. Bolingbroke, combining with Mrs. Masham, the Queen's favourite, who, rising from a humble and almost menial position, had gradually succeeded in ousting the imperious Duchess of Marlborough from the favour of that weak princess, succeeded in turning out Harley, whom the Queen abandoned under pretext of his having appeared before her flustered with wine. But St. John's triumph was short. The death of Anne and the accession of the Elector of Hanover recalled the Whigs to power; the ministry were accused, and with strong grounds of probability, of a plot for bringing back the Pretender, and thus nullifying the Protestant succession. Oxford was committed to the Tower, Bolingbroke fled beyond the sea, and soon made his appearance in the exiled court of St. Germain's, and Swift retired to Ireland, where he was received with a universal yell of contempt and execration.

§ 10 During his long and repeated visits to England Swift's company and conversation had always been sought after by men of letters as well as statesmen. He founded, together with Harley and other friends, a sort of Club called the Society of Brothers, in which many of his most amusing political squibs were concocted and with Pope, Gay, and Arbuthnot, he formed what was called the Scriblerus Club, the members of which were united by the closest intimacy, and threw into a common stock their ideas embodied in the famous Miscellanies. From 1714 to 1726 Swift resided constantly in Ireland, and from being an object of detestation raised himself to a height of popularity which has never been surpassed even in the stormy political atmosphere of that country. The condition of Ireland, always a cancer and a disgrace to Britain, was just then unusually deplorable, the population torn by bitter rivalry and mutual persecution between the dominating Protestant and the enslaved and impoverished Catholics, while the national evil of absenteeism had reduced the agricultural classes to the lowest abyss of misery and degradation. In some degree, perhaps, from motives of philanthropy, but far more, probably, out of a desire to annoy and embarrass the English government, Swift boldly proclaimed the misery of the country, and the force and bitterness of his pamphlets soon drew down the persecution of the Ministers. A State prosecution was instituted against the printer, which the Government made desperate but unavailing efforts, by means of subservient judges and packed juries, to carry to a conviction. But the highest point of Swift's Irish popularity was attained by the seven famous letters which he wrote, signed M B Drapier (draper), and inserted in a Dublin newspaper. The occasion was the attempt, on the part of the English ministry, to force in Ireland the circulation of a large sum of copper money, the contract for coining which had been undertaken by William Wood, a Birmingham speculator. This money Swift endeavoured to persuade the people was enormously below its nominal value, and he counselled all true patriots not only to refuse to take it, but to refrain from using any English manufactures whatever. The force and animation of his arguments, and the exquisite skill with which he wore his mask of a plain, honest, patriotic tradesman, excited the impressionable Irish almost to frenzy. As Swift afterwards boasted to Archbishop Boulter, he would have had but to lift his finger to cause the ministry to be torn in pieces: the government was obliged to renounce the project of Wood's coinage, and the attorney-general's indictment of the printer of the letters, though maintained by all the violence of White-shed, the chief justice, was ignored by the jury. Swift was known to be the real author of the letters, and his defence of the rights of the Irish people made him from this moment the idol of that warm-hearted and impressionable race.

From 1724 to 1737 Swift was occupied with the production not only of his greatest and most immortal work, the Travels of Gulliver, but with an infinity of pamphlets and occasional compositions. He visited England in 1726 when Gulliver was brought out, exciting a universal burst of delight and admiration The death of Stella, one of the few beings that Swift over really loved, happened in 1728, and the loss of many friends further contributed to darken and intensify the gloom of this proud and sombre spirit He had from an early period suffered more or less constantly from giddiness and pain in the head, and the fearful anticipations of insanity which had constantly haunted him were destined to be cruelly verified In 1741 he was afflicted with a painful inflammation which necessitated restraint, and which gradually merged into a state of idiocy that lasted without interruption till his death in 1745 During the last three years of this period he is said never to have spoken, and to have shown an almost complete unconsciousness, and there is nothing recorded more melancholy or more instructive than the spectacle of this great wit and satirist, without any attendance save that of mercenary hands, for his own unaccountable and selfish conduct had deprived him of the comforts of a family, expiring, "a driveller and a show" He is buried in his own cathedral of St. Patrick's, and over his grave is inscribed that epitaph which he composed for himself, and which is one of the most tragic and terrible of human compositions in it he speaks of resting "ubi sæva indignatio ulterius cor lacerare nequit," a fearfully vivid portraiture of his own character

§ 11 My account of Swift would be imperfect without some mention of those extraordinary events which are connected with his relations towards the two unhappy women whose love for him was the glory and the misery of their lives While residing in Temple's family he became acquainted with Esther Johnson, a beautiful young girl brought up as a dependent in the house, and who, though passing for the daughter of Sir William's steward, appears really to have been a natural child of the old diplomatist To her, while hardly in her teens, Swift gave instruction, and the bond between master and pupil ripened into the deepest and tenderest passion on the part of the maiden, and as much attachment on that of the former as the proud and bitter nature of Swift was capable of feeling On his removal to Ireland Swift induced Stella—such was the poetical name he gave her—to settle with her friend Mrs Dingley in that country, where he maintained with both of them—though Mrs Dingley was merely a mask to save appearances—that long, curious, and intimate correspondence which has since been published as his Journal to Stella In it we see the unbending of this haughty spirit he addresses his correspondent in the fondest puerilities of his "little language," and while giving the minutest account of his thoughts and doings from day to day, he interests us with a thousand details concerning the political and literary life of the time The journal is full of the most affectionate aspirations after a tranquil retreat in the society of "little M D" During one of his visits to London Swift became intimate with the family of a rich merchant named Vanhomrigh, over whose daughter Hester, to whom he gave the name of Vanessa, he exercised the same kind of enchantment as he had over Stella From at first directing her studies he succeeded, involuntarily on his part, in inspiring an ardent, beautiful, and accomplished girl with a passion so deep and intense that, casting aside all female delicacy, she threw herself at Swift's feet and declared her unconquerable love for him It is at this point that Swift's conduct cannot be justified He ought now to have made her his wife, or to have broken off the connexion He did neither, but continued to describe the depth and sincerity of the friendship which he felt for her To add to his embarrassments Vanessa, who possessed an independent fortune, insisted, on the death of her father, in spite of Swift's remonstrances, on coming to Ireland, where she resided at Celbridge and continued to receive visits from Swift The tale runs, though there is no trustworthy authority for it, that Vanessa, unable to learn the truth of Swift's relation to Stella, and driven almost to madness by suspense and irritation, wrote to Stella to inquire into the nature of Swift's position with regard to her. It is further added that the letter was intercepted by Swift, and brought back by him and thrown down without a word, but with a terrible countenance, before the unhappy writer, who died a few weeks afterwards (1723) of a broken heart The tale is apocryphal, and all that we know for certain is that they parted in anger In judging of Swift's conduct to Vanessa much depends upon the question whether Swift was ever married to Stella If he was, nothing could justify his treatment of Vanessa But though the fact of the marriage has been asserted by Sir Walter Scott, Macaulay and others, the evidence for it breaks down upon examination, and more recent writers have given good reason for believing that it never took place * Stella died in 1728, and in the notices Swift wrote of her, while smarting under the agony of her recent loss, it is impossible not to see a love as intense as its manifestation had been singular and inexplicable

§ 12 The greatest and most characteristic of Swift's prose works is the Voyages of Gulliver, a vast and all-embracing satire upon humanity itself; though many of the strokes were at the time intended to allude to particular persons and contemporary events The general plan of this book is the following It is written in the character of a plain, unaffected, honest ship-surgeon, who describes the strange scenes and adventures through which he passes with that

* The subject has been exhaustively examined by Mr Churton Collins in his work on 'Jonathan Swift,' 1893, where the reader will find a trustworthy account of Swift's relations to Stella and Vanessa, air of simple, straightforward, prosaic good faith that gives so much charm to the narratives of our brave old navigators, and which Defoe has so successfully mimicked in Robinson Crusoe. The contrast between the extravagance of the inventions and the gravity with which they are related, forms precisely the point of the peculiar humour of Swift, and is equally perceptible in other works, while it was the distinguishing feature of that singular saturnine kind of pleasantry which made his conversation so sought after. He is said never to have been known to laugh, but to have poured forth the quaintest and most fantastic inventions with an air of gravity and sternness that kept his audience in convulsions of merriment. This admirable fiction consists of four parts or voyages. In the first Gulliver visits the country of Lilliput, whose inhabitants are about six inches in stature, and where all the objects, houses, trees, ships, and animals, are in exact proportion to the miniature human beings. Indeed, one of the principal secrets of Swift's humour, as well as of the power he possesses over the imagination—I had almost said the belief—of the reader, is the exquisite and watchful manner in which these proportions are preserved. The author never forgets himself in this respect, nay, he has managed to give to the passions, the ambition, the ceremonies, and the religion of his diminutive people an air of the same littleness as invests the physical objects. The invention displayed in the droll and surprising incidents is as unbounded as the natural and bonâ-fide air with which they are recounted, and we can hardly wonder at the exclamation of the learned bishop, who is said to have cried out, "That there were some things in Gulliver that he could not quite believe!" The second voyage is to Brobdingnag, a country of enormous giants, of about sixty feet in height, and here Gulliver plays the same part as the insect-like Lilliputians had played to him. As in the first voyage, the contemptible and ludicrous side of human things is shown by exhibiting how trifling they would appear in almost microscopic proportions, so in Brobdingnag we are made to perceive how odious and ridiculous would appear our politics, our wars, and our ambitions, to the gigantic perceptions of a more mighty race. The lesson is the same, but we learn it by looking through the other end of the telescope. The Third Part, which is generally found inferior, from the want of unity in the objects of representation, to the preceding voyages, carries Gulliver to a series of strange and fantastic countries. The first is Laputa, a flying island, inhabited by philosophers and astronomers. Here Swift intended to satirise the follies and abuses of learning and science, but independently of the fact that much of this part, as the Academy of Lagado, is borrowed from Lucian, Rabelais, and other satirists, his strokes of ridicule are not always very well directed, and fall pointless, being levelled against imaginary follies From Lagado the traveller goes to Glubbdubdrib and then to Luggnagg, which latter episode introduces the terrific description of the Struldbrugs, wretches who are cursed with bodily immortality without preserving at the same time their intellects or their affections

Gulliver's last voyage is to the country of the Houyhnhnms, a region in which horses are the reasoning, civilized, and dominant beings, and where men, under the name of Yahoos, are degraded to the rank of noxious, filthy, and unreasoning brutes The manner in which Swift has described the latter, retaining a resemblance to man in their propensities which only renders them more horrible and loathsome, shows how intense was his hatred and scorn of humanity The satire goes on deepening as it advances, playful and amusing in the scenes of Lilliput, it grows blacker and bitterer at every step, till in the Yahoos it reaches a pitch of almost insane ferocity, which there is but too much reason to believe faithfully embodied Swift's real opinion of his fellow-creatures

§ 13 In the Tale of a Tub he gives a burlesque allegorical account of the three great sects of Christianity, the Roman Catholic, the Lutheran, and the Calvinistic churches These are represented with the wildest and most farcical extravagance of incident, under the form of three brothers, Peter, Jack, and Martin, and their squabbles and ultimate separation figure the Reformation and its consequences Between the chapters of narrative are interposed what Swift calls digressions, in which the most ludicrous fancies are embodied in a degree of out-of-the-way learning not to be met with in any other of his works Every thing that is droll and familiar in ideas and language is concentrated in this extraordinary production, and many of the pleasantries are sufficiently irreverent to justify the accusation of his religious belief not being very firmly fixed The innumerable pamphlets and political and historical tracts poured forth by Swift, as his Conduct of the Allies, the Public Spirit of the Whigs, the Last Years of Queen Anne, his contributions to journals, his Sentiments of a Church of England Man, his remarks on the Sacramental Test, and a multitude of others, being written on local and temporary subjects, are now little consulted, they all exhibit the vigour of his reasoning, the admirable force and directness of his style, and his unscrupulous ferocity of invective They are all, whatever be their nature, party pamphlets of the most virulent kind, in which the author was never restrained by any feeling of his own dignity, or of candour and indulgence for others, from overwhelming his opponents with ridicule and abuse He is like the Indian savage, who, in torturing his captive at the stake, cares little how he wounds and burns himself, so long as he can make his victim writhé, or, like the street ruffian, who, in hurling ordure on his antagonist, is indifferent to the filth that may stick to his own fingers. The bitterness, as well as the power of these writings, are often something almost diabolical. Many of his smaller prose writings are purely satirical, as his Polite Conversation and Directions to Servants. In the former he has combined in a sort of comic manual all the vulgar repartees, nauseous jokes, and selling of bargains, that were at that time common in smart conversation, and in the latter, under the guise of ironical precepts, he shows how minute and penetrating had been his observations of the lying, pilfering, and dirty practices of servants. Perhaps the pleasantest, as they are the most innocent, of his prose pleasantries, are the papers written in the character of Isaac Bickerstaff, where he shows up, with exquisite drollery, the quackery of the astrologer Partridge. His letters are very numerous, and those addressed to his intimate friends, as Pope and Gay, and those written to Sheridan, half-friend and half-butt, contain inimitable specimens of his peculiar humour, which has been excellently described by Coleridge as "anima Rabelaisii habitans in sacco." The three greatest satirical wits of modern times possess each a peculiar manner. Rabelais, with his almost frantic animal spirits, pours forth a side-shaking mixture of erudition and ingenious buffoonery, Voltaire, with his sly grin of contempt, makes everything he attacks appear at once odious and despicable, but Swift inspires us with loathing as well as with contempt. We laugh with Rabelais, we sneer with Voltaire, with Swift we despise and we abhor. He will not only be ever regarded as one of the greatest masters of English prose, but his poetical works will give him a prominent place among the writers of his age. They are, however, most strongly contrasted in their style and manner to the type most prevalent at the time, and of which Pope is the most complete representative. They have no pretension to loftiness of language, are written in the sermo pedestris, in a tone studiously preserving the familiar expression of common life. In nearly all of them Swift adopted the short octosyllabic verse that Prior and Gay had rendered popular. The poems show the same wonderful acquaintance with ordinary incidents as the prose compositions, the same intense observation of human nature, and the same profoundly misanthropic view of mankind. The longest of the narrative writings Cadenus (Decanus, an anagram indicating the Dean himself) and Vanessa, is at the same time the least interesting. It gives an account, though not a very clear one, of the love-episode which terminated so fatally for poor Hester Vanhomrigh. The most likely to remain popular are the Verses on my own Death, describing the mode in which that event, and Swift's own character, would be discussed among his friends, his enemies, and his acquaintances, and perhaps there is no composition in the world which gives so easy, animated a picture, at once satirical and true, of the language and sentiments of ordinary society. He produced an infinity of small burlesques and pleasantries, in prose and verse, as for example, The Grand Question Debated, in which he has, with consummate skill and humour, adopted the maundering style of a vulgar servant-maid. Shakspeare himself, in Mrs. Quickly and in Juliet's Nurse, has not more accurately seized the peculiarities of the lower class. A thousand parodies, jests, punning Latin and English letters, epigrams and descriptions might be cited. Many of them are slight toys of the fancy, but they are toys executed with the greatest perfection, and in some, as the Legion Club, the verses on Bettesworth and Lord Cutts, the ferocious satire of Swift is seen in its full intensity. They are little sparkling bubbles, but they are blown from vitriolic acid.

§ 14. No member of the brilliant society of which Pope and Swift were the chief luminaries, deserves more respect, both for his intellectual and personal qualities, than DR. JOHN ARBUTHNOT (1675-1735). He was of Scottish origin, and enjoyed high reputation as a physician, in which capacity he remained attached to the court from 1709 till the death of Queen Anne. He was one of the most lovable, as well as the most learned and accomplished wits of the day, and was a chief contributor to those Miscellanies of which I have so often spoken in connection with Pope. He is supposed to have conceived the plan of that extensive satire on the abuses of learning, embodied in the Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, and to have indeed executed the best portions of that comprehensive though fragmentary work, and in particular the description of the pedantic education given to his son by the learned Cornelius. But the fame of Arbuthnot is more intimately connected with the inimitable History of John Bull, in which the intrigues and Wars of the Succession are so drolly caricatured. The object of the work was to render the prosecution of the war by Marlborough unpopular with the nation, but the adventures of Squire South (Austria), Lewis Baboon (France), Nick Frog (Holland), and Lord Strutt (the King of Spain), are related with fun, odd humour, and familiar vulgarity of language. There is much of the same kind of humour as we find in the Tale of a Tub, and in Gulliver, but Arbuthnot is always good-natured, and there is no trace of that fierce bitterness and misanthropy which tinges every page of Swift. In the latter part of the History Arbuthnot details with great humour some of the political intrigues of the English ministry, and in particular the way in which the Scottish presbyterian party were tricked by the Earl of Nottingham into assenting to the bill against Occasional Conformity. The characters of the various nations and parties are conceived and maintained with consummate spirit, and perhaps the popular ideal of John Bull, with which Englishmen are so fond of identifying their personal and national peculiarities, was first stamped and fixed by Arbuthnot's amusing burlesque. Besides these well-known pleasantries, Arbuthnot's fertile and festive genius produced others in the same manner, as the Art of Political Lying, but the authorship of some of the jeux-d'esprit ascribed to him is rendered uncertain by his habit of writing in connexion with his friends Swift and Pope. He was also the author of many learned tracts both in general literature and in subjects more immediately professional, and he seems to have fully deserved the admiration lavished upon him by all his friends, as an accomplished scholar, an able and benevolent physician, and a wit of singular brilliancy and fertility.

§ 15 MATTHEW PRIOR (1664-1721), was a poet and diplomatist of this time, who played a prominent part on the stage of politics as well as on that of literature. He was of humble origin, and after receiving a commencement of education in Westminster School, is said to have been obliged to pass some time with an uncle who kept a tavern in London, and in whose house the lad was employed in serving the customers. His scholarship is related to have attracted the notice of the splendid and generous Dorset, who enabled him to finish his studies at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself and obtained a small fellowship. He took part with Montagu, another of his patrons, in the composition of the Country Mouse and City Mouse, a poem intended to ridicule Dryden's Hind and Panther, and the door of public employment was soon opened to him. His career in the diplomatic service was brilliant: after accompanying Berkeley, Ambassador to the Hague, as Secretary, he became Secretary of Legation at the Peace of Ryswick, and received a considerable pecuniary gratification from the Government. He twice resided at Versailles in the capacity of envoy, and by his talents in negotiation as well as by his wit and accomplishments in society appears to have been very popular among the French. Many stories are related of his address in polished repartee, in which he showed himself not inferior to the Parisian wits and men of letters. On returning to England he was made a Commissioner of Trade, and in 1701 became a member of the House of Commons. Though he had entered public life as a partisan of the Whigs, he now deserted them for the Tories, on the occasion of the impeachment of Lord Somers, and he again went to Paris, where he lived in great splendour during the negotiations in which Bolingbroke receded to the disgraceful Treaty of Utrecht. In 1715 he was ordered into custody by the Whigs, on a charge of high treason, and remained two years in confinement. The worst result to Prior of this political persecution, was the loss of all his fortune, his means of subsistence being now nearly reduced to the small revenue of his college fellowship, which in the days of his splendour he had refused to give up, prudently calculating that the time might come when he would be glad to possess even so small an income. However, with the assistance of his friends, he published by subscription a collection of his works, the proceeds of which amounted to a considerable sum. Prior was an easy Epicurean philosopher of the Horatian stamp, and accommodated himself with facility to every change of fortune. His longer and more ambitious poems are Alma, a metaphysical discussion carried on in easy unembarrassed Hudibrastic verse, exhibiting a good deal of thought and learning disguised under an easy conversational garb, and the Epic entitled Solomon, a poem somewhat in the manner, and with the same defects, as the Davidis of Cowley. A work of considerable length, and ambitious in its character, is the dialogue entitled Henry and Emma, modernised, and spoiled in the modernising, from the exquisite old ballad of the Nutbrowne Maide. The transference to modern times, and the expression in the smooth verse of the correct school of poets, of the simple passion and picturesque sentiment of the ancient poem, is like the appearance of Homer in the version of Pope. Prior's two claims to admiration are his easy, animated, half-tender, half-licentious love-songs, many of which exhibit the same union of natural though not profound sentiment with a sort of philosophic gaiety and carelessness that form the peculiar charm of the French chansonniers. Prior composed a number of Tales in verse, in the same style as the Contes of La Fontaine, showing much similarity with that class of productions of the inimitable fabulist, but open to the same objection—an objection which will now exclude them from the reading of our more fastidious age—of occasional immorality in their subjects and treatment.

§ 16 The name of JOHN GAY (1688-1732), is one of the most attractive among the brilliant literary stars that make up the constellation of which Pope and Swift were the leading luminaries. He was one of those easy, amiable, good-natured men who are the darlings of their friends, and whose talents excite admiration without jealousy, while their characters are the object rather of fondness than respect. He was born 1688, and carried off prematurely by an inflammatory fever, in 1732, and his death filled the jealous Pope with sorrow, and forced tears even from the hard and cynical eyes of Swift. He entered life in a humble station, as a linen-draper's shopman, but soon exchanged this occupation for a dependence upon the great, which was not more favourable either to happiness or self-respect, and for a vain pining after public employment and court favour for which his indolent and self-indulgent habits rendered him singularly unfit. His most important poetical productions at the beginning of his career were the collection of Eclogues entitled The Shepherd's Week, and the original and charmingly executed mock-didactic poem, Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London. In the former, consisting of seven pastorals, he originally intended a parody on Ambrose Philips, whose writings were the general butt or ridicule to Pope and his friends, but the work of Gay is so fresh and pleasant, and his descriptions of real English rural nature and peasant life are so agreeable that his composition will always be read with pleasure for its intrinsic merit. Like Spenser before him, Gay gave a national colour to his personages and to his landscape, but his incidents and the general tone of his dialogues are comic. He has shown great address in applying the topics of Theocritus and Virgil to the customs, employments, and superstitions of English peasants, and he has endeavoured to heighten the effect by the occasional employment of antiquated and provincial expressions. The Trivia is interesting, not only for its ease and quiet humour, but for the curious details it gives us of the street scenery, costume, and manners of that time. Gay produced several dramatic works principally of a comic nature and interspersed with songs, for the composition of which he showed an almost unrivalled talent. I may mention What d'ye Call It? a sort of half pastoral extravaganza, and the farce of Three Hours after Marriage. Gay's pieces generally contained, or were supposed to contain, occasional political allusions, the piquancy of which greatly contributed to their popularity. They are also seldom free from a somewhat loose and immoral tendency. His most successful venture was the Beggars' Opera, the idea of which is said to have been first suggested by Swift when residing, in 1726, at Pope's villa at Twickenham. The idea of this piece is eminently happy—it was to transfer the songs and incidents of the Italian Opera—then almost a novelty in England, and in the blaze of popularity, to the lowest class of English life. The hero of the Beggars' Opera is a highwayman, and gaolers, pickpockets, and prostitutes form the dramatic personæ, while the scene is principally in Newgate. In a word, to use Swift's expression, it was a kind of Newgate pastoral, and was a sort of parody of the opera then in vogue, while it became the origin of the English Opera. The beauty and charming voice of Elizabeth Fenton, who first acted Polly, the satirical allusions plentifully scattered through the dialogue, and eagerly caught up by the parties of the day, the novelty and oddity of the whole spectacle, and above all, the exquisite beauty of the songs plentifully interspersed throughout, gave the Beggars' Opera an unparalleled success. Polly became the idol of the town, and was removed from the stage to share the coronet of a duke, and Gay acquired from the performance of his piece the very large sum of nearly 700*l*. He was encouraged by success to endeavour to continue in the same strain, and produced a kind of continuation called Polly, which though far inferior, was even more profitable, for being prohibited on the ground of political allusions, by the authority of the Lord Chamberlain, the opposition party, in order to spite the court, contributed so liberally to its publication that Gay is said to have cleared about 1100*l*. The poet, with that sanguine improvidence which characterized him, had previously met with severe losses in the famous South Sea mania, but grown wiser by experience, and profiting by the advice of friends who possessed more practical common sense than himself, he determined to husband the little fortune he had accumulated. He was received into the family of the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry, where he seems to have been petted like some favourite lapdog, till his death in 1732. He was the author of a collection of Fables in easy octosyllable verse which he wrote to contribute to the education of William Duke of Cumberland, and though these are the best-known and most frequently cited works of the kind in our language, they will be found immeasurably inferior in wit, profound sense, picturesqueness, and above all in the rare precious quality of intense national spirit, to the immortal fables of La Fontaine and of Krinloff. They retain their popularity from their figuring in every collection of poetry for the young, their style rendering them peculiarly adapted for reading and learning by heart. Gay's songs and ballads, whether those introduced into the Beggars' Opera and other dramatic works, or those written separately, are among the most musical, touching, playful, and charming that exist in the language. The diction and subject are often of the most familiar kind, but the grace of the expression, and the flowing harmony of the verse, make them, whether pathetic or lively, masterpieces of skill. They have, too, invariably that rare and high attribute of the best song-writing, that the very march of the number irresistibly suggests the air to which they are to be sung.

§ 17 My space will only permit a cursory mention of SIR SAMUEL GARTH (died in 1718), a Whig physician of eminence, whose poem of The Dispensary, written on occasion of a squabble between the College of Physicians and the Apothecaries' Company, was half satirical and half a plea in favour of giving medical assistance to the poor, THOMAS PARNELL (1679-1718), a friend of Pope and Swift, who held a living in Ireland, and is known chiefly by his graceful but somewhat feeble tale of The Hermit, a versified parable founded on a striking story originally derived from the Gesta Romanorum; and THOMAS TICKELL (1686-1740), celebrated for his friendship with the accomplished Addison, whose death suggested a noble elegy, the only work of Tickell which rises above the elegant mediocrity that marks the general tone of the minor poetry of that age. Tickell contributed papers to the Spectator, and also published a translation of the first book of the Iliad, which led to a misunderstanding between Addison and Pope (see p. 319). Tickell published a collected edition of Addison's works.

§ 18 I now come to EDWARD YOUNG (1681-1765), the most powerful of the secondary poets of the epoch. He began his career in the unsuccessful pursuit of fortune in the public and diplomatic service of the country. Disappointed in his hopes and somewhat soured in his temper he entered the church, and serious domestic losses still further intensified a natural tendency to morbid and melancholy reflection. He obtained his first literary fame by his satire entitled the Love of Fame, the Universal Passion, written before he had abandoned a secular career. It is in rhyme and bears considerable resemblance to the manner of Pope, though it is deficient in that exquisite grace and neatness which distinguish the latter. In referring the vices and follies of mankind chiefly to vanity and the foolish desire of applause, Young exhibits a false and narrow view of human motives, but there are many passages in the three epistles which compose this satire, that exhibit strong powers of observation and description, and a keen and vigorous expression which, though sometimes degenerating into that tendency to paradox and epigram which are the prevailing defect of Young's genius, are not unworthy of his great model. The Second Epistle, describing the character of women, may be compared, without altogether losing in the parallel, to Pope's admirable work on the same subject. But Young's place in the history of English poetry—a place long a very high one, and which is likely to remain a far from unenviable one, is due to his striking and original poem The Night Thoughts. This work, consisting of nine nights or meditations, is in blank verse, and consists of reflections on Life, Death, Immortality, and all the most solemn subjects that can engage the attention of the Christian and the philosopher. The general tone of the work is sombre and gloomy, perhaps in some degree affectedly so, for though the author perpetually parades the melancholy personal circumstances under which he wrote, overwhelmed by the rapidly-succeeding losses of many who were dearest to him, the reader can never get rid of the idea that the grief and desolation were purposely exaggerated for effect. In spite of this, however, the grandeur of Nature and the sublimity of the Divine attributes are so forcibly and eloquently depicted, the arguments against sin and infidelity are so concisely and powerfully urged, and the contrast between the nothingness of man's earthly aims and the immensity of his immortal aspirations is so pointedly set before us, that the poem will always make deep impression on the religious reader. The prevailing defects of Young's mind were an irresistible tendency to antithesis and epigrammatic contrast, and a want of discrimination that often leaves him utterly unable to distinguish between an idea really just and striking, and one which is only superficially so and this want of taste frequently leads him into illustrations and comparisons rather puerile than ingenious, as when he compares the stars to diamonds in a seal-ring upon the finger of the Almighty. He is also remarkable for a deficiency in continuous elevation, advancing so to say by jerks and starts of pathos and sublimity. The march of his verse is generally solemn and majestic, though it possesses little of the rolling thundrous melody of Milton, and Young is fond of introducing familiar images and expressions, often with great effect, amid his most lofty bursts of declamation. The epigrammatic nature of some of his most striking images is best testified by the large number of expressions which have passed from his writings into the colloquial language of society, such as "procrastination is the thief of time," "all men think all men mortal but themselves," and a multitude of others. A sort of quaint solemnity, like the ornamentation upon a Gothic tomb, is the impression which the Night Thoughts are calculated to make upon the reader in the present time, and it is a strong proof of the essential greatness of his genius, that the quaintness is not able to extinguish the solemnity.

§ 19 The poetry of the Scottish Lowlands found an admirable representative at this time in ALAN RAMSAY (1686-1758), born in a humble class of life, and who was first a wig-maker, and afterwards a bookseller in Edinburgh. He was of a happy, jovial, and contented humour, and rendered great services to the literature of his country by reviving the taste for the excellent old Scottish poets, and by editing and imitating the incomparable songs and ballads current among the people. He was also the author of an original pastoral poem, the Gentle (or Noble) Shepherd, which grew out of two eclogues he had written, descriptive of the rural life and scenery of Scotland. The complete work appeared in 1725, and consists of a series of dialogues in verse, written in the melodious and picturesque dialect of the country, and interwoven into a simple but interesting love-story. The pictures of nature given in this charming work, equally faithful and ideal, the exact representation of real peasant life and sentiment, which Ramsay, with the true instinct of a poet, knew how to make strictly true to reality without a particle of vulgarity, and the light but firm delineations of character, render this poem far superior in interest, however inferior in romantic idealty, to the Pastor Fido, the Galatea, or the Faithful Shepherdess. The songs he has occasionally interspersed, though they may sometimes be out of place by retarding the march of the events, are often eminently beautiful, as are many of those scattered through Ramsay's voluminous collections in which he combined the revival of older compositions with imitations and originals of his own. It is impossible to overrate the influence which Ramsay exerted in producing, in the following century, the unequalled lyric genius of his great successor, Burns. The treasures of tenderness, beautiful description, and sly humour which Ramsay transmitted from Dunbar, James I., David Lyndsay, and a thousand nameless national bards, were concentrated into one splendid focus in the writings of the author of Tam O'Shanter.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

MINOR POETS.

RICHARD SAVAGE (1696-1743) so well known for Johnson's account of him, was the bastard child of Richard Savage, Earl Rivers and the Countess of Macclesfield. He led a dissipated and erratic life, the victim of circumstances and of his own passions. In his miscellaneous poems the best are The Wanderer and The Bastard.

SIR RICHARD BLACKMORE (1658? 1729), a physician in extensive practice, and knighted by William III., wrote several epic poems of which The Creation, published in 1712 has been admitted into the collections of the British poets. Johnson remarks that "Blackmore, by the unrelentless enmity of the wits, whom he provoked more by his virtue than his dulness, has been exposed to worse treatment than he deserved." And he adds, that "the poem on Creation wants neither harmony of numbers, accuracy of thought, nor elegance of diction."

AMBROSE PHILLIPS (1675-1749), educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, was a friend of Addison and Steele, but was violently attacked by Pope. He wrote three tragedies and some Pastorals which were much admired at the time, but are now deservedly forgotten. "The pieces of Phillips that please best," observes Johnson, "are those which, from Pope and Pope's adherents, procured him the name of Lamby Pambly the poems of short lines, by which he paid his court to all ages and characters from Walpole, the 'steerer of the realm' to Miss Pulteney in the nursery. The numbers are smooth and sprightly and the diction is seldom faulty. They are not much loaded with thought, yet, if they had been written by Addison, they would have had admirers."

GEORGE GRANVILLE LORD LANSDOWNE (1665-1735), some of whose poems are included in the collection of the British Poets, a distinction to which they are hardly entitled. His early pieces were commended by old Waller, whose faults he imitated. Pope designates him as "Granville the polite." His verses to Mira are best known.

ANNE COUNTESS OF WINCHELSEA (d. 1720) The writings of this lady, with all the smoothness and elegance of the age gave indications of the better days that were coming upon English poetry. Between the Paradise Lost and the Seasons, Mr. Wordsworth says that there is not a "single now image of external nature," except in the Windsor Forest of Pope and the Nocturnal Reverie of the poetess. She was the daughter of Sir William Kingsmill, Southampton.

DR ISAAC WATTS (1674-1748) was born at Southampton July 17, 1674 and educated among the dissenters by the Rev. Thomas Howe. In 1693 he became minister of the Independent congregation at Stoke Newington where he laboured, under declining health, until 1712, when he entered the house of Sir Thomas Abney of Abney Park, and continued the guest of the baronet, and afterwards of his widow, preaching occasionally, but chiefly devoting himself to study and literature until his death on the 20th November, 1748. Dr. Watts's talents were of a high order, and his efforts bore him over a most extended field of study. His style is easy and graceful, and his poetic diction gives him a high place among the religious poets of England. His Psalms and Hymns whilst full of imperfections are yet acknowledged to contain some of the finest specimens of praise in the English tongue, whilst his prose writings, embracing theological, philosophical, and polemical works, have exercised an extensive and wholesome influence, especially upon the more popular classes of the community "It was therefore, with great propriety," said Dr Johnson "that in 1728 he received from Edinburgh and Aberdeen an unsolicited diploma by which he became a Doctor of Divinity Academic honours would have more value if they were always bestowed with equal judgment."

His chief works were—Logic, 1725, once used as a text book at Oxford. Astronomy and Geography, 1726 Works for Young Children. Essays and theological writings

CHAPTER XVI.

THE ESSAYISTS

§ 1 JOSEPH ADDISON His life The Campaign Travels in Italy Rosamond The Drummer § 2 His connexion with STEELE life of the latter The Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian § 3 Addison's Cato Made Secretary of State His death His quarrel with Pope. His character § 4 His contributions to the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian § 5 His poetry § 6 SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE § 7 BISHOP ATTERBURY § 8 LORD SHAFTESBURY His Characteristics § 9 LORD BOLINGBROKE His works His connexion with David Mallet. § 10 BERNARD MANDENVILLE His Fable of the Bees § 11 BISHOP BERKELEY His Minute Philosopher and Theory of Vision § 12 LADY MARY MONTAGU Her letters Compared with those of Madame de Sévigné

§ 1 THE class of writers who form the subject of this chapter are identified with the creation of a new and peculiar form of English literature, which was destined to exert a powerful and most beneficial influence on the manners and intellectual development of society. The mode of publication was periodical, and a kind of journals made their appearance, many of them enjoying an immense popularity, combining a small modicum of public news with a species of short essay or lively dissertation on some subject connected with morality or criticism, and inculcating principles of virtue in great, and good taste and politeness in small things. The Essay was first made popular by Montaigne, and the taste for this easy and desultory form of composition became general throughout Europe. It was in England that it was first combined with the principle of journalism. The first establishment of this species of publication is due to Sir Richard Steele, of whom we shall give some account presently. His most illustrious fellow-labourer in the task of disseminating among the higher and middle classes a better tone of manners and a taste for intellectual enjoyments was JOSEPH ADDISON (1672-1719). This great writer and excellent man was the son of Lancelot Addison, a divine of some reputation for learning, and was born in 1672. He was educated at the Charter-house, from whence he passed to Queen's and ultimately to Magdalen College, Oxford, and here he distinguished himself by the regularity of his conduct, the assiduity of his application, and his exquisite taste in Latin verse. Indeed his knowledge of the Roman literature, and especially of the poets, was accurate and profound. His graceful exercises in this elegant branch of letters, and in particular his poems on Punch and Judy (the Machinæ Gesticulantes) and on the Barometer, made him the hope and pride of his College. His first essays in English verse at the age of 22, were some lines in praise of Dryden, followed by an eulogistic poem on the King (William III.) Addison continued his trial-flight, under Dryden's wing, translating the IVth Georgic of Virgil. Lord Somers procured for the rising neophyte a pension of 300*l*, which enabled him to travel in France and Italy, and he gave speedy proof how well he had profited by these opportunities of employing and extending his classical and philosophical acquirements. During his sojourn in France he had an interview with the aged Boileau, then the patriarch of poetry and criticism, and the literary lawgiver not only to his own country but to England. The death of King William deprived Addison of his pension, and he passed some time in London very poor in purse, but exhibiting that dignified patience and quiet reserve which made his character so estimable. In his retirement he was found out by the Ministers, who being desirous that the recent triumphs of Marlborough should be celebrated in verse in a worthy manner, Godolphin was deputed to propose to him that he should write a poem on the immortal campaign which had just terminated in the victory of Blenheim. Addison readily undertook the task, and the unfinished portion, containing the once celebrated comparison of the great leader to the Destroying Angel, being shown to the Ministers, they were in raptures, and the work when it appeared, under the title of The Campaign, was universally pronounced superior not only to Boileau, but to anything that had hitherto been written in the same style. The verses appear to modern readers stiff and artificial enough, but Addison deserves credit for having been the first to abandon the absurd custom of former poets, who praise a military hero for mere personal courage, and paint him slaughtering whole squadrons with his single arm, and to place the glory of a great general on its true basis—power of conceiving and executing profound intellectual combinations, and calmness and imperturbable foresight in the hour of danger. Literary services were at that time often rewarded with political advancement, and from this moment the career of Addison was a brilliant and successful one. He was appointed Under-Secretary of State, and Chief Secretary for Ireland, besides which high posts he at different times received various other places both lucrative and honourable. The publication of the Campaign had been followed by that of his Travels in Italy, exhibiting proofs not only of Addison's graceful and accomplished scholarship, but also of that quiet yet delicate humour, that humane and benevolent morality, and that deep though not bigoted religious spirit which so strongly mark his character and his writings. In 1707 he gave to the world his pleasing and graceful opera or musical entertainment entitled Rosamond, and about this time he in all probability sketched out the comedy of the Drummer, which however was not published till after his death, when it was brought out by his friend Steele, who is said to have had some share in its composition. It is deficient in plot and vivacity of interest, but many of the scenes exhibit much comic power, and the character of Vellum, the old steward, is in particular extremely amusing.

§ 2 It was about this period of his career that Addison embarked in that literary venture first launched by his friend Steele, and with his share in which is connected the most durable element of his fame, and I shall introduce here, incidentally, a short account of Steele himself. SIR RICHARD STEELE (1671-1729) was of Irish origin, but had been the schoolfellow of Addison, upon whom, both at the Charterhouse and afterwards during his short stay at Oxford, he seems to have looked with a curious and most affecting mixture of veneration and love. His life was full of the wildest vicissitudes, and his character was one of those which it is equally impossible to hate and to respect. His heart was inordinately tender, his benevolence deep, and his aspirations lofty, but his passions were strong, and he had so much of the Irish impressionableness that his life was passed in sinning and repenting, in getting into scrapes and making projects of reformation which a total want of prudence and self-control prevented him from executing. Passionately fond of pleasure, and always ready to sacrifice his own interest for the whim of the moment, he caused himself to be disinherited for enlisting in the Horse-Guards as a private, and when afterwards promoted to a commission, astonished the town by his wild extravagance, in the midst of which he wrote a moral and religious treatise entitled the Christian Hero, breathing the loftiest sentiments of piety and virtue. He was a man of ready though not solid talents, and being an ardent partisan pamphleteer, was rewarded by Government with the place of Gazetteer, which gave him a sort of monopoly of official news at a time when newspapers were still in their infancy. He determined to profit by the facilities this post afforded him, and to found a new species of periodical which should combine ordinary intelligence with a series of light and agreeable essays upon topics of universal interest, likely to improve the taste, the manners, and morals of society. It should be remarked that this was a period when literary taste was at its lowest ebb among the middle and fashionable classes of England. The amusements, when not merely frivolous, were either immoral or brutal. Gambling, even among women, was frightfully prevalent, and the sports of the men were marked with a general stamp of cruelty, and of an indulgence in drunkenness which I will venture to call—for I know no more appropriate word—blackguardly In such a state of things intellectual pleasures and acquirements were regarded either with wonder or contempt The fops and fine ladies actually prided themselves on their ignorance of spelling, and any allusion to books was scouted as pedantry Such was the disease which Steele desired to cure, and he determined to treat it, not with formal doses of moral declamation, but with homœopathic quantities of good sense, good taste, and pleasing morality, disguised under an easy and fashionable style In 1709 he founded the Tatler, a small sheet which appeared thrice a week at the cost of 1*d*, each number containing a short essay, generally extending to about a couple of octavo pages, and the rest filled up with news and advertisements The popularity of this new kind of journal was instant and immense, no tea-table, no coffee-house—n that age of coffee-houses—was without it, and the authors writing with the ease, pleasantry, and knowledge of life, rather of men-of the world and men about town, than mere literary recluses, soon gained the attention of the class they addressed. The Tatler continued about a year, when it was remodelled into the far more celebrated and successful Spectator This was carried on upon the same plan, with the difference that it appeared every day, and after reaching 555 numbers was discontinued for a short time, after which it was resumed in 1714, and extended to about 80 numbers more A third journal, the Guardian, was commenced in 1713, and reached 175 numbers, but was strikingly inferior to the Spectator both in talent and success Though master of a singularly ready and pleasant pen, Steele was of course obliged to obtain as much assistance as he could from his friends, and many writers of the time furnished hints or contributions—Swift, Berkeley, Budgell, and others But the most constant and powerful aid was supplied by Addison, who entered warmly into the project, and even while absent in Ireland contributed a very considerable and certainly the most valuable proportion of papers, amounting in the Tatler to about one-sixth, in the Spectator to nearly one-half, and in the Guardian to one-third of the whole quantity of matter Addison's contributions to the Spectator are generally signed with one of the letters composing the word Clio After dissipating more than one fortune, and committing all kinds of extravagant follies, poor Steele, who had thrown himself with his usual headlong zeal into politics, died in great poverty at Carmarthen in Wales, in 1729

§ 3 In 1713 Addison brought out his tragedy of Cato, which, partly from the eminence of its author, partly from the avidity with which the political allusions were caught up and applied by furious parties, and in some degree also, it is but fair to add, from the stately dignity of the declamation, enjoyed an enormous popularity It is a solemn, cold, and pompous series of tirades in the French taste, and he written in scrupulous adherence to the severest rules of the imaginary classical unities, but the intrigue is totally devoid either of interest or probability, and the characters, including Cato himself, are mere frigid embodiments of patriotic and virtuous rhetoric. The declamation, however, is in parts dignified and noble, and the famous soliloquy on suicide, pronounced by the hero, is a passage of much merit, though by no means merit of a dramatic nature. In 1716 Addison married the Dowager Countess of Warwick, to whose son he had in former days been tutor, but this union does not seem to have added much to his happiness. The lady was of a haughty and irritable character, and Addison probably enjoyed far more of that friendly and lettered ease which he so prized, when a poor adventurer haunting the coffee-houses, than when residing under the fantastic roofs of Holland House, to which historic abode he has bequeathed the glory of his presence. Neither in the House of Commons, of which he was for some time a member, nor in Government offices where he performed important duties, was Addison distinguished for eloquence or ready business talents, though there is no reason to believe the common anecdotes which make him incapable of writing an ordinary official paper, but his invincible timidity prevented him from speaking, if ever, at least frequently or with effect, and his powers of conversation, which were extraordinary, are said to have quite deserted him in the presence of more than one or two hearers, and it was necessary, too, that they should be intimate friends, with whom he felt himself perfectly at ease. To conquer his natural diffidence, and to give flow and vivacity to his ideas, Addison is said, both for conversation and composition, to have had recourse to wine, and this is almost the only defect with which his otherwise almost perfect character can be reproached. In making the accusation we must not forget that excessive drinking was rather the fashion than regarded as the vice of the age in England.

In 1717 Addison reached the highest point of his political career he was made Secretary of State, and in this eminent position he exhibited the same liberality, modesty, and genuine public spirit that had characterized his whole life. Nothing is more honourable to him than that, in an age when political struggles were carried on with the most unscrupulous perfidy and intolerant violence, he should never have been induced, either by interest or cowardice, to desert his friends who might be ranged under opposing banners, and in his controversies, which he actively carried on principally in the journals entitled the Freeholder and the Examiner, he never departed from a tone of candour, moderation, and good breeding which he was almost the first to introduce into political discussion. Of this noble feature in his character, his fidelity to his old personal friendship with Swift, in spite of the latter's apostasy and defeat, is a striking example. He did not retain his post of Secretary of State for a long period he soon retired, with a handsome pension of 1500*l.* a year, and determined to devote the evening of his days to the composition of an elaborate work on the evidences of the Christian religion. In this task he was interrupted by death, which cut short his career in 1719. One of the most interesting literary events in his life is his quarrel, or rather misunderstanding, with Pope. The latter, who was of a singularly malignant and insincere nature, suspected Addison of being jealous of his fame, and of employing, under the mask of friendship, disingenuous arts to depreciate his works. He particularly made use of a natural source of misunderstanding, really arising out of Addison's extreme delicacy, to accuse him of unfair conduct respecting his translation of the Iliad, of which Addison's friend Tickell had also translated a portion, and taken his advice respecting it; moreover he alleged that Addison, in dissuading any alteration in the first sketch of the Rape of the Lock, had been actuated by unworthy motives of envy and jealousy. But whoever knows the characters of the two persons must feel convinced that the whole tenor of Addison's life and conduct was such as to rebut these accusations, while the details of Pope's career are irresistible arguments in favour of his meanness, his irritable vanity, and his irrepressible spirit of intrigue. His enmity to Addison, however, produced one of the finest and most finished passages of his works, the unequalled lines drawing the character of Atticus, and unquestionably meant for Addison. Of all the accusations so brilliantly launched against him, Addison might plead guilty to none save the very venial one of loving to surround himself with an obsequious circle of literary admirers, but all the blacker portions of the portrait are traceable to the pure malignity of the venomous but sparkling satirist. The character of Addison seems to have approached, as near as the frailties and imperfections of our nature will allow, to the ideal of a perfectly good man. In him indulgence in detail did not exclude severity of principle, and tolerance and fervour were united in his religious sentiments. Everybody knows the story of his sending for the young Earl of Warwick, his former pupil, when on his death-bed, and telling him that he had asked his presence that he might see how a Christian can die. The scene must have made a deep impression, even upon that wild and worthless reprobate, who was the scandal of his time for his profligate adventures.

§ 4. Of the works of this admirable man and excellent writer, it is the prose portion which gives him the right to the very high place he holds in the English Literature of the eighteenth century, and among the prose works, almost exclusively those Essays which he contributed to the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian. The immense fertility of invention displayed in these charming papers, the variety of their subjects, and the singular felicity of their treatment, will ever place them among the masterpieces of fiction and of criticism. The variety of them is indeed extraordinary, and though we know that the primary hints for some of them may have been given by Swift, yet enough, and more than enough, remains to testify to the richness and inventiveness of Addison's own genius. These papers are of all kinds—sometimes we have an apologue like the Vision of Mirza, sometimes the Transmigrations of the Monkey, or the judgment of women in Hades, at other times we have calm and yet fervent religious musings on the starry heavens or in Westminster Abbey, then a playful mock criticism, or a description of Mr Penkethman, the Puppet-show, or the Opera, then a noble appreciation of the half-neglected grandeur of Milton, or the rude energetic splendour of the old ballad of Chevy Chase. Nothing is too high, nothing too low, to furnish matter for amusing and yet profitable reflection—from the patched and cherry-coloured ribbons of the ladies, to the loftiest principles of morality and religion, everything is treated with appropriate yet unforced appositeness. Addison was long held up as the finest model of elegant yet idiomatic English prose, and even now, when a more lively, vigorous, and coloured style has supplanted the neat and somewhat prim correctness of the eighteenth century, the student will find in Addison some qualities that never can become obsolete—a never-failing clearness and limpidity of expression, and a singular appropriateness between the language and the thought. Like the Pyrrha of Horace, the style of this author is simplex munditiis. The age of the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian was the age of clubs in England, and Steele, in order to give vivacity and individuality to his journals, supposed that they were edited by some imaginary person, the philosophic spectator of the gaieties and follies of society, some Isaac Bickerstaff, or some short-faced gentleman. None of these are of much felicity, except the invention of the Club in the Spectator, consisting of representatives of the chief classes of town and rural society. Thus we have Sir Andrew Freeport as the type of the merchants, Captain Sentry of the soldiers, Sir Roger de Coverley of the old-fashioned country-gentlemen, and Will Honeycomb of the men of fashion and pleasure—while linking them all together is Mr Spectator himself, the short-faced gentleman, who looks with a somewhat satirical yet good-humoured interest on all that he sees going on around him. In the conception and impersonation of these characters, which were in all probability first thought of by Steele, there is nothing very happy or very extraordinary, with the exception of the inimitable personage of Sir Roger de Coverley, and the adventures and surroundings of the worthy old knight. It is a perfect finished picture, worthy of Cervantes or of Walter Scott, and the manner in which the foibles and the virtues of the old squire are combined is a proof that Addison possessed humour in its highest and most delicate perfection. The account of Sir Roger's visit to London, of his conduct at the Club, of his expedition by water to Westminster Abbey, of his remarks on the statues and curiosities he sees there, is the perfection of tender, delicate, loving humour. and Mr Spectator's description of his visit to the old provincial magnate in his Gothic Hall, his exhibition of his picture-gallery, his behaviour at church and upon the bench of the quorum, his long-standing amour with the widow, and the inimitable sketches of his dependents, the chaplain, the butler, and Will Wimble, the poor relation—all these traits of character and delicate observation of nature must ever place Addison very high among the great painters of human nature.

§ 5 Addison's poetry, though rated very high in his own time, has since fallen in public estimation to a point very far below that occupied by his prose. His Latin productions are remarkable for their elegance and a classic purity of turn and diction, and they show very great address in that difficult department in the art of the modern imitator of ancient verse, the rendering in graceful and idiomatic Latinity ideas and objects purely modern. Nevertheless, Addison's Latin poetry, like that of all moderns, labours under the fatal defect of being after all but a skilful cento, and an artificial reproduction of thought in a language which was not the real language of the writer. The songs in Rosamond are very pleasing and musical, and, had Addison continued to write in that manner, he would undoubtedly have left something which rival authors would have found it very difficult to surpass. Perhaps the portion of his poetical works which is destined to survive longest the dangers of complete oblivion is his Hymns, which not only breathe a fervent and tender spirit of piety, but are in their diction and versification stamped with great beauty and refinement. The verses beginning, "When all Thy mercies, O my God," and the well-known adaptation of the noble psalm, "The Heavens Declare the Glory of God," derive, at least, as much of their effect from the sincere worship of a devout mind, of which they are the eloquent outpourings, as they do from any merely literary merits, though the latter are far superior to what is found in the general run of religious verse. The earlier and more ambitious poems of Addison, even including the once-lauded Campaign, have little to distinguish them from the vast mass of regular, frigid, irreproachable composition which was poured forth under the influence of Pope and the Classical school, when a certain refined mediocrity could be attained by a practice little better than mechanical, and when, of course, such mechanical address was fatal to the existence of any vigorous or original creation.

§ 6 The name of SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE (1628-1698) has already occurred in connection with the early life of Swift, who was for some time his dependant. He played an important part in the political and diplomatic history of the reigns of Charles II and William III, and in particular negotiated with the great and good De Witt the treaty of alliance by which England, Holland, and Sweden opposed a barrier to the encroaching ambition of France. In middle life he retired from that active political life for which his timidity and selfishness, as well as his self-indulgent habits and weak health, unfitted him during a stormy and factious period, and amused himself, in his villa at Sheen, and afterwards at his lovely retreat of Moor Park, in Surrey, with gardening and elegant and somewhat dilettante literary pursuits. He produced a number of easy and graceful though superficial Essays, which were extravagantly lauded at a time when the rank of a writer much increased the public admiration of his works, but which are now read with interest principally on account of their easy good sense, their pleasing reflections on nature, and the agreeable and gentlemanly style in which they are written. He took part in the famous controversy suggested by the publication of the spurious Letters of Phalaris, but which had its origin in a discussion respecting the relative superiority of the Ancients or the Moderns, and he was treated by Bentley, not, indeed, with contempt, but with less respect than his contemporaries were in the habit of paying to the statesman and ambassador who condescended to enter the arena of literature. His writings upon this subject exhibit a degree of childish ignorance and presumption that would have warranted much more severe treatment at the hands of the great scholar, whose profound and accurate knowledge settled the question which his wit and pleasantry had so much enlivened.*

§ 7 No name, among the brilliant circle which surrounded Pope and Swift, is more remarkable than that of BISHOP ATTENBURY (1662-1732). A Tory and Jacobite of the extreme Oxford type, he played a prominent part, both on the political and literary scene. He was a man of great intellectual activity, of considerable, though by no means profound learning, and of a violent, imperious, and restless temper. He took an active part in the controversy between Boyle and Bentley, and was for a time considered, by the people of fashion who knew nothing of the subject, to have completely demolished the dull, ill-bred Cambridge pedant. He was the principal author of the reply written in the name of Boyle, whose tutor he had been at Christ Church. Of this great and illustrious college Attenbury was for some time dean, but his violent and overbearing spirit, as well as his extravagant Tory opinions, soon excited general confusion and dispute. He was in 1713 raised to the see of Rochester, and became conspicuous not only as a controversialist, but for the force and eloquence of his speeches in Parliament. Though he had solemnly sworn to conform to the Protestant and Hannoverian dynasty upon which the throne was now settled, he began, in disgust at the coldness and suspicion with which the Court regarded him, to engage in that secret and treasonable correspondence with the party of the exiled Stuarts, that ultimately caused his well-merited fall. He had been known as an ardent favourer of the project for reinstating the Pretender at the death of Queen Anne, and in 1722 he was, by a Bill of Pain and Penalties, attainted, of treasonable practices, deprived of his bishopric, and condemned to exile. He resided first at Brussels, afterwards at Paris, and ultimately at Montpellier, and continued to show his attachment to the hopeless cause of the exiled family, though he refused an invitation to Rome, where the Pretender was residing. His conduct throughout appears to have been disingenuous, if not treacherous, in the highest degree. The private and personal side of Atterbury's character is far more attractive and respectable than his public conduct. His friendship for Pope was tender and sincere, and he was not only the great poet's most affectionate companion, but guided him with wise and valuable literary counsel. His fondness, too, for his daughter is a redeeming trait in his feverish and unhappy life, and there are few stories more pathetic than her hasty journey to receive her father's blessing, to take the sacrament from his hand, and to die in his embrace. His taste in literature appears to have been sound, and the intense admiration he always showed for the genius of Milton is the more honourable to his judgment, as his extreme Tory opinions must have made it difficult for him to sympathise with the Puritan and Republican poet.

* For a full account of this controversy, see Notes and Illustrations (B) at the end of this chapter.

§ 8 LORD SHAFTESBURY (1671-1713), grandson of the famous chancellor, who was the friend and patron of Locke, himself enjoyed the tuition of that great and excellent man. His political and private conduct afford a striking contrast to the factionsness and profligacy of the chancellor, and his literary reputation, though now become comparatively obscure, stood very high both as a moralist and metaphysician, and also as an elegant and classical model of English prose. His collected works bear the title of Characteristics, and may still be read with interest. Shaftesbury's style is refined and regular, though somewhat ambitious and finical, but he sometimes, as in his dialogue entitled the Moralists, rises to a lofty height of limpid eloquence, reminding the reader of the Platonic manner. His delineations of characters show much acuteness and observation, and have obtained for him the honour of comparison with La Bruyère, to whose neat antithetical mode of portrait-painting the thoughts and language of Shaftesbury bear no inconsiderable resemblance. As a writer on ethics he is remarkable for having strongly insisted on the existence in human nature of a distinct moral sense, enabling us to distinguish almost instinctively between good and evil actions. He is indeed by some considered the discoverer of this principle, antagonistic to those reasoners who maintain that the difference between virtue and vice is only relative and experimental.

§ 9 HENRY ST JOHN, VISCOUNT BOLINGBROKE (1678-1751) presents a strong contrast to the last-mentioned writer. His career as a statesman and orator was meteoric, and he astonished his age with the splendour and versatility of his talents. In early life he was notorious for his dissipation, but, addicting himself to politics, he became celebrated for his eloquence as a speaker and his vivacity as a party-writer. He was a member of the brilliant coterie of Pope and Swift, and was joined in the administration with Harley. The collision between his ardent and flighty character and the slow and plodding nature of his colleague produced a rupture which all the efforts of Swift could not heal, and on the death of Queen Anne, Bolingbroke, who had engaged in treasonable correspondence with the Court of St. Germain, was obliged to go into exile to escape the dangers of a formal impeachment. He had rendered himself odious to the nation by his share in the unpopular Treaty of Utrecht. In France he actually entered the service of the Pretender, but was soon dismissed through intrigue, and on receiving a pardon in 1723 returned to England, when he again made himself conspicuous for the virulence with which he opposed Walpole. He again retired to France for some time, and amused the declining years of life in the composition of many political, moral, and philosophical essays. One of these, the Idea of a Patriot King, he gave in MS. to Pope, and affected great anger when he discovered, after the poet's death, that the latter had caused a large impression to be printed, contrary to a solemn promise. Of his other works, his Letter to Sir William Windham in defence of his political conduct, and his Letters on the Study and Use of History, are the most important. The language of Bolingbroke is lofty and oratorical, but the tone of philosophical indifference to the usual objects of ambition generally strikes the reader as artificial and affected. It was to Bolingbroke that Pope addressed and dedicated the Essay on Man, and some of the not very orthodox positions maintained in that poem were borrowed from his brilliant writings, the poet being too unfamiliar with such speculations to be always able to distinguish the results to which they logically led, and Pope was indebted to the vigorous sophistry of Warburton, by which they were, in appearance at least, reconciled with orthodoxy. Bolingbroke's writings against revealed religion were bequeathed by him to his friend DAVID MALLETT, the publisher and an unbeliever, who brought them out, together with Bolingbroke's other works, in 1754. Mallet, who died in 1765, was himself an author, but is now chiefly known by his Ballads, of which William and Margaret is the most striking and beautiful. It was to Mallet's house that Gibbon was taken by his father, when he had embraced Catholicism at Oxford, with the view of weaning him from his new faith.

§ 10 A similarly irreligious tendency is objected to the essays of BERNARD MANDEVILLE (1670-1733), a physician and voluminous writer, remarkable for the boldness of his theories and the vivacity with which he supported them. His most celebrated work is the Fable of the Bees, a poem with notes, in which he endeavours to prove that private vices may be public benefits, or, in other words, that the play of human passions and propensities, however immoral or flagitious some of them may be in the relations between man and man, works unconsciously and harmoniously towards the welfare of that complex body which we call society. In this theory there is undoubtedly much that is true, for the limits between virtue and vice are so fluctuating, when viewed in a general or social point of view, that the suppression of what is beyond the middle line on the one side would be as fatal to the existence of society, nay of humanity itself, as the annihilation of what is beyond it on the other. Society would be as inconceivable without the existence of vice, as it would be impossible without the existence of virtue.

§ 11 The chief opponent of Mandeville was the accomplished and almost ideally virtuous BISHOP BERKELEY (1684-1753), equally famous for the theocratic benevolence of his character and the acuteness of his genius. His mind was ever full of projects for increasing the virtue and happiness of his fellow-creatures, and the Utopian character of some of these plans only proves the intensity of his philanthropic humanity. One of them was the establishment of a sort of missionary college in the Bermudas, for the purpose of converting and civilizing the Carib savages. He was made Bishop of Cloyne in Ireland, and presents one of the rare instances of a prelate, out of pure love for his flock and an unaffected contentment with his lot, obstinately refusing any further promotion. His writings are exceedingly numerous, and embrace a wide field of moral and metaphysical discussion. He is one of the most brilliant, as well as one of the earliest maintainers of the extreme spiritualistic theory, and thus in some degree an opponent of Locke. His celebrated argument that we have no more grounds for doubting the existence of spirit than we have for denying the existence of matter has been perverted or exaggerated by people who talk loosely into a supposition that he argued against the qualities of matter, such as weight, hardness, &c.

In investigating the very obscure and arduous question of the nature of that evidence upon which we base our convictions of material objects external to and independent of ourselves, he has shown to how much abuse that conviction is liable when once we apply the evidence to the establishment of a metaphysical proof. Berkeley frequently wrote in the form of dialogue, which indeed, as the great examples of Plato and Cicero prove, is well adapted to the purpose of philosophical discussion. and one of the most characteristic and popular of his works is entitled The Minute Philosopher. In the connexion between the physical and metaphysical branches of investigation, Berkeley's writings occupy an important place: thus his Theory of Vision established several valuable facts, and drew conclusions from several striking phenomena, concerning that subtle subject. In all his arguments his aim was to refute the materialist theories, but in his eagerness to do this he has sometimes involuntarily struck at the very root of those notions which are indispensable to all reasoning, as when he describes ideas as something foreign to or independent of the mind, whereas the only conceivable mode of accounting for the existence of ideas is to suppose that they are states or modifications of the mind, or rather impressions, more or less permanent, made upon the thinking faculty itself.

§ 12 The last author whom I shall mention in the present chapter is LADY MARY MONTAGU (1690-1762), the most brilliant letter-writer of this period, when Pope and many other distinguished men of letters assiduously cultivated the epistolary form of composition. She was the daughter of the Duke of Kingston, and celebrated, even from her childhood, as Lady Mary Pierrepont, for the vivacity of her intellect, her precocious intellectual acquirements, and the beauty and graces of her person. Her education had been far more extensive and solid than was then usually given to women: her acquaintance with history, and even with Latin, was considerable, and her studies had been in some degree directed by Bishop Burnet. She was, even as a clever and beautiful child, the pet and darling of the accomplished Whig society of the day, and she has recorded the intense delight she felt at the admiration of the members of the Kit-cat Club, by whom she was elected a toast. In 1712 she married Mr Edward Wortley Montagu, a grave and saturnine diplomatist, with whose character the sprightly and airy woman of fashion and literature could have had nothing in common. She accompanied her husband on his embassy to the court of Constantinople, and described her travels over Europe and the East in those delightful Letters which have given her in English literature a place resembling that of Madame de Sevigné in the literature of France. Lady Mary was the first traveller who gave a familiar, picturesque, and animated account of Oriental society, particularly of the internal life and manners of the Scraglio, to which her sex and her high position gave her unusual facilities of access. She returned from her travels in 1718, and separating, with mutual consent, from her husband, again went abroad, and resided in Italy till his death. This portion of her life embraced a period from 1739 to 1761. She then returned to her native country, where she died in the following year. Her family life, not only with relation to her husband, but still more so with regard to her only son, was uncomfortable and unhappy. The latter was a man whose talents were considerable, but whose vices and eccentricities were such as to justify the supposition of madness, and his career was one of the most extraordinary adventure and singularity. Lady Mary, however, was of a cold and unimpressionable nature, and seems to have borne her private misfortunes with philosophical equanimity. She was perhaps in some degree indemnified for the pain her son's conduct gave her, by the affection of her daughter, for whom she probably felt as much tenderness as she had to bestow, and to whom some of her liveliest and most amusing letters are addressed. Admirable common sense, observation, vivacity, extensive reading without a trace of pedantry, and a pleasant tinge of half-playful sarcasm, are the qualities which distinguish her correspondence. The style is perfection: the simplicity and natural elegance of the high-born and high-bred lady, combined with the ease of the thorough woman of the world. The moral tone, indeed, is far from being high, for neither the character nor the career of Lady Mary had been such as to cherish a very scrupulous delicacy. But she had seen so much, and had been brought into contact with so many remarkable persons, and in a way that gave her unusual means of judging of them, that she is always sensible and amusing. I have compared her to Madame de Sévigné, but the differences between the two charming writers are no less striking than the resemblances. In Lady Mary there is no trace of that intense and even morbid maternal affection which breathes through every line of the letters addressed to Madame de Grignan, nor is there any of that fetish-like worship of the court which seems to pervade everything written in the chilling and tinsel atmosphere that surrounded Louis XIV. In wit, animation, and the power of hitting off, by a few felicitous touches, a character or a scene, it is difficult to assign the palm of superiority. Lady Mary was unquestionably a woman of far higher intellectual calibre, and of a much wider literary development. She can reason and draw inferences where Madame de Sévigné can only gossip, though it must be allowed that her gossip is the most delicious in the world. The successful introduction of inoculation for the smallpox is mainly to be attributed to the intelligence and courage of Lady Mary Montagu, who not only had the courage to try the experiment upon her own child, but with admirable constancy resisted the furious opposition of bigotry and ignorance against the bold innovation. She was at one time the intimate friend of Pope, and the object of his most ardent adulation, but a violent quarrel occurred between them, supposed to have originated in a rather warm outburst of admiration on the part of the poet, received by the great lady, as might indeed have been expected when we consider Pope's personal peculiarities, with a contemptuous ridicule which transformed his admiration into the bitterest and most persevering malignity. She was the author of a small miscellaneous collection of poems, exhibiting the ease, regularity, and fluency which generally marked the lighter verses of that day, and also a rather lax and epicurean tone of philosophy, which is sometimes expressed with inimitable felicity. Nothing can more strongly mark the wide difference between the social condition of England in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries than a comparison between the tone and the topics of the admirable Memoirs of Lucy Hutchinson, and the gay, worldly, satirical letters of Lady Mary Montagu. Both the one and the other are types of the female character as modified by the respective influences of the two so strongly-contrasted epochs.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

A.—MINOR ESSAYISTS, &c

EUSTACE BUDGELL (1685-1736) a friend of Addison, who obtained for him many important posts under Government. He contributed to the Spectator all the papers marked with the letter X. Having lost almost his whole fortune in the South Sea scheme and large sums of money in unsuccessful attempts to obtain a seat in Parliament, he became a ruined man. He was accused of having forged in his favour Tindal's Will, a charge to which Pope alludes in the lines—

' Let Budgell charge low Grub Street on my quill,
And write whatever he please,—except my will."

Budgell was supposed to have assisted Tindal in his infidel works. His circumstances having become desperate, Budgell committed suicide, by leaping from a boat into the Thames. In his house was found a slip of paper on which he had written—

What Cato did, and Addison approv'd,
Cannot be wrong."

Budgell published a weekly periodical called the Free

JOHN HUGHES (1677-1720) contributed some papers to the Spectator, Tatler and Guardian. He also published some miscellaneous poems, a tragedy called The Siege of Damascus several translations from the French and an edition of Spenser's Works.

TOM BROWN (d. 1704) and TOM D'URFFY (d. 1723) two facetious but immoral writers frequently mentioned in the lighter literature of the period. D'URFFY wrote several plays of a licentious character. In No 6, of the Guardian Addison solicits his readers to attend a play for D'Urffey's benefit.

B.—BOYLE AND BENTLEY CONTROVERSY

This celebrated controversy, which has been alluded to more than once in the preceding chapters arose out of another upon the comparative merits of the ancient and modern writers. The dispute had its origin in France where Fontenelle and Perrault claimed for the moderns a general superiority over the writers of antiquity. A reply to their arguments was published by Sir William Temple in 1692, in his Essay on Ancient and Modern Learning written in elegant language, but containing much puerile matter, and exhibiting great credulity. Not content with pointing out the undoubted merits of the great writers of antiquity he undervalued the labours and discoveries of the moderns, and passed over Shakespeare, Milton, and Newton without even mentioning their names. A far abler and an impartial estimate of the controversy was made by Wotton in his Reflections upon Ancient and Modern Learning, published in 1694. Wotton (Wotton (1661-1726) had been a lover of archæology, preceptor, and was admitted in his sixth year to Catherine Hall, Cambridge. When he took his degree, at the age of thirteen, he was acquainted with twelve languages. In his Reflections he discusses the subject with great impartiality and learning, and, while assigning to the ancients their real merits, he points out the superiority of the moderns in physical science.

Sir William Temple, in his Essay, among other arguments for the decay of humour, wit, and learning, had maintained "that the oldest books extant were still the best in their kind," and in proof of this assertion had cited the Fables of Æsop and the Epistles of Phalaris. This led to the publication of a new edition of the Epistles of Phalaris by the scholars of Christ Church Oxford (1695). The nominal editor was Charles Boyle, brother of the Earl of Orrery who, in his Præface, inserted a bitter reflection upon RICHARD BENTLEY (1662-1742), the king's Librarian on account of the supposed refusal of the latter to grant him the loan of a MS. in the king's Library. Bentley, who appears to have been unjustly blamed in this matter, soon had an opportunity of retaliation. In the second edition of Wotton's Reflections, published in 1697, Bentley added a dissertation, in the form of letters to his friend in which he proved that the author of the Epistles of Phalaris was not the Sicilian tyrant, but some sophist of a later age. Sir William Temple, who had been greatly annoyed at Wotton's Reflections, was still more incensed at Bentley's Dissertation, and Swift, who then resided in Temple's house, made his first attack upon Bentley in the Stomach of the Book, in which he ridiculed the great scholar in the most ludicrous manner, though the work was not printed till some years after.

At Christ Church the indignation was, if possible, even greater. Bentley's attack was considered an affront to the whole College, and it was resolved to crush, at once and for ever, the audacious assailant. All the strength of Christ Church was enlisted in the contest, but the chief task of the reply was undertaken by Atterbury. He was assisted by George Maltrudge, Robert Friend, afterwards head master of Westminster School, his brother John Friend, and Anthony Alsop. "In point of classical learning," observes the biographer of Bentley, "the joint stock of the academy bore no proportion to that of Leinster, the acquaintance with several of the books upon which they comment appears only to have begun upon that score, and notwithstanding they are indebted for their knowledge of them to their adversary, compounded with his boundless erudition, their learning was that of school boys and not always sufficient to govern them from his ready mistakes. It may be doubted whether Bentley himself, by whom every one of the confused tale had been educated, possessed knowledge which could have qualified him to enter the lists in such a controversy." Not their deficiency in learning they made up by wit and raillery, and when the book appeared in 1694, it was received with extraordinary applause. It was entitled Dr Bentley's Dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris and the Fables of Æsop, mentioned by the Honourable Charles Boyle Esq. It is usually known by the familiar title of Boyle against Bentley, the right Boyle, whose name it bears, had no share in the composition of the work. It was generally supposed that Bentley was silenced and crushed. "All accounts agree in stating the applause which the book met with to have been loud and universal and the general interest excited by this controversy, properly a business of dry learning appears to us almost incredible." This state of public feeling is attributable in some degree to the vein of wit and satire which pervades the Christ Church performance but still more to extraneous causes. The numbers and ability of the members of that distinguished society, who appear to have felt as one man in this common cause, had a powerful influence over public opinion. Again, the extraordinary popularity of Sir William Temple who was represented as rudely attacked, and the interest excited in behalf of Sir Boyle, a young scholar of noble birth, who appeared in the field of controversy as the champion of an accomplished veteran, disposed people at all hazards to favour his cause. Added to this, an opinion which had been industriously circulated of Bentley's incivility and a certain haughty carriage which undoubtedly belonged to him gave a violent prejudice to the public mind. Severe and accurate erudition being rare in those days, people were so far deluded as to believe that on most, if not all points, Boyle was successful. We learn from Bentley himself that the book was at first generally regarded as unanswerable, and this even among his own friends. No body suspected that he would venture to reply, still less that he could ever again hold up his head in the republic of learning; the blow was thought to be fatal, and many persons as usual, eagerly joined the cry against the devoted critic."—(Monk's Life of Bentley 1 p. 109.)

Among the many other attacks made upon Bentley at this period the only one which continues to be known is Swift's Battle of the Books in which he pours forth upon Bentley all the embittered vehemence of his satire.

In the midst of this outcry Bentley remained unmoved. Conscious of his own learning, he could afford to despise the ignorant malice of his enemies, and he set himself resolutely to work to prepare an answer which should not only silence his opponents, but establish his reputation as one of the greatest scholars that ever lived. His work appeared in 1699 under the title of A Dissertation upon the Epistles of Phalaris with an answer to the objections of the Hon Charles Boyle by Richard Bentley D.D.; but it is frequently called Bentley against Boyle. "The appearance of this work is to be considered an epoch not only in the life of Bentley, but in the history of literature. The victory obtained over his opponents although the most complete that can be imagined, constitutes but a small part of the merits of this performance. Such is the author's address that, while every page is professedly controversial, there is embodied in the work a quantity of accurate information relative to history, chronology, antiquities, philology and criticism which it would be difficult to match in any other volume. The cavils of the Boylesians had fortunately touched upon so many topics, as to draw from their adversary a mass of learning, none of which is misplaced or superfluous: he contrives with admirable judgment, to give the reader all the information which can be desired upon each question, while he never loses sight of his main object. Profound and various as are the sources of his learning, everything is so well arranged and placed in so clear a view, that the student who is only in the elementary parts of classical literature may peruse the book with profit and pleasure, while the most learned reader cannot fail to find his knowledge enlarged. Nor is this merely the language of those who are partial to the author, the eminently learned Dodwell who had no peculiar motive to be pleased with a work by which he was himself a considerable sufferer, and who as a non-juror was prejudiced against Bentley's party is recorded to have avowed 'that he had never learned so much from any book in his life.' This learned volume owes much of its attraction to the strain of humour which makes the perusal highly entertaining. The advocates of Phalaris, having chosen to rely upon wit and rally were now made to feel in their turn the consequences of the warfare which they had adopted. So well sustained is the learning, the wit, and the spirit of this production, that it is not possible to select particular parts as objects of admiration without committing a sort of injustice to the rest. And the book itself will long continue to be in the hands of all educated persons as long as literature maintains its hold in society'—(Monk's Life of Bentley 1. pp. 120 123.)

With this dissertation the controversy came to an end, for Bentley's reply was so complete and crushing that it was hopeless to attempt a rejoinder. Sir William Temple died a few weeks before the publication of Bentley's work, and was thus spared the mortification of witnessing the utter discomfiture of his friends.

OTHER WRITERS.

SIR ANDREW FLETCHER OF SALTOBY (1653-1716) was a member of Parliament in the reign of Charles II. and afterwards engaged in the various political events of the reigns of James II., William and Mary and Anne. His writings were chiefly in the form of political tracts. He is the author of the saying, "If a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws of a nation."

MRS. STANLEY (1724), in the reign of Anne, was a dramatist, novelist, and political writer popular, but of no very good character as regards either her life or her writings. She was the author of Atalanta, a political satire of some force, published about 1709. She conducted the Examiner for some time after it had been given up by Swift. She was the daughter of Mr Roger Maudslayi governor of Guernsey.

JONAS SMITH (1643-1737), son of a refugee from H-alant, was brought up at Cambridge, and entered the Church. He was an extensive historian and biographer. He wrote lives of Cromwell 1694, (revised, 1710) and other archbishops, Annals of the Reformation 1709 '11, and was editor of the 'Survey of London' by Stow, besides other works of historical and antiquarian interest. He died at Hackney, aged 94.

LAWRENCE LICHARD (1671-1730). An extensive compiler and careful annalist. His histories of England Home, the Church &c., were valuable collections in their day. Several editions of the Ecclesiastical History have been published.

He was educated at Cambridge, and became archdeacon of Stowe and prebend of Lincoln.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE GREAT NOVELISTS.

§ 1 History of Prose Fiction The Romance and the Novel § 2 DANIEL DEFOE His life and political career § 3 Robinson Crusoe § 4 Defoe's other works § 5 SAMUEL RICHARDSON Pamela, Clarissa Harlowe, and Sir Charles Grandison § 6 HENRY FIELDING His life and publications § 7 Characteristics of his writings Joseph Andrews, Jonathan Wild, Tom Jones, and Amelia § 8 TOBIAS SMOLLETT His life and publications § 9 Characteristics of his novels Compared with Fielding § 10 LAURENCE STERNE Tristram Shandy and the Sentimental Journey § 11 OLIVER GOLDSMITH His life and publications § 12 Criticism of his works The Traveller and The Deserted Village The Vicar of Wakefield The Good Natured Man and She Stoops to Conquer

§ 1 Most departments of literature were cultivated earlier in England than that of Prose Fiction. We have, it is true, the romantic form of this kind of writing in the Arcadia of Sydney, and the philosophical form in the Utopia and the Atlantis, but the exclusive employment of prose narrative in the delineation of the passions, characters, and incidents of real life was first carried to perfection by a constellation of great writers in the eighteenth century, among whom the names of Defoe, Richardson, Fielding, Smollett, Sterne, and Goldsmith, are the most brilliant luminaries. Originally appearing, as do all types of literature, in a poetical form, the rhymed narratives of chivalry poured forth with such inexhaustible fertility by the Trouvères of the Middle Ages, were in course of time remodelled and clothed in prose, and in their turn gave birth to the long, pompous, and unnatural romances of the time of Louis XIII and Louis XIV, which formed the principal light reading of the higher classes. In the Grand Cyrus, the Astrée, and the Princesse de Cleves, a class of writers of whom D'Urfé, Scudéri, Calprenède, and Madame de la Fayette, may be considered the types, imitated in descriptions of the adventures of classically-named heroes, the lofty, heroic, stilted language and sentiments which they borrowed from the Castilian writers. The absurdities and exaggerations of this kind of story naturally produced a reaction, and Spain and France gave birth to the Comic Romance originally intended as a kind of parody of the superhuman elevation and hair-splitting amorous casuistry of the popular fictions. Don Quixote was in this way as much a caricature of Montemayor as the Roman Comique of Scarron of the Clélie, or Grand Cyrus. In England, where the genius of the nation is eminently practical, and where the immense development of free institutions has tended to encourage individuality of character, and to give importance to private and domestic life, the literature of Fiction speedily divided into two great but correlative branches, to which our language alone has given specific and distinct appellations—the Romance and the Novel. Both these terms are indeed ultimately derived, like the things they represent, from the nations of the South, the former originally signifying the dialect of the Trouveres and Troubadours, and thence, by a natural transition, that species of narrative fiction which was most abundantly produced in the dialect the second the Novella, Nouvelle, or short amusing tale, of which such a multitude of examples are to be found in the Italian, Spanish, and French literature of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. It will be sufficient merely to mention the Decamerone of Boccaccio and the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles of Marguerite of Navarre. This latter, the lighter or more comic form of narrative, is a type traceable ultimately to the Fabliaux of the old Provençal poets. But in modern English the Romance and the Novel both express varieties of prose and fiction of considerable length and elaborateness of construction. The former word indicating a narrative, the characters and incidents of which are of a lofty, historical, or supernatural tone, while the latter expresses a recital of the events of ordinary or domestic life, generally of a contemporary epoch. It is the latter department in which English writers, from the time of its first appearance in our literature down to the present time, have encountered few rivals and no superiors.

§2 The founder of the English Novel is DANIEL DEFOE (1661-1731), a man of extraordinary versatility and energy as a writer, and one of the most fertile authors of narrative and controversial productions, for his complete works are said to comprise upwards of 200 separate writings. His life was agitated and unfortunate. He was the son of a butcher in London, and by family as well as personal sympathies an ardent Whig and Dissenter. Indeed, he was educated for the ministry in a dissenting sect, but embraced a mercantile career, having at various periods carried on the business of a hosier, a tile-maker, and a woollen-draper. But his real vocation was that of a writer, and the ardour with which he maintained, in innumerable pamphlets, the principles of constitutional liberty, not only distracted his attention from his commercial pursuits, but exposed him, in these evil times, to repeated persecutions from the Government. He earned his devotion to Protestant principles so far, as to join the abortive insurrection under the Duke of Monmouth, though from this danger he escaped with impunity. He was at different times punished on charges of sedition, with all the inhuman brutality of those days, having been exposed in the pillory (on which he wrote a "hymn"), severely fined, and on two occasions imprisoned in Newgate, his confinement on one occasion extending to nearly two years. Nothing, however, could daunt or silence this indefatigable champion of liberty, and he continued to pour forth pamphlet after pamphlet, full of irony, logic, and patriotism. Among the most celebrated of his works in this class are his Trueborn Englishman, a poem in singularly tuneless rhymes, but full of strong sense and vigorous argument, in which he defends William of Orange and the Dutch against the prejudices of his countrymen, the Hymn to the Pillory, and the famous pamphlet The Shortest Way with the Dissenters, in which, to show the folly and cruelty of the recent Acts persecuting the Sectarians, he with admirable sarcasm adopts the tone of a violent persecutor, and advises Parliament to employ the stake, the pillory, and the halter, with unrelenting severity. The mask of irony is so well worn in this pamphlet, that it was at first considered a serious defence of the parliamentary measure, and when the trick was discovered the fury of the dominant party knew no bounds. The purely political career of Defoe was, generally from 1687 to 1715, and it was during one of his imprisonments that he carried on the Review, a literary journal which may be regarded as the prototype of our modern semi-political, semi-literary periodicals. It appeared thrice a week, and was written with great force and ready vigour of language. During the negotiations which preceded the union of Scotland to the British crown, Defoe was employed as a confidential agent in Edinburgh, and acquitted himself with ability. He afterwards published a narrative of that important event. Defoe's mercantile speculations were so unfortunate that he says in one of his poems — and he probably employed the unequalled facility of his pen in fiction, principally as a means of supplying daily bread to his family, to which he was tenderly attached.

"Thirteen times have I been rich and poor,"

§ 3 In 1719 Defoe published the first part of Robinson Crusoe, the success of which, among that comparatively humble class of readers which Defoe generally addressed, was instantaneous and immense. Indeed, if perfect originality in the plan, and the highest perfection in the execution of a fiction be sufficient to establish a claim of creative genius, Defoe must be regarded as a creative genius of no common order. The primary idea of Robinson Crusoe may have been derived from the authentic narrative of Alexander Selkirk, a sailor who had been marroned, as the term then was, by his captain on the uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez where he passed several years in complete solitude. Selkirk, who by a most singular coincidence, was taken off the island by the very same captain—Woods Rogers—who had abandoned him there, published on his return to England an account of his sufferings and adventures. By this narrative he appears to have gradually descended to the condition, if not of a wild beast, at least of a savage very little superior in intelligence, for when discovered he had almost entirely lost the use of language, which he only obtained again after a considerable time. The intense interest of Robinson Crusoe partly arises from the simplicity and probability of the events, the unforeseenness of many of which completely annihilate the reader's suspicion of the truth of what he is perusing, the skill with which Defoe identifies himself with the character of his Recluse, who is always represented as a common-place man, without any pretensions to extraordinary knowledge or intelligence. He is, therefore, just such a person as every reader, ignorant or cultivated, old or young, can thoroughly sympathize with, and can fancy, while reading of his difficulties and embarrassments, setting about remedying them, as he himself would do, under similar circumstances. Thus Robinson Crusoe is never endowed with more ingenuity or forethought than the generality of mankind, and thus, for example, when he cuts down a huge tree and after incredible labour shapes it into a boat, he finds that it is too heavy for him to launch. It is evident that the majority of readers acutely sympathize with this, because ninety-nine out of a hundred feel that they would be likely to commit a similar oversight. It is perhaps somewhat injurious that this book is generally read when we are very young, for the impressions it leaves upon the memory and the imagination, among the strongest that we can recall, are so deep and permanent that we do not return to the work when increased intellectual development would make us better able to appreciate Defoe's wonderful art. The raft, the goats, the dog, cats, and parrots, the palisaded fortification, the cave, the wrecked ships, the circumnavigation of the island, the fishing, turtle-catching, and planting of corn, every scene, every episode, is indelibly fixed upon the mind. It would be difficult to guess how many boys Robinson Crusoe has turned into sailors, or how many projects of living with a faithful Friday in a desert island, have been generated in childish fancies by this incomparable tale. The second part, which the success of the first encouraged Defoe to produce, is manifestly inferior to the first. Indeed the moment the solitude of the island is invaded by more strangers than Friday, the charm is evidently diminished. Scott has well remarked that a striking evidence of Defoe's skill in this kind of fiction is the studiously low key, both as regards style and incidents, in which the whole is pitched. Defoe's object was not to instruct.

but to amuse, to captivate that mysterious faculty by which we identify ourselves with imaginary events, and this he most successfully did by imitating not only the plain, straightforward, unaffected narratives of the old navigators, but their simple idiomatic unadorned diction.

§ 4 Among Defoe's numerous other works of fiction, may be mentioned the Memoirs of a Cavalier, supposed to have been written by one who had taken part in the great Civil War, in which many historical facts are dressed up with that intense personal reality which Defoe knew so well how to communicate, and which made Lord Chatham cite the book as an authentic narrative. A not less remarkable narrative is the Journal of the Great Plague in London, where the imaginary annualist, a respectable London shopkeeper—a character which Defoe assumed with consummate skill, describes the terrible sights of that fearful time. The air of verisimilitude in this book is so complete, that grave medical and statistical writers have quoted it as authentic, and it is only the application of the tests of modern science that have proved it to be a tissue of inventions in which the devastation caused by the scourge is most enormously exaggerated. Nothing can exceed the quiet yet not unpicturesque vividness with which episodes of the city life during the great calamity are set before us, and in some passages, as in the description of the maniac fanatic Solomon Eagle, the Great Plague in Aldgate, and the long line of anchored ships stretching far down the Thames, Defoe rises into a very lofty and powerful strain of description. A number of stories, the Adventures of Colonel Jack, Moll Flanders, Roxana, Captain Singleton, show the same quiet power of imitating reality. They are generally the lives of thieves, robbers, and other off-scourings of society, and were written, I imagine, purely for profit; but Defoe has never pandered to the false taste of his readers by holding up to admiration the characters and exploits of such personages, and has faithfully represented their lives as being for the most part as miserable as they are flagitious. In one remarkable tract he has described the Apparition of one Mrs. Veal to her friend Mrs. Bargrave at Canterbury, and this is one of the boldest experiments ever made upon human credulity. It was composed to help off the sale of a dull book of Sermons, and had the effect of instantly causing the whole edition to quit the bookseller's shelves, for Drelincourt on Death was powerfully recommended by the visitor from another world.

§ 5 If Robinson Crusoe is less a novel than a tale, being excluded, at least in its finer parts, by the solitude of the chief character from that play of human interest which properly constitutes the Novel, SAMUEL RICHARDSON (1689-1761) must be regarded as the real founder of the romance of private life in English literature.

nature His life presents few materials for comment: it was the career of a careful, prudent, industrious tradesman, who raised himself to opulence by the exercise of the most laudable, though somewhat prosaic assiduity. He was far advanced in life—nearly 50 years of age, indeed—before he entered upon that literary path which led him to immense and well-deserved popularity. He was born of very humble rustic parentage, and came to London when a lad to be apprenticed to a printer. In this calling he distinguished himself by so much diligence that in the course of time he was taken into partnership by his employer, and gradually rose to the highest place in his business, being appointed first printer of the Journals of the House of Commons, and then, in 1754, Master of the Stationers' Company, and in 1760 becoming the purchaser of a half share in the lucrative patent office of Printer to the King. Having accumulated an easy fortune, he retired to a pleasant suburban house at Parson's Green, near London, where he passed an honourable old age in literary employment, surrounded by a little knot of female worshippers, whose adulatory incense his intense vanity made him greedily receive. The correspondence and literary remains of Richardson, which have been published, give a curious picture of his timid, sensitive, effeminate character, and of the enervating atmosphere of twaddling flattery with which he loved to surround himself. The works of Richardson are three in number, Pamela, published in 1740, Clariſſa Harlowe, in 1749, and Sir Charles Grandison, in 1753. These three novels are all written upon one plan, that is, the story is entirely told in letters which are supposed to be written by the various persons in the action, a mode of fictitious composition which has frequently been employed since Richardson's time, and which is attended with advantages and disadvantages of a very evident kind. In the first place it gives the author the opportunity of successively identifying himself with his different characters and exhibiting the minutest shades of their feelings and sensations, and this he can do subjectively. On the other hand this method of writing is open to the objection of necessitating a very slow, minute, and painful evolution of the story, and the improbability of any real letters being sufficiently minute and voluminous to detail all that is essential for the reader's understanding of the plot is so great, that it is in general found insurmountable. But the peculiar genius of Richardson is seen rather in the evolution of character by slow and delicate touches of self-betrayal, than by any vigour of description—that is objective description—of persons or events, and, therefore, in spite of the innate improbability attached to a whole story told in letters, he selected the mode best suited to his peculiar genius.

Pamela describes the sufferings, trials, and vicissitudes undergone by a poor, but beautiful and innocent, country girl who enters the service of a rich gentleman. She triumphantly resists all the seductions and all the violence by which he essays to overcome her virtue, and what is still more difficult, the promptings of her own heart in his favour, for Richardson represents her as passionately attached to her unworthy master, to whom, by way of a moral inculcating the reward of virtue, she is ultimately married. The letters in which this story is told are principally written by Pamela herself, and Richardson exhibits throughout the work that profound and wonderful knowledge of the female character, which he is said to have acquired in his boyhood, by being the amanuensis for carrying on the love-correspondence of three young women in humble life. The pathetic power exhibited in Pamela is very great, and is an earnest of that intense mastery over the tender emotions which he afterwards exhibited in his Clarissa Harlowe. Pamela originally sprang from a collection of familiar letters which Richardson, at the request of his publishing firm, had undertaken to write as a manual to improve the style and the morality of the middle classes of readers and while engaged on it he was struck with the happy idea of making his letters tell a continuous story. The success of the tale was prodigious, and we cannot wonder at it when we think of the immense contrast between the nature, reality, and living interest of Pamela and the far-fetched, wiredrawn, impossible caricatures which then formed the only light reading of the world—feeble exaggerations of the already exaggerated conceptions of the old French romances of the seventeenth century. The popularity of Pamela was so great that five editions were exhausted in one year, although this, like all Richardson's works, is extremely voluminous according to our modern ideas, for example, his third romance, Sir Charles Grandison, as originally written, would have filled about a dozen octavo volumes.

Clarissa Harlowe is incontestably Richardson's greatest work. Whether we consider the interest of the story, the variety and truth of the characters, or the intense and almost unendurable pathos of the catastrophe, to which every incident artfully and imperceptibly leads, we must not only accord it a decisive superiority over his other productions, but must give it one of the foremost places in the history of prose fiction. It is the story of a young lady who falls a victim to the treachery and profligacy of a man of splendid talent, and attractions, but of complete and almost diabolical corruption. Though Richardson, both by natural disposition and circumstances, is far more successful in the delineation of female than of male characters, Lovelace, the seducer, is one of the most perfect and finished portraits that literature has to show. There is no better proof of this than the fact that the name has become in all languages, the synonym of the brilliant and unprincipled seducer. This circumstance also gives us a record of the immense popularity which Richardson still enjoys throughout Europe, though its splendour in England has been in some measure eclipsed by later novelists, some of whom address themselves, like Fielding and Scott, more exclusively to national sympathies, whereas Richardson's delineations possess the lasting interest attached to general pictures of human nature. The prevailing tone of feeling in Clarissa is sombre and mournful, and the sufferings of the pure but injured heroine are worked up at the end to a pitch of intensity reminding us of Ford or Webster. The interest in this, as in the other works of Richardson, is generated by the accumulation of a thousand little imperceptible touches, and the characters are elaborated with the slow and painful minuteness of the Dutch printers. The reader finds himself in an atmosphere of trifling, tedious, and artificial details, but the gentle, equable current of passion and incident carries him onward in spite of himself, till he feels its force to be irresistible.

The last work in this famous trilogy is Sir Charles Grandison, in which the author, who never relinquished the idea of incorporating a moral in his fictions, intended to give an ideal portrait of a character which should combine consummate ethical and religious perfection with the graces and accomplishments of a man of fashion. In his three successive novels Richardson essayed to portray three different orders in the social scale: in Pamela the lower, in Clarissa the middle, and in Grandison the aristocratic class of society. But he was, from education and position, totally unacquainted with the real manners and modes of thought and feeling prevalent in the fashionable world, and in describing what he so imperfectly guessed at he fell into the error natural to men of imperfect education and inexperience in the manners of the great world. He is perpetually straining after fine language, and his stiff and laboured expression forms a ludicrous contrast with the really easy unaffected tone of circles, where, as they have no superiors to ape, they are at least free from the vice of vulgar pretension of manner. The characters he wishes to hold up to admiration,—the ultra-perfect Sir Charles, with his eternal bowing and solemn hand-kissing, and the heroine, Miss Harriet Byron, who is in all respects his worthy counterpart,—are of that most insupportable category of people who are expressively though coarsely designated as prigs, a class equally insupportable in fiction and in reality. Indeed the only personages with whom we sympathize in Sir Charles Grandison are those in which some alloy of human weakness tempers their tiresome perfections: thus Clementina, whose madness and despair are delineated with a pathetic force that Fletcher might have been proud to own, is far more interesting than either Richardson, with that feminine turn of disposition which I have noted in him, shows an extreme tendency to dwell upon long and minute description, and Hazlitt tells a pleasant story that he had been disposed to murmur at about a dozen pages being devoted to the wedding clothes of Sir Charles and his bride, till he found that a young lady had actually copied out the whole passage as one of the most striking episodes of the story. It is said that Richardson consulted a great lady as to the tone and language of high life, and that she found so many errors and inconsistencies that he abandoned in despair the hope of correcting them. In patient analysis of the human mind and passions, particularly in the female sex, in a tendency to accumulate minute incident and microscopic description, and in a sickly and morbid tone of sentiment there is considerable resemblance, allowing, of course, for differences of nation and of age between Richardson and Balzac, nor is Christina an unworthy rival of the enchanting portrait of Eugène Grandet.

§ 6 The second great name among the novelists of this period is that of HENRY FIELDING (1707-1754), qualified by Byron, with extreme but hardly undeserved praise, "the prose Homer of human nature." In his personal character, as well as in his literary career, in everything, indeed, but the power of his genius, he was the exact opposite of Richardson. He was descended from the illustrious house of Denbigh, itself an offshoot from the counts of Habsburg, and his father was General Fielding, a man of fashion, ruined by his extravagance. The novelist was born in 1707, and received his education first at Eton, and afterwards at the University of Leyden, whither he went, like many young men of fashion, to study the law. His father dying, with his affairs in inextricable confusion, he returned to England in absolute want of money, and though he nominally inherited an income of 200*l*. a-year, he found himself dependent upon his own resources for a livelihood. Of gay and festive inclinations, a favoured guest among men of pleasure and enjoyment, he naturally betook himself to the stage, and at the age of 20 became a dramatic author, and during the next nine years lived by the stage. He produced a considerable number of pieces, now almost forgotten, which show that his talent was not specially adapted to the theatre. Indeed it seems an established fact that great writers of narrative fiction rarely succeed on the stage. The only exceptions I can remember to this rule are the cases of Cervantes and Le Sage, while the examples of Walter Scott and a multitude of others prove the universality of the principle. The dramatic works of Fielding constitute a large portion of his writings, but none of them either retain possession of the stage or attract the curiosity of the reader. Always passionately fond of gaiety and joyous company, Fielding struggled on, and married a lady of great beauty and excellence, Charlotte Cradock, with whom he received a portion of about 1500l. This he dissipated in a very short time, for he was of an extremely sanguine and volatile temper, and was assisted in running through his little fortune by the desperate project of speculating in the Haymarket Theatre, which completed the ruin of his affairs. He then resumed the study of the Law in the Temple, and was called to the bar in 1740. His career as dramatic author had closed with his entrance at the Temple in 1737, and he eked out his means by journalistic work. In The Champion, issued three times a week, Fielding during 1739 and 1740 wrote constantly on social and literary topics, and it was about this period of his life (1742) that he struck out that vein of humorous writing in which he never had, nor is ever likely to have, a rival. His first novel was Joseph Andrews, which was in some sense intended as a parody or caricature, ridiculing the timid and fastidious morality; the shop-keeper tone and the somewhat preaching good-boy style of Pamela, just then in the full blaze of success. Richardson's jealous vanity could never forgive the wicked wit of Fielding in ridiculing his heroine, and he shows in all his correspondence not only an intense soreness, but an absolute inability to appreciate Fielding's genius. Like the Roman Comique of Scarron, which, though written to laugh at a particular class of works, became the prototype of a new and original department of Fiction, Fielding's novel at once received the honour due to a great original creation, and in pretty rapid succession he produced his Journey from this World to the Next, a Lucianic allegory, exhibiting much humour and wisdom, and his truly remarkable satirical tale, The Life of Jonathan Wild the Great. In 1748 he was appointed to the laborious and then far from respectable post of a London police magistrate, a function in which he showed distinguished zeal and intelligence and which was useful to his literary glory by giving him opportunities of observing the manners of the lowest of the people. He had been engaged for some time previously in carefully composing the profoundest of his works, the incomparable Tom Jones (1749), followed, after a brief interval, by Amelia, in which he unquestionably intended to portray some of his own follies and irregularities, but with the principal object of paying a tribute to the virtues and affection of his wife. He lost her in 1743, and four years later supplied her place by marrying her maid, with whom he had "frequently bewailed the angel they had lost." In spite of the seeming oddity of this second choice, she made him a prudent and loving partner, and an excellent mother to his children. Fielding's health was now completely ruined by labour and excesses; he was attacked with dropsy, and ordered to try a warmer climate. He sailed for Lisbon in 1754, and after passing a short time died in that city, and was buried in the Protestant cemetery there in the October of the same year

§ 7 The qualities which distinguish Fielding's genius are close and accurate observation of character, and an extraordinary power of deducing the actions and expressions of his personages from the elements of their nature, a constant sympathy with the vigorous unrestrained characters, in all ranks of society, but especially in the lowest, which he loved to delineate. With the vast and motley field of English society, so strongly marked at that time, he was minutely acquainted, and his spirit of analysis, at once learned and picturesque, delighted in the reproduction of the oddities and eccentricities of man. He is intensely English in his subject as in his mode of treatment. Hogarth himself is not more powerfully national painter and novelist exhibit the same direct and practical vigour, which however is always compatible with an appreciation of the subtlest shades of character. In the construction of his plots he is masterly. That of Tom Jones is perhaps the finest example to be met with in fiction, of a series of events probable yet surprising, each of which inevitably leads to the ultimate catastrophe. He combined an almost childish delight in fun and extravagantly ludicrous incident, with a philosophic closeness of analysis of character and an impressive tone of moral reflection, the latter often masked under a pleasant air of satire and irony. His novels breathe a sort of fresh open-air atmosphere, a strong contrast to the close artificial medium which pervades the romances of Richardson. When we are reading the latter we seem to be surrounded with the close breathless atmosphere of a city parlour; taking up Fielding is like emerging into the bracing sun-shiny air of a high-road. A large proportion of the scenes and adventures in Fielding take place in inns and in the course of travelling; this is to be explained by the much greater proportion of time then passed on the road, when men proceeded from place to place on foot, on horseback, in the humble waggon, or in the aristocratic coach and six, and were consequently brought more closely and frequently into contact with the miscellaneous crowd of travellers.

Joseph Andrews was originally written as a kind of parody upon Pamela, and for this purpose the chief character was represented as the brother of Richardson's heroine, and Pamela's virtuous resistance to seduction was transferred, with great humour, to the person of a young footman. Joseph, on being expelled from the household of Squire Booby, in consequence of the jealous rage of his mistress—the "spretæ injuria formæ"—wanders about England in company with his friend and humble companion Parson Adams, one of the richest, most humorous, and truly genial conceptions of this great painter of character. Adams's learning, simplicity, and courage, together with his innumerable and always consistent oddities, make him as truly humorous a character as Don Quixote himself. There is no doubt that in the low social estimation, as well as in the ignorance and coarseness of many of his clerical personages, Fielding has faithfully represented the degraded state of the rural clergy at the time when he wrote.

The adventures of Jonathan Wild the Great were intended to be a satire upon the false estimate generally formed of glory, and the whole book is written in a tone of irony. The hero was a real person, originally a thief, housebreaker, and highwayman, and afterwards a spy and secret agent of the police, he became celebrated as a receiver of stolen goods, and after committing a thousand crimes, was most justly hanged. The exploits of this consummate scoundrel are related in a tone of ironical admiration, but though the story contains some powerful and many humorous scenes, the reader becomes weary of the uninterrupted meanness and depravity of the persons and events.

In Tom Jones it is difficult to know what most to admire, the artful conduct of the plot, the immense variety, truth, and humour of the personages, the gaiety of the incidents, or the acute remarks and reflections which the author has plentifully interspersed, in most cases in the introduction to his chapters. The character of Squire Western, the type of the violent, brutal rural magnate of those days, is one which remains for ever fixed on the memory, and many of the inferior personages might be cited, each marked, ineffaceably though often lightly, with the stamp of truth and nature. Tom Jones himself, though generous and warm-hearted, is hardly worthy of the good and beautiful Sophia Western, one of the most exquisite heroines of real life ever drawn in fiction. Fielding's standard of moral self-restraint and chastity for men was not high, and the time when he wrote was remarkable for the low tone of manners and sentiment—perhaps the lowest that ever prevailed in England, for it was precisely a juncture when the romantic spirit of the old chivalric manners was extinguished, and before the modern standard of refinement was introduced.

The interest of Amelia is entirely domestic and familiar. the errors and repentance of Captain Booth, and the inexhaustible love and indulgence of the heroine, are strongly contrasted, but we never can get rid of the conviction that Booth is but a sorry scamp, and are hardly compensated for our indifference to the principal character by the extraordinary vividness, nature, and reality of the subordinate ones. Fielding had little or no power over the pathetic emotions, there are, however, in this novel several episodes and strokes of character which are touching, and exhibit that peculiar and essential characteristic of truly humorous conceptions, namely the power of touching the heart while exciting the sense of the ludicrous. It is a curious contradiction that while Richardson, a man of the humblest birth and career, should have chiefly described aristocratic life, Fielding, the man of fashion and of lofty origin, should have preferred to paint the manners of the lowest of the people. Fielding, in spite of much coarseness and indecency, is fundamentally sound in his moral principles, though he excuses, if he does not justify, a considerable degree of laxity. He seems inclined to pardon any escapade, if rendered venial by high spirits, youth, and passion, and accompanied with courage, frankness, and generosity.

§ 8 TOBIAS GEORGE SMOLLETT (1721-1771), descended from an ancient and respectable family in Scotland, was educated, first at Dumbarton, and afterwards at the University of Glasgow. Being totally without fortune he determined to embrace the medical profession, and was apprenticed to a practitioner in Glasgow of the name of Gordon. After remaining a short time in this man's service, the future poet and novelist, then only eighteen years of age, and burning with literary ambition, proceeded to London with the MS. of a tragedy, entitled the Regicide, in his pocket. Failing in his attempt to bring out this work he entered the naval service in the humble capacity of surgeon's mate on board a man-of-war, and was present at the inglorious and unfortunate expedition to Carthage, under the command of Admiral Vernon. Here he had the opportunity of studying the oddities of sea-characters, which he afterwards so admirably reproduced in his fictions, and of learning by experience the atrocious cruelty, corruption, and incompetency which then reigned in the naval administration. He left the service and resided for some time in the West Indies, whence he returned in 1744, and began to unite literary pursuits with the practice of his profession in London. He was the author of several satires and other poetical pieces now forgotten, but in 1748 he began his career of a novelist with Roderick Random, in some respects the most vigorous of his fictions. In the manner and construction of his novels he follows the models of Le Sage and of those Spanish authors, in the style called picaresca, whom Le Sage himself imitated, and he relied for success rather on a lively series of grotesque adventures than on any elaboration of intrigue or deep analysis of character. Peregrine Pickle was published in 1751, and Smollett, meeting with but small success as a physician, now devoted himself to the career of a writer and politician. For the task of controversy he was well qualified by the vigour and readiness of his style, by the ardour of his opinions, and the patriotic elevation of his principles, but he was rash, violent, and impulsive, and more than once changed his side, not from any interested or unworthy motive, but under the influence of his personal feelings. In 1753 he produced his third great romance, The Adventures of Ferdinand, Count Fathom, describing, with a higher moral intention than is usually found in his works, the career of an unprincipled scoundrel, cheat, and swindler. This book forms a sort of counterpart or parallel to Fielding's Jonathan Wild, and is open to the same objections. Two years later this indefatigable worker brought out his translation of Don Quixote, in which he clearly shows himself utterly unable to appreciate the higher, more poetical, and ideal side of the great conception of Cervantes, and has confined himself solely to the grotesque and farcical side of that vast creation. In the year 1759 the violence of Smollett's political opinions brought him in collision with the law, the terrible picture he had given of maladministration in the Navy and his severe strictures on the conduct of Admiral Knowles caused him to be defeated in an action for libel. He was fined 100*l* and imprisoned for three months, during which time he continued the management of the Critical Review in the pages of which the obnoxious strictures had appeared, and in his capacity of literary censor he managed to raise up against himself a whole swarm of angry politicians, writers, and doctors. In 1762 appeared his novel of Sir Lancelot Greaves, a most unfortunate and feeble effort to adapt the plot and leading idea of Don Quixote to English contemporary life. In 1757 Smollett had published his History of England, in which his ardent and partial judgments are no less remarkable than the consummate elegance and calm philosophic spirit which charms in the pages of Hume. In a Tour in France and Italy, which he undertook to divert his grief under the loss of a beloved child, Smollett exhibits a painful and almost ludicrous incapacity to appreciate the beautiful, sublime, or interesting objects he met with. "he travelled from Dan to Beer-sheba, and found all barren." In a now-forgotten tale, The Adventures of an Atom, he attacked Bute, who had formerly been his patron. This is a piece of ferocious temper, which overwhelms with cruel satire not only Bute and the king, but Anson, Mansfield, and Chatham. Smollett's health was now completely broken up through incessant labour and continual agitation, and he was, like his illustrious contemporary, obliged to try the effect of a more genial climate. He resided a short time at Leghorn, and there, in spite of weakness, exhaustion, and suffering, the dying genius gave forth its most pleasing flash of comic humour. This was the novel of Humphrey Clinker, the only fiction in which Smollett adopted the epistolary form, and the most cordial, comic, and laughable of them all. Like Fielding he died and was buried in a foreign land, and two of the most intensely national of our painters of character were doomed, within a few years of each other, to lay their bones under the soil of the stranger.

§ 9 In the structure of his fictions Smollett is manifestly inferior both to Richardson and Fielding—he does not possess the slow but exquisitely logical evolution of the former, or the skilful combination and planning of connected incidents which distinguish the latter. His novels are a series of striking, grotesque, farcical, and occasionally pathetic scenes, which have little other bond of union than the fact of their being threaded, so to say, on the life of a single person. Yet his books are eminently amusing, the reader's attention is kept awake by a lively succession of persons and events, some of which, though they may be coarse and low-lived, are invariably vivid and life-like, while the tendency to florid description and sentimental exaggeration does not deprive others of the charm of freshness and earnestness. The characters in Smollett are extraordinarily numerous and animated, but they are not analysed with the profound psychological anatomy of Fielding—some prominent feature is seized, some oddity is placed in a strong light and exhibited in full development, and the reader asks for nothing more. This external or superficial mode of delineation makes Smollett very careless about maintaining the consistency of his personages. He never scruples to sacrifice that consistency, whether it refer to their bodily or mental qualities, when it stands in his way in placing them under ridiculous points of view—thus Roderick Random is sometimes represented as gawky, ugly, and even mean and cowardly, and at other times as eminently handsome and brave. There can be no doubt that Smollett was frequently in the habit of transferring to his novels real adventures of his own life—thus Random's miseries at school, his apprenticeship with the apothecary, his journey to London, his experiences in the fleet, have the strongest air of being transcripts of reality—many of the persons introduced, and no small proportion of the scenes, as for example the medical examination, and the abominable tyranny and abuses on board ship, were unquestionably drawn from the life. The same may be said of his inimitable and exquisitely varied sailor-characters, from Lieutenant Bowling and Ap Morgan in the first novel, through the rich gallery of oddities in his later works, particularly Commodore Trunnion and Pipes in Peregrine Pickle. Smollett's heroes are generally a little too much of the picaresque, or Lazarillo de Tormès type—they have but little to attract the reader's sympathy, being generally hard, impudent, selfish, and ungrateful adventurers—but in the subordinate persons, and especially in those of grotesque but faithful followers, like Strap or Pipes, Smollett shows a greater warmth of sentiment. His style is lively and picturesque, much more careless than that of Fielding, who occasionally produces passages of considerable length that are noble specimens of English prose, and he allows the fire of his imagination to seduce him into the faults of tawdriness and sentimentality. Many of his most laughable scenes—and such abound in his writings—depend for their effect upon what may be called mechanical humour, blows and kicks and extravagant terrors: but these low episodes are not made the occasion, as they often are in Fielding, of educating profound traits of human character. With the laugh he has excited Smollett's use of them is at an end. In Humphrey Clinker, though running over with fun and grotesque incident, there is a riper and mellowed tone of character-painting than is to be found in his preceding works: the personages of Lismahago and Tibbith Bramble are imitably carried out: the latter is indeed perhaps the most finished portrait in Smollett's whole gallery. This latter novel contains a great deal of what is merely descriptive, being the travelling-journal of the droll and original party whose various letters make up the work, and the modern reader may gather from Smollett's descriptions of the country and the various watering-places in England and Scotland visited during the imaginary tour most curious and interesting details concerning the state of the country and the manners of our forefathers. Smollett, like Fielding, and indeed like most authors of those days, was in the habit, probably in imitation of the practice of Cervantes and the old masters, of occasionally introducing long episodical narratives into the midst of his novels, a most injudicious custom, and equally injurious to the effect of the intercalary tale and of the work in which it was set. Examples of what I mean will be found in the history of the Fair Marcelia in Don Quixote, the absurd and unnatural story of the Man of the Hill introduced into Tom Jones, and the Memoirs of a Lady of Quality, which Smollett is said to have been bribed to insert in one of his novels.

Smollett possessed considerable poetical talents: he wrote the powerful verses entitled the Tears of Scotland, which breathed the patriotic indignation of a generous mind, horrorstruck by the cruelties inflicted by the orders of the Duke of Cumberland after the battle of Culloden. This little poem is equally honourable to the civil courage of Smollett as to his genius, for so free an expression of outraged patriotism was then dangerous, and it is recorded that the poet, when warned of that danger after composing six stanzas of vigorous denunciation, instantly sat down and added a seventh more bitter and stinging than those which had gone before.

§ 10 LAURENCE STERNE (1713-1768) was a brilliant literary comet. His character was as eccentric as his works, both the one and the other being marked by strange inconsistency, equally attractive to the imagination and incompatible with severe principle. He was born in Ireland, but educated, with the assistance of some relations of his mother's, at Cambridge. Entering the Church, he enjoyed, through their interest, considerable preferment in the north, being long held the living of Sutton, to which he afterwards added a prebend's stall in the Cathedral of York, and he was ultimately advanced to the rich living of Coxwold. His private life was little in harmony with his profession. He appears to have been a fanciful, vain, self-indulgent humorist, perpetually at war with the neighbouring clergy, and masking caprice and harshness under a pretence of extreme sensibility. His conduct to his wife was base and selfish. The first two volumes of his novel of Tristram Shandy were published in 1759, and the novelty and oddity of his style instantly raised him to the summit of popularity. Other volumes followed at different intervals, and Sterne became the pet and lion of fashionable London society, where he gratified his morbid appetite for flattery and indulged in a series of half-immoral, half-sentimental intrigues, some of them with married women. He made two tours on the Continent, the first in France, and the second in France and Italy, where he accumulated the materials incorporated in his delightful Sentimental Journey, intended to form a part of his romance, but which is generally read as an independent work. In this book he personates his favourite character Yorick, a mixture of the humorist and the sentimental-observer. The Sentimental Journey, with all its faults of taste and morality, has the merit of breathing a tone of complacency, candour, and appreciation of the good qualities of foreign nations, equally rare and laudable at a time when Englishmen regarded all other countries, and especially France, with the most narrow-minded prejudice and hostility. Sterne's health had always been precarious, he had all his life been consumptive, and the feverish life of London society broke up a constitution naturally sickly. He died alone and friendless in a Bond street lodging-house, attended in his last illness by mercenaries, who are said to have plundered him of such trifles as he possessed—a comfortless and gloomy ending, which he had himself desired.

His works consist of the novel of Tristram Shandy, of the Sentimental Journey, and of a collection of Sermons, written in the odd and fantastic style which he brought into temporary vogue. It is not an easy task to give an intelligible account of the plan, the merits, and the defects of his writings. Tristram Shandy, though nominally a romance in the biographical form, is intentionally irregular and capricious, the imaginary hero never making his appearance at all, and the story consisting of a series of sketches and episodes introducing us to the interior of an English country family, one of the richest collections of oddities that genius has ever delineated. The narrative is written partly in the character of Yorick (Sterne himself), supposed to be a clergyman and a humorist, and partly in that of the phantom-like Tristram, and the most prominent persons are Walter Shandy, a retired merchant, the father of the supposed hero, his mother, his uncle Toby Shandy (a veteran officer), and his servant Corporal Trim. These are all conceived and executed in the finest and most Shaksperian spirit of humour, tenderness, and observation; and they are supported by a crowd of minor yet hardly less individual portraiture—Obadiah, Dr. Slop, the Widow Wadman, Susanna, nay down to the "foolish fat scullion" Mr Shandy, the restless crotchety philosopher, is delineated with consummate skill, and admirably contrasted with the simple benevolence and professional enthusiasm of the unequalled Uncle Toby, a personage belonging to the same category of creative genius as Sancho or as Parson Adams. The characters in Sterne are not delineated descriptively, but rather allusively, and thus the reader incessantly enjoys the pleasure of making out their pleasant and eccentric features, not through the medium of the author, but by himself, as if they were real personages. The conversations, the incidental episodes, all introduce us to the eccentricities and amiable oddities of the persons, and perhaps the very absence of all regular construction, the abrupt transitions, the complete confusion of all order, the exclamations, parenthetical chapters, and the abrupt and interjectional character of the style, contribute to the effect of the whole. In all Sterne's writings there is a great parade of obscure and quaint erudition, which passed off at the time these books appeared, when the elder authors were but rarely studied, as indicative of immense learning, but he is known at present to have been a most unscrupulous plagiarist, pillaging Burton, Rabelais, and the seldom-consulted pages of the old lawyers and canonists. All this, however, tends powerfully to give an original flavour to his style. His humour and his pathos are often truly admirable, and he possesses in a high degree that rare power, found only in the greatest humorists, of combining the ludicrous and the pathetic, but both his humour and his pathos are very often false and artificial, the one degenerating into buffoonery, indecency, and even profligacy in more than a single instance, and the other into a morbid and sickly sentimentality. He is always trembling on the verge of an obscene allusion, and many passages, both in Shandy and the Sentimental Journey, are quite unjustifiable as coming from the pen of a clergyman. In this mixture of pruriency and theatrical sentiment Sterne resembles certain of the most brilliant French authors, and even the rapidity and abruptness of his style cause him to be perhaps the only one of our great humorists who can be adequately translated into French. His episodes, as the often-quoted Story of Le Fever, are related with consummate art and tenderness, but in Sterne—probably from his vanity and deficiency of discrimination—there is no medium between excellence and failure. He is an acute and just observer of the little turns of gesture and expression, and makes his characters betray their idiosyncrasies by involuntary touches, just as men do in real life.

§ 11 The most charming and versatile, and certainly one of the greatest writers of the eighteenth century, is OLIVER GOLDSMITH (1728-1774), whose works, whether in prose or verse, bear a peculiar stamp of gentle grace and elegance. He was born at the village of Pallis in the county of Longford, Ireland, in 1728. His father was a poor curate of English extraction, struggling, with the aid of farming and a miserable stipend, to bring up a large family. By the assistance of a benevolent uncle, Mr. Contarine, Oliver was enabled to enter the University of Dublin in the humble quality of sizar. He however neglected the opportunities for study which the place offered him, and became notorious for his irregularities, his disobedience to authority, and above all for a degree of improvidence carried to the extreme, though excused by a tenderness and charity almost morbid. The earlier part of his life is an obscure and monotonous narrative of ineffectual struggles to subsist, and of wanderings which enabled him to traverse almost the whole of Europe. Having been for a short time tutor in a family in Ireland, he determined to study medicine, and after nominally attending lectures in Edinburgh, he began those travels—for the most part on foot, and subsisting by the aid of his flute and the charity given to a poor scholar—which successively led him to Leyden, through Holland, France, Germany, and Switzerland, and even to Padua, where he boasted, though the assertion is hardly capable of proof, that he received a medical degree. His professional as well as his general knowledge was of the most superficial and inaccurate character. It was while wandering in the guise of a beggar in Switzerland that he sketched out the plan of his poem of the Traveller, which afterwards formed the commencement of his fame. In 1756 he found his way back to his native country, and his career during about eight years was a succession of desultory struggles with famine, sometimes as a chemist's shopman in London, sometimes as an usher in learning-schools, the drudge of his employers and the butt and laughing-stock of the pupils, sometimes as a practitioner of medicine among the poorest and most squalid population—"the beggars in Axe Lane," as he expressed it himself, and more generally as a miserable and scantily-paid bookseller's hack. More than once, under the pressure of intolerable distress, he exchanged the bondage of the school for the severer slavery of the corrector's table in a printing-office, and was driven back again to the bondage of the school. The grace and readiness of his pen would probably have afforded him a decent subsistence, even from the hardly-earned wages of a drudge-writer, but for his extreme improvidence, his almost childish generosity, his passion for pleasure and fine clothes, and above all his propensity for gambling. At one time, during this wretched period of his career, he failed to pass the examination qualifying him for the humble medical post of a hospital mate, and, under the pressure of want and improvidence, committed the dishonourable action of pawning a suit of clothes lent him by his employer, Griffiths, for the purpose of appearing with decency before the Board. His literary apprenticeship was passed in this severe school—writing to order, and at a moment's notice, schoolbooks, tales for children, prefaces, indexes, and reviews of books, and contributing to the Monthly, Critical, and Lady's Review, the British Magazine, and other periodicals. His chief employer in this way appears to have been Griffiths, and he is said to have been at one time engaged as a corrector of the press in Richardson's service. In this period of obscure drudgery he composed some of his most charming works, or at least formed that inimitable style which makes him the rival of Addison. He produced the Letters from a Citizen of the World, the plan of which is imitated from Montesquieu's Letters Persanes, giving a description of English life and manners in the assumed character of a Chinese traveller, and containing some of these little sketches and humorous characters in which he was unequalled, a Life of Beau Nash, and a short and gracefully-narrated History of England, in the form of Letters from a Nobleman to his Son, the authorship of which was ascribed to Lyttelton. It was in 1764 that the publication of his beautiful poem of the Traveller caused him to emerge from the slough of obscure literary drudgery in which he had hitherto been crawling. The universal judgment of the public pronounced that nothing so harmonious and so original had appeared since the time of Pope, and from this period Goldsmith's career was one of uninterrupted literary success, though his folly and improvidence kept him plunged in debt which even his large earnings could not enable him to avoid, and from which indeed no amount of fortune would have saved him. In 1766 appeared the Vicar of Wakefield, that masterpiece of gentle humour and delicate tenderness, in the following year his first comedy, the Goodnatured Man, which failed upon the stage in some measure from its very merits, some of its comic scenes shocking the perverted taste of an audience which admired the whining, preaching, sentimental pieces that were then in fashion. In 1768 Goldsmith composed, as taskwork for the booksellers—though taskwork for which his now rapidly rising popularity secured good payment—the History of Rome, distinguished by its extreme superficiality of information and want of research no less than by enchanting grace of style and vivacity of narration. In 1770 he published the Deserted Village, the companion poem to the Traveller, written in some measure in the same manner, and not less touching and perfect, and in 1773 was acted his comedy She Stoops to Conquer, one of the gayest, pleasantest, and most amusing pieces that the English stage can boast. Goldsmith had long risen from the obscurity to which he had been condemned he was one of the most admired and popular authors of his time, his society was courted by the wits, artists, statesmen, and writers who formed a brilliant circle round Johnson and Reynolds—Burke, Garrick, Beauclerk, Percey, Gibbon, Boswell—and he became a member of that famous Club which is so intimately associated with the intellectual history of that time. Goldsmith was one of those men whom it is impossible not to love, and equally impossible not to despise and laugh at his vanity, his childish though not malignant envy, his more than Irish aptitude for blunders, his eagerness to shine in conversation, for which he was peculiarly unfitted, his weaknesses and genius combined, made him the pet and the laughing-stock of the company. He was now in the receipt of an income which for that time and for the profession of letters might have been accounted splendid, but his improvidence kept him plunged in debt, and he was always anticipating his receipts, so that he continued to be the slave of booksellers, who obliged him to waste his exquisite talent on works hastily thrown off, and for which he neither possessed the requisite knowledge nor could make the necessary researches: thus he successively put forth as taskwork the History of England, the History of Greece, and the History of Animated Nature, the two former works being mere compilations of second-hand facts, and the last an epitomized translation of Buffon. In these books we see how Goldsmith's never-failing charm of style and easy grace of narration compensates for total ignorance and a complete absence of independent knowledge of the subject. In 1774 this brilliant and feverish career was terminated. Goldsmith was suffering from a painful and dangerous disease, aggravated by disquietude of mind arising from the disorder in his affairs, and relying upon his knowledge of medicine he imprudently persisted in employing a violent remedy against the advice of his physicians. He died at the age of forty-six, deeply mourned by the brilliant circle of friends to which his very weaknesses had endeared him no less than his admirable genius, and surrounded by the tears and blessings of many wretches whom his inexhaustible benevolence had relieved. He was buried in the Temple Churchyard, and a monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey, for which Johnson wrote a Latin inscription, one passage of which gracefully alludes to the versatility of his genius: "qui nullum fere scribendi genus non tetigit, nullum quod tetigit non ornavit."

§ 12 In everything Goldsmith wrote, prose or verse, serious or comic, there is a peculiar delicacy and purity of sentiment, tinged, of course, the language and diction as well as the thought. It seems as if his genius, though in its earlier career surrounded with squalid distress, was incapable of being sullied by any stain of coarseness or vulgarity. Though of English descent he had in an eminent degree the defects as well as the virtues of the Irish character, and no quality in his writings is more striking than the union of grotesque humour with a sort of pensive tenderness which gives to his verse a peculiar character of gliding melody and grace. He had seen much, and reproduced with singular vivacity quaint strokes of nature, as in his sketch of Beau Tibbs and innumerable passages in the Vicar of Wakefield. The two poems of the Traveller and the Deserted Village will ever be regarded as masterpieces of sentiment and description. The light yet rapid touch with which, in the former, he has traced the scenery and the natural peculiarities of various countries will be admired long after the reader has learned to neglect the false social theories embodied in his deductions, and in spite of the inconsistency pointed out by Macaulay, between the pictures of the village in its pristine beauty and happiness, and the same village when ruined and depopulated by the forced emigration of its inhabitants, the reader lingers over the delicious details of human as well as inanimate nature which the poet has combined into the lovely pastoral picture of "sweet Auburn." The touches of tender personal feeling which he has interwoven with his description, as the fond hope with which he dwelt on the project of returning to pass his age among the scenes of innocence which had cradled his boyhood, the comparison of himself to a hare returning to die where it was kindled, the deserted garden, the village alehouse, the school, and the evening landscape, are all touched with the pensive grace of a Claude, while, when the occasion demands, Goldsmith rises with easy wing to the height of lofty and even sublime elevation, as in the image of the storm-girded yet sunshine-crowned peak to which he compares the good pastor.

The Vicar of Wakefield, in spite of the extreme absurdity and inconsistency of its plot, an inconsistency which grows more perceptible in the latter part of the story, will ever remain one of these rare gems which no lapse of time can tarnish. The gentle and quiet humour embodied in the simple Dr Primrose, the delicate yet vigorous contrasts of character in the other personages, the atmosphere of purity, cheerfulness, and gaiety which envelopes all the scenes and incidents, will contribute, no less than the transparency and grace of the style, to make this story a classic for all time. Goldsmith's two comedies are written in two different manners, the Goodnatured Man being a comedy of character, and She Stoops to Conquer a comedy of intrigue. In the first the excessive easiness and generosity of the hero is not a quality sufficiently reprehensible to make him a favourable subject for that satire which is the essential element of this kind of theatrical painting, and the merit of the piece chiefly consists in the truly laughable personage of Croaker, and in the excellent scene where the disguised bailiffs are passed off on Miss Richland as the friends of Honeywood, whose house and person they have seized. But in She Stoops to Conquer we have a first-rate specimen of the comedy of intrigue, where the interest mainly depends upon a tissue of lively and farcical incidents, and where the characters, though lightly sketched, form a gallery of eccentric pictures. The best proof of Goldsmith's success in this piece is the constancy with which it has always kept possession of the stage, and the peals of laughter which never fail to greet the lively bustle of its scenes and the pleasant absurdities of Young Marlow, Mr and Mrs Harcastle, and above all the admirable Tony Lumpkin, a conception worthy of Vanbrugh himself.

Some of Goldsmith's lighter fugitive poems are incomparable for their peculiar humour. The Haunch of Venison is a model of easy narrative and accurate sketching of commonplace society, and in Retaliation we have a series of slight yet delicate portraits of some of the most distinguished literary friends of the poet, thrown off with a hand at once refined and vigorous. In how masterly a manner, and yet in how few strokes, has Goldsmith placed before us Garrick, Burke, and Reynolds, and how deeply do we regret that he should not have given us similar portraits of Johnson, Gibbon, and Boswell. Several of the songs and ballads scattered through his works are remarkable for their tenderness and harmony, though the Edwin and Angelina, which has been so often lauded, has always appeared to me mawkish, affected, and devoid of the true spirit of the mediæval ballad.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

OTHER NOVELLISTS.

SAHAR FIELDING (1714-1768) was sister of the celebrated novel writer, and herself well known as an authoress. Her best known novels were David Simple and The Cry. She also translated Xenophon's Anabasis.

CHARLES JONESTOWN (d. 1800) was the author of the once popular Adventures of a Guinea, 1760, and other now unknown works. The former is a severe satire on the sins and follies of the age. We lay it down "with a feeling of relief." It exhibits the "baser sides of literature and life."

CHAPTER XVIII

HISTORICAL, MORAL, POLITICAL, AND THEOLOGICAL WRITERS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

§ 1 DAVID HUME His life and publications Treatise on Human Nature and History of England § 2 WILLIAM ROBERTSON Histories of Scotland, Charles V, and America § 3 EDWARD GIBBON His life and works § 4 Criticism of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire § 5 SAMUEL JOHNSON His early life and struggles London Life of Savage § 6 English Dictionary Vanity of Human Wishes Tragedy of Irene § 7 The Idler and Rambler Rasselas Johnson receives a pension from the government § 8 His acquaintance with Boswell Edition of Shakspeare Journey to the Hebrides Lives of the Poets Johnson's death § 9 EDMUND BURKE His life and writings Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful His Impeachment of Warren Hastings Letter to a Noble Lord Reflections on the French Revolution Letter on a Regicide Peace § 10 Letters of Junius § 11 ADAM SMITH Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations § 12 SIR WILLIAM BLACKSTONE Commentaries on the Laws of England § 13 BISHOP BUTLER and WILLIAM PALEY § 14 GILBERT WHITE Natural History of Selborne

§ 1 IN accordance with that peculiar law which seems to govern the appearance, at particular epochs, of several great names in one department of art or literature, like the sculptors of the Periclean age, the romantic dramatists in that of Elizabeth, and the novelists who appeared in England in the days of Richardson and Fielding, the eighteenth century was signalised by a remarkable wealth of historical genius, and gave birth to Hume, Robertson, and Gibbon.

DAVID HUME (1711-1776) was born, of an ancient Scottish family, in 1711, and received his education in the University of Edinburgh. His desires and ambition were irresistibly set upon literary fame, and after reluctantly trying the profession of law and the pursuit of commerce, he lived abroad some years, devoting himself, by means of prudence and economy, to the cultivation of moral and metaphysical science, and to the preparation of his mind for future historical labours. His intellect was calm, philosophical, and sceptical, and he imbibed that strong disbelief in the possibility of miracles which when expressed in his subtle logic and refined purity of style, has rendered him one of the most dangerous enemies of revealed religion. In 1787 he returned to England, and was so much discouraged with the coldness of the public towards his first moral and metaphysical productions that he at one time meditated changing his name and expatriating himself for ever. In 1746 and the following year a gleam of success shone upon him, for he had hitherto lived in such narrow circumstances that his extreme prudence and economy scarcely enabled him to subsist respectably, and he was even at one time reduced to the painful and uncongenial office of taking charge of the young Marquis of Annandale who was insane. He now entered the public service, and was employed as secretary to General St Clair in various diplomatic missions. When again residing at Edinburgh in 1752 he accepted the post of Librarian to the Faculty of Advocates, for which he received no salary, but which placed at his disposal a large and excellent collection of books. With the aid thus furnished he began his great work, the History of England from the accession of the Stuart Dynasty to the Revolution of 1688, to which he afterwards added in successive volumes the earlier history from the invasion of Julius Cæsar to the reign of James I. Though the first volumes were received with the same neglect as had encountered his previous publications, the extraordinary merits of the plan, and the incomparable clearness and beauty of the narration soon overcame the indifference of the public, and the history gradually and rapidly rose to the highest popularity, and took that place among the prose classics of the language which it has ever since retained. The admiration excited by the History, by a natural consequence, reverted also upon his previous works, which now began to enjoy a high degree of popularity, in spite of the heterodox tenets which they were accused of maintaining. Hume's reputation was now solidly established. He was again employed in the public service, and accompanied as secretary, the embassy of General Conway to Paris, where he became one of the lions of the fashionable society of the French capital, a popularity which he owed more to his literary glory and to the sceptical theories—then so prevalent in France—of which he was one of the apostles, than to any personal aptitude for the society of wits and fine ladies, for Hume was heavy and inelegant in appearance, and possessed few charms of conversation or readiness of repartee. He afterwards fulfilled for a short time the still higher functions of Under-Secretary of State, and retiring with a pension passed the evening of his life in philosophy and intellectual tranquillity, enjoying the respect and affection which his virtuous and amiable qualities attracted, and which not even his scepticism could repel. Hume died in 1776. He was distinguished by great benevolence of heart, and by a spirit of candour and indulgence to the opinions of others, which might have been advantageously imitated by many of those who controverted his opinions.

As a moral and metaphysical writer Hume certainly deserves a high place in the history of philosophy. The prominent feature of his Treatise on Human Nature, published in 1738, was the attempt to deduce the operations of the mind entirely from the two sources of impressions and ideas, which he looks upon as distinct, and his denying the existence of any fundamental difference between such actions as we call virtuous and vicious, other than as they are practically found to be conducive to or destructive of the advantage of the individual or the species. In other words Hume is the assertor of the theory of Utility, as the only one capable of satisfactorily explaining the mysterious question—What is the essential difference between good and evil? Such a theory was received with intense dissatisfaction by the orthodox but seldom has the controversialist to encounter a tougher antagonist than Hume, the clearness of whose exposition, and the subtlety of whose arguments, a subtlety the more formidable as it is always veiled under an air of philosophic candour, were but too often met with declamation and unfair attacks on a personal character which was above reproach. But the chief danger of Hume's philosophical doctrines lies in his famous argument on the impossibility of miracles, based upon the two propositions first, that it is contrary to all human experience that miracles should be true, both reason and facts tending to show the invariable nature of the laws which govern all physical phenomena, and secondly, that the improbability of a miracle ever having taken place is far greater than the improbability of the testimony to such an event being false, the witnesses being likely either to have been duped themselves or to dupe others.

The History of England is a book of very high value. In a certain exquisite ease and vivacity of narration it certainly has never been surpassed, and in the analysis of characters and the appreciation of great events Hume's singular clearness and philosophic elevation of view give him a right to one of the foremost places among modern historians. But its defects are no less considerable. Hume's indolence induced him to remain contented with taking his facts at second-hand from preceding writers, without troubling himself about accuracy. Thus legendary and half-mythological stories are related with the same air of belief as the more well-authenticated events of recent times, a fault pardonable enough in Herodotus and Livy, but less venial in a writer who ought to have applied his powerful critical faculty to the sifting of truth from tradition. Hume, essentially a classicist of the Voltaire and Diderot type, too much despised the barbarous monkish chroniclers to think of consulting them as authorities, or of separating the germ of fact which they envelope in a mass of superstitions and imaginative detail. Moreover, the history of England is essentially the history of the conflict of opinion on religious and political questions, and Hume to find means to maintain even during the five years he passed in military service as captain of the Hampshire militia. It was at this period that he gave to the world the first-fruits of his pen in the excellent little essay, written in French, on the Study of Literature. Between 1763 and 1765 he travelled over France, Switzerland, and Italy, and while at Rome, in 1764, the first idea of writing the history of the Decline and Fall of the mighty empire first flashed upon his mind. He has given a most striking and picturesque description of the moments of the generation and the completion of his great work. The sudden shock of conception given amid the sunken ruins of the Capitol, "while the barefooted friars were singing vespers in the Temple of Jupiter," found its picturesque consummation in the "valley of acacias" by the moonlit lake of Geneva in 1787. Gibbon returned to England in 1765, and set strenuously to work on the composition of his history, the first volume of which appeared in the following year, and was received not only with the applause of the learned, but with universal popularity among the fashionable world and the ladies. The praises of Hume found an echo in the gayest and most frivolous circles. At various intervals appeared the successive volumes, each of which excited the admiration and enthusiasm which the grandeur of the work was so calculated to inspire. Gibbon has related the hesitation, and almost terror, with which the immense extent and difficulty of his enterprise at first filled him, and the fastidious care with which he revised and re-revised the opening chapters, the first of which he wrote thrice, and the second twice over, before he was satisfied with the style; but as he advanced the various parts of his gigantic subject took form and symmetry, and the increasing facility of composition enabled him to advance with steady speed.

With the year 1774 begins Gibbon's political career. He sat in several successive Parliaments as member for Liskeard, and supported, with a silent vote—for both modesty and vanity prevented him from trying his fortune as a speaker—the ministry, during the whole course of the American War, down to the formation of the Coalition Cabinet. Lord North rewarded his constant adhesion with the post of one of the Lords Commissioners of Trade, which Gibbon enjoyed for about three years, till the abolition of the office in 1782. In 1783 Gibbon determined to settle altogether at Lausanne. He established himself in the comfortable house which he had purchased on the lovely shore of Lake Leman, a spot for ever memorable from the residence of this great genius. This was perhaps the happiest part of his life. He was able to devote himself in tranquillity to his mighty task, and his leisure hours were enlivened with intellectual society and the companionship of his friend Deyverdun. At length his residence at Lausanne becoming disagreeable in consequence of the agitation which followed the outbreak of the French Revolution, he returned to London in 1793 and died there in the following year. The personal character of Gibbon was rather respectable than attractive. Of a cold and somewhat selfish disposition, he played a prominent part in the brilliant intellectual circle which surrounded Burke and Johnson, his immense acquirements and refined manners rendered his conversation interesting and valuable, and his vanity, though concealed by good breeding and knowledge of the world, was not incompatible with generosity and benevolence.

§ 1 His History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, is undoubtedly one of the greatest monuments of industry and genius. The task he undertook, to give a connected narrative of one of the most eventful periods in the annals of the world,

“Res Romanas, pertinamque regna,”

was colossal. It embraced, exclusive of the introductory sketch of Roman history from the time of Augustus, of itself a noble monument of philosophical research, a period of upwards of thirteen centuries, that is from about 180 to 1453 A.D. This immense space included not only the manhood and the decrepitude of the Roman Empire, but the irruption of the Barbarian nations, the establishment of the Byzantine power, the reorganization of the European nations, the foundation of the religious and political system of Mahomedanism, and the Crusades. The enormous scope of the undertaking rendered indispensable not only the most vast and accurate knowledge of the whole range of classical, Byzantine, mediæval, and oriental literature, but such a largeness of view as should give a clear and philosophical account of some of the greatest religious and social changes that have ever modified the destinies of our race; the rise of Christianity, the Mussulman dominion, and the institutions of Feudalism and Chivalry. Nor was the complexity of the subject less formidable than its extent; while the materials for much of its treatment were to be painfully sifted from the rubbish of the Byzantine annalists, and the wild exaggerations of the Eastern chroniclers. From this immense chaos was to be deduced light, order, and regularity, and the historian was to be familiar with the whole range of philosophy, science, politics, and war. Gibbon has confessed that his experience of parliamentary tactics and the knowledge of military affairs which he had acquired in the House of Commons and in the Hampshire militia, had been of signal service to him, in describing the deliberations of senates and the movements of immense armies. For man is everywhere the enemy, and the historian possessed the rare art of bringing home to our sympathies and understanding the sentiments and actions of remote ages and distant peoples. Gibbon is one of the most dangerous enemies by whom the Christian faith was ever assailed—he was the more dangerous because he was insidious. The following is the plan of his tactics. He does not formally deny the evidence upon which is based the structure of Christianity, but he indirectly includes that system in the same category with the mythologies of paganism. The rapid spread of Christianity he explains by merely secondary causes, and in relating the disgraceful corruptions, persecutions, and superstitions which so soon supplanted the pure morality of the primitive church, he leads the reader to consider these less as the results of human crime, folly, and ambition, than as the necessary consequences of the system itself. He either did not or would not distinguish between the paræque and quæque, and represents what is in reality an abuse as an inevitable consequence. Byron well described him as “Sapping a solemn creed with solemn sneer,

The lord of irony, that master spell

But the accusations of having intentionally distorted facts or garbled authorities he has refuted in the Vindication in which he replied to his opponents. In the full and complete references and quotations with which he scrupulously fortifies his assertions and his deductions, we see a panoply which offers few weak places to the adversary. The deliberate opinion of Guizot, whom no one can accuse of indifference to religion, will be conclusive as to Gibbon's merit on this point. His style is remarkably pompous, elaborate, and sonorous; originally artificial it had gradually become the natural garb of his thoughts. In the antithetical and epigrammatic structure of his phrases, and in the immense preponderance of the Latin over the Teutonic element in his diction, Gibbon is the least English of all our writers of the first class; and the ease with which whole pages of his writings may be translated almost without a change of words or grammar, into French, render credible the statement of his having for some time hesitated whether to compose his work in that language or his mother-tongue. He was so fastidious in his search after elegance, that to avoid the repetition, at close intervals, of a name or event, he is apt, each time it occurs after the first, to express it by a periphrasis or an incidental allusion, to understand which often demands from the reader a degree of knowledge which few readers possess, and this is sometimes the cause of obscurity. His descriptions of events, as of battles, of nations, of individual characters, are wonderfully life-like and animated, and his chief sin against good taste is a somewhat too gorgeous and highly coloured tone. His imagination was sensuous, and he dwells with greater enthusiasm upon material grandeur than upon moral elevation, for his moral susceptibilities do not appear of a very lofty order. He had in common with Voltaire a peculiar and most offensive delight in dwelling upon scandalous and immoral stories, and this tendency, which in Voltaire's light and fltering style is less repulsive, becomes doubly odious when exhibited in combination with Gibbon's solemn and majestic language

§ 5 Perhaps the most striking figure in the social and literary history of this period is that of SAMUEL JOHNSON (1709-1784). His career was eminently that of a man of letters, and the slow and laborious efforts by which, in spite of every obstacle, personal as well as material, he raised himself to the highest intellectual supremacy present a spectacle equally instructive to us and honourable to him. He was born in 1709, the son of a learned but poor and struggling provincial bookseller in Lichfield, and he exhibited, from his very childhood, the same singular union of mental power and constitutional indolence, ambition and hypochondriacal gloom, which distinguished him through life. He was disfigured and half blinded by a scrofulous disorder, which scamed and deformed a face and figure naturally imposing, and at the same time afflicted him with strange and involuntary contortions, reacting also upon his mind and temper, and making him sombre, despondent, and irritable. In the various humble seminaries, where he received his early education, he unfailingly took the first place, and being assisted by a benevolent patron with the means of studying at the University, he carried to Pembroke College, Oxford, an amount of scholarship very rare at his age. Here he remained about three years, remarkable for the roughness and uncouthness of his manners, and no less for his wit and insubordination, as well as for that sturdy spirit of independence which made him reject with indignation any offer of assistance. The story of his throwing away a pair of new shoes which some one, pitying the poverty of the ragged student, had placed at his door, is striking, and even pathetic. His father's affairs being in hopeless confusion, and the promises of assistance not being fulfilled, he was obliged to leave the University without a degree, and receiving, at his father's death only 20*l* as his share of the inheritance, he abandoned it to his mother's use, for he was ever a most dutiful and generous son, and entered upon the hard career of teacher and usher in various provincial schools. For success in this profession he was equally unfitted by his person, his nature, and the peculiar character of his mind and acquirements, and after unsuccessfully attempting to keep a school himself at Edial, near Lichfield, he began that tremendous struggle with labour and want, which continued during 30 years. His first literary undertaking was a translation of Father Lobo's Travels in Abyssinia, but his hopes of success meeting with little but disappointment, he determined to launch upon the great ocean of London literary life. In 1736 he had married Mrs Porter, a widow old enough to be his mother, but whom notwithstanding her defects of person and cultivation he always loved with the energy of his masculine and affectionate character. In 1737 he travelled to London in company with David Garrick, one of the few pupils he had had under his charge at Edial, who was destined, in another path, to follow a brilliant career. Garrick's ambition was to appear on the stage, where he speedily took the first place, and Johnson carried with him the unfinished MS of his tragedy Irene. Without fortune, without friends, of singularly uncouth and forbidding exterior, Johnson entered upon the career—then perhaps at its lowest ebb of profit and respectability—of a bookseller's clerk, or literary drudge. He became a contributor to divers journals, and particularly to the Gentleman's Magazine, then carried on by its founder, Cave, and as an obscure labourer for the press he furnished criticisms, prefaces, translations, in short all kinds of humble literary work, and ultimately supplied reports of the proceedings in Parliament, though the names of the speakers, in obedience to the law which then rendered it penal to reproduce the debates, were disguised under imaginary titles. He first emerged into popularity in 1738, by the publication of his satire, entitled London, an admirable paraphrase or reproduction of the third satire of Juvenal, in which he adapts the sentiments and topics of the great Roman poet to the neglect of letters in London, and the humiliations which an honest man must encounter in a society where foreign quacks and native scoundrels could alone hope for success. During this miserable and obscure portion of his career, when he dined in a cellar upon sixpenny worth of meat and a pennyworth of bread, when he signed himself, in a note to his employer, "yours improbus, S. Johnson," when his ragged coat and worn shoes made him ashamed to appear at the table of his publisher, and caused him to devour his dinner behind a screen, he retained all his native dignity of mind and severe honesty of principle. There is something affecting in the picture of this great and noble mind labouring on through toil and distress which would have crushed most men, and which, though it roughened his manners, only intensified his humanity, and augmented his self-respect. In 1744 he published the Life of Savage, that unhappy poet whose career was so extraordinary, and whose vices were not less striking than his talents. Johnson had known him well, and they had often wandered supperless and homeless about the streets at midnight. The vigorous and manly thought expressed in Johnson's sonorous language rendered this biography popular. But the improvement in the author's circumstances was very tardy in making its appearance. no literary life was ever a more correct exemplification than that of Johnson, of the truth of his own majestic line "slow rises worth, by poverty depressed "

§ 6 During the eight years extending from 1747 to 1755 Johnson was engaged in the execution of his laborious undertaking, the compilation of his great Dictionary of the English Language, which long occupied the place among us of the Dictionary of the Academy in France and Spain. The etymological part of this great work, in consequence of Johnson sharing the then almost universal ignorance of the Teutonic languages, is totally without value, but the accuracy and comprehensiveness of the definitions, and above all the interesting quotations adduced to exemplify the different senses of the words, render it a book that may always be read with pleasure. The compilers of the French and Spanish dictionaries do, indeed, quote passages, in support of the meanings they assign to words, from the great classical writers of their respective literature, but these quotations have no further interest or even sense than is necessary to exhibit the particular meaning of the word illustrated, while Johnson's are either some striking passage of poetry and eloquence, or some historical fact or scientific axiom or definition. Thus a page of Johnson's dictionary always gratifies a curiosity quite independent of mere philological research. When we think of this solitary scholar with painful industry compiling a great national work, at least not inferior to productions which in other countries have occupied the attention of learned and richly endowed societies during a great number of years, we cannot but feel deep admiration for our countryman. While engaged in this laborious task he diverted his mind by the publication of the Vanity of Human Wishes, a companion to his London, being a similar imitation of the tenth satire of his Roman prototype. This is written in a loftier, more solemn and declamatory style than the preceding poem, and is a fine specimen of Johnson's dignified but somewhat gloomy rhetoric. The illustrations, drawn from history, of the futility of those objects which men sigh for, literary, military, or political renown, beauty, wealth, long life, or splendid alliances, Johnson has reproduced with kindred vigour, but he has added several of his own, where he shows a power and grandeur in no sense inferior to that of Juvenal. Thus to the striking picture of the fall of Sejanus, related with such grim humour by the Roman satirist, Johnson has added the not less impressive picture of the disgrace of Wolsey, and his episode of Charles XII is no unworthy counterpart to the portrait of Hannibal. At about the same time Johnson brought out upon the stage, principally through the friendly interest of Garrick, who was now the principal theatrical manager, the tragedy of Irene, which had long been in vain awaiting the opportunity of representation. Its success was insignificant, and indeed could not have been otherwise, for the plot of the piece is totally devoid of interest and probability, there is no discrimination of character, no painting of passion, and the work consists of a series of lofty moral declamations in Johnson's laboured and rhetorical style

§ 7 Johnson founded, and carried on alone, two periodical papers in the style that Addison and Steele had rendered so popular. These were the Idler, which lasted but a short time, and the Rambler, appearing twice a week and sold at a low price. The ease, grace, pleasantry, and variety which gave such charm to the Tatler and Spectator are totally incompatible with the heavy, antithetical ponderous manner of Johnson, and his good sense, piety, and sombre tone of morality are but a poor substitute for the mite ingenium and knowledge of the world displayed in his models. Yet though bearing every mark of labour Johnson's essays were written with great rapidity and often despatched to the press without revisal. This species of periodical essay-writing, which exerted so powerful an influence on taste and manners in the eighteenth century, may be said to terminate with the Rambler, though continued with gradually increasing want of originality by other writers, till it finally died out with Hawkesworth, Moore, and Bonnell Thornton,* the first of whom was but a feeble mimic of the Johnsonian manner. Johnson's mother died in 1759, and he wrote with extraordinary rapidity, and for the purpose of raising funds for her funeral, his once-celebrated moral tale, Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia. The manners and scenery of this story are neither those of oriental, nor of any other known country, and the book is little else but a series of dialogues and reflections, embodying the author's ideas on an immense variety of subjects connected with art, literature, society, and philosophy, and his lofty, but gloomy and discouraging principles of ethics and religion. It has sometimes been fancifully contrasted with the Candide of Voltaire, and indeed it would be difficult to find two nearly contemporary works presenting a more complete antagonism in tendency and manner.

* JOHN HAWKESWORTH (1715-1773) edited The Adventurer, which appeared twice a week from 1752 to 1754. Hawkesworth also translated Telemachus, and wrote an account of Captain Cook's voyages.

EDWARD MOORE (1712-1757) edited The World, which appeared weekly from 1753 to 1756, and in which he was assisted by Lord Lyttelton, the Earl of Chesterfield, Horace Walpole, and other distinguished literary men. Moore likewise wrote a tragedy called The Gamester.

BONNELL THORNTON (1724-1768) wrote, in conjunction with his friend George Colman the elder, The Connoisseur, which appeared from 1754 to 1756. Thornton was the author of several other works, but he is best known by his translation of Plautus, which he made in conjunction with Warner and Colman.

At various periods of his career Johnson had given to the world several political pamphlets, generally distinguished for the violence with which arbitrary doctrines are maintained, and for a strange mixture of sense and vigour and narrow prejudice. Thus he was an ardent opponent of the rights of the American colonies to revolt against oppression, and through his whole life exhibited an ardent advocacy of extreme Tory doctrines, singularly at variance with his liberality in other respects. It was not till 1762, when the philosopher had reached the age of 53, that he emerged from the constant poverty which had hitherto almost overwhelmed him, and against which he had so valiantly struggled. At the accession of George III the government hoped to gain popularity by showing some favour to art and letters, and Johnson, who now occupied an honourable and leading position as a moralist and poet, was gratified by Lord Bute with a pension of 300*l* a year. Johnson now found himself, for the first time in his life, placed above want, and was able to indulge not only his constitutional indolence, but that noble charity and benevolence which transformed his dwelling into a sort of asylum for helpless indigence. In spite of his own poverty he had maintained under his roof a strange assembly of pensioners on his bounty, whose only claims upon him were their infirmities and their distress. There was Anna Williams, a blind poetess, Mrs Desmoulins, and Levett, a sort of humble practitioner of medicine among the most miserable classes of London, and a thousand anecdotes are related of the generosity of Johnson to these inmates, with whose quarrels and repinings he bore, and over whom he watched with unrelaxing kindness.

§ 8 At this period of his life Johnson became acquainted with JAMES BOSWELL (1740-1795), whose biography of the old sage is perhaps the most perfect and interesting account of a literary life and a literary epoch which the world has yet seen. Boswell was a young Scottish advocate of good family and fortune, he belonged to a nation which Johnson regarded with unreasonable and almost ludicrous aversion, he was vain, tattling, frivolous, and contemptible in the highest degree, totally deficient both in self respect, tact, and solidity of principle, yet his sincere admiration for Johnson established a lasting friendship between these incompatible characters, and Boswell has produced not only the most lively and vivid portrait of the person, manners, and conversation of Johnson, but the most admirable picture of the society amid which he played so brilliant a part. Among the most celebrated social meetings of that age of clubs was the society founded by Johnson, and in which his friends Reynolds, Burke, Garrick, Bishop Percy, Goldsmith, Bennet Langton, Beauclerc, and others, were prominent figures. Indeed from its very foundation the most distinguished artists, conversers, and men of letters have been members of this club, and Boswell's delight was to record the "wit combats" which were incessantly taking place among them, as well as to preserve every fragment that he could collect by hearsay and observation, of the manners and converse of his idol. Thus he has given us, with a consummate skill only the more astonishing from what we know of his character, the most accurate yet lively transcript of the intellectual society of Johnson's day. Johnson's powers of conversation were extraordinary: he delighted in discussion, and had acquired by constant practice the art of expressing himself with pointed force and elegance, while the ponderous antitheses and sesquipedalian diction of his written style were replaced by a muscular and idiomatic expression which formed an appropriate vehicle for his weighty thoughts, his apt illustrations, and his immense stores of reading and observation. He often argued for victory, and the ingenious paradox and sledge-hammer repartees with which he sometimes overwhelmed opposition, are by no means the least interesting traits of his wonderful skill in social contest. Hardly any subject was broached on which Johnson had not something ingenious, if not admirable, to say. This was perhaps the most brilliant and the happiest portion of his life. He made the acquaintance of the family of Thrale, a rich brewer and member of the House of Commons, who, like most of his contemporaries, was filled with admiration by the varied and imposing talents of the great wit and writer, and whose wife was equally famous for her own talents and for the bright intellectual society she loved to assemble round her. At Thrale's house in London, as well as at his luxurious villa at Streatham, Johnson was for many years a frequent and an honoured guest. His comfort was studied, his sickness was nursed, his coarseness of manner forgiven, and down to the time of Thrale's death Johnson enjoyed under his roof all that friendship and respect, aided by boundless wealth, could give. This connection, which lasted about fourteen years, gave Johnson the opportunity of frequenting refined society, and in the company of the Thrales he made several excursions to different parts of England, and once indeed as far as Paris. He undertook, unfortunately for his fame, the task of preparing a new edition of Shakspeare, an enterprise for which he was unfitted not only by his little sympathy with that romantic class of poetry of which Shakspeare is the chief representative, but by an almost total want of acquaintance with the writings of Shakspeare's age, an accurate knowledge of which is of course a primary requisite for any one who wishes to explain the obscurities of the poet. The edition, with the exception of an occasional happy remark, and a sensible selection from the commentaries of preceding annotators, is quite unworthy of Johnson's reputation In 1773 Johnson undertook, in company with his friend Boswell, an expedition to the Hebrides, a journey which would in those days have appeared almost as enterprising as would now an exploration of the interior of Africa, and thus voyage not only enabled him to make acquaintance with Scotland and the Scots, and thus to dissipate many of his old prejudices against the country and the people, but gave him the opportunity of exercising his observation and curiosity on a region entirely new to him and rarely visited by travellers The volume in which he gives an account of his impressions contains many interesting and characteristic passages His last work of any consequence, and which is also unquestionably his best, was the Lives of the Poets, originating in the proposal made to him by several publishers that he should write a few lines of biographical and critical preface to the collected works of the English poets, of which they were preparing an edition Johnson accepted the task, but the work far outgrew the limits originally proposed, and he furnished an invaluable series of literary portraits Unfortunately the plan altogether excluded the greatest poets that our literature has produced, and admitted no names, excepting those of Milton, Butler, Dryden, and Pope, which can be ranked in the first, or even very high in the second class It seemed as if the plan had been purposely designed to embrace what was undoubtedly the least poetical epoch of our literature But Johnson performed his task with such skill, and poured forth so abundantly the stores of his sound sense and acute reflection, that these lives are not only one of the most amusing books in the language, but contain, in spite of the narrowness of the author's literary creed, unnumerable passages of the happiest and most original criticism, particularly in the appreciation of those writers who, belonging to what is called the classical or artificial school, exhibit characteristics which Johnson was capable of appreciating His remarks upon the poetry of Cowley, Waller, and Pope, are admirable, and his immense knowledge of life, and sharp and weighty sense, have filled his pages with striking and valuable observations He incorporated with this work his previously written Life of Savage, and on comparing the style of this book with his preceding productions, we are struck by its comparative freedom from that pompous and rhetorical tone which disfigures his earlier prose-writings, in which the abuse of antithesis, of carefully balanced sentences, and of the employment of long Latinised words, had been carried so far as almost to justify his writing being denied the title of idiomatic English In 1784 this good man and vigorous writer died, after suffering severely from dropsy and a complication of disorders, and it is consoling to reflect that the morbid and almost hypochondriac horror of death which had tormented him during his whole existence gave way, under the influence of his strong religious sentiments, and at the approach of the moment he had so dreaded, to a calm and resignation worthy of so wise and so benevolent a character. Few literary men have enjoyed so much deference as Johnson both his virtues and his defects, his talents and his weaknesses, contributed to make him the king of his circle, and it is less a matter of surprise that the hardships of his early life should have left a stamp of coarseness and ferocity upon his manners and demeanour, than that the causes which made him rough and harsh in argument, and careless of the minor decencies of social intercourse, should never have sullied the undeviating purity of his moral principles, nor diminished the tenderness of his heart. He was a singular mixture of prejudice and liberality, of scepticism and credulity, of bigotry and candour and with that paradoxical strangeness which pervades all his personality, we know him better, and admire him more, in the unadorned records which Boswell has given of his conversational triumphs, than in those rhetorical and elaborate writings which his contemporaries thought so magnificent, but which more recent generations seem likely to condemn to comparative oblivion.

§ 9 The name of EDMUND BURKE (1729-1797) has already occurred more than once as connected with Johnson and the accomplished literary society of that day. Burke was a man of powerful and versatile genius, carrying the fervour and imagery of a great orator into philosophical discussion, and uniting in himself the highest qualities of the statesman, the writer, and the philosopher. His predominant quality was a burning and dazzling enthusiasm for whatever object attracted his sympathies, and in the service of this enthusiasm he impressed all the disciplined forces of his learning, his logic, and his historical and political knowledge. His mind resembled the Puritan regiments of Cromwell, which moved to battle with the precision of machines, while burning with the fiercest ardour of fanaticism. His sympathies were indeed generally excited by generous pity for misfortune, and horror at cruelty and injustice, but, as in the case of his rupture with Fox, his splendid oratorical display in the impeachment of Warren Hastings, and his furious denunciation of the French Revolution, the very excess of his tenderness made him cruel, and the vehemence of his detestation of injustice made him unjust. He was the son of a Dublin attorney, came early to England to study law, but commenced his career as a miscellaneous writer in magazines. He was the founder and first author of the Annual Register, a useful epitome of political and general facts, and gained his first reputation by his Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful, a short treatise in which ingenuity is more perceptible than solidity of reasoning, and he became one of the most constant and brilliant ornaments of the club where Johnson, Reynolds, and Goldsmith used to assemble. Burke's powers of conversation were most extraordinary, his immense and varied stores of knowledge were poured forth in language unequalled for its splendour of illustration, and Johnson, jealous as he was of his own social supremacy, confessed that in Burke he encountered a fully equal antagonist. Burke's political career commenced as Secretary to Hanilton in Ireland, and he was afterwards attached in the same capacity to Lord Rockingham. He sat in the House of Commons successively for Wendover, Bristol, and Malton, and was one of the most prominent debaters during the agitated period of the American War and the French Revolution. He formed part of more than one ministry, and was successively either in power or in opposition in the successive administrations of Rockingham, North, Portland, and others. For a short time he held the lucrative post of Paymaster of the Forces in the Rockingham cabinet. The culminating points of his political life were his share in the famous India Bill, which was to entirely change the administration of our Eastern dependencies, and in the trial of Warren Hastings, which lasted from 1786 to 1795, and terminated with the acquittal of the accused. In this majestic and solemn scene, where a great nation sat in public judgment upon a great criminal, Burke played perhaps the most prominent part. He was one of the managers of the impeachment in the name of the Commons, and his speech is one of the sublimest philippics that ancient or modern oratory can show. He had heated his imagination in contemplating the vast, gorgeous, and picturesque nations and history of the East, and his almost morbid philanthropy was intensified by the consciousness of his proud position as a defender of ancient and oppressed populations before the venerable bar of history and the English people. It is curious to observe how gradually his speeches and writings increase in vividness of colouring and in intensity of passion as he advanced in life. His powerful mind almost lost its balance under the shock of that bitter disappointment caused by the horrors of the French Revolution, in which his unrivalled political sagacity could foresee nothing but unmingled evil. The Reign of Terror transformed Burke from a constitutional Whig into a Tory, but at the same time animated his genius to some of its most unrivalled bursts of eloquence. The close of this great and good man's life was melancholy, the loss of his son, a youth of great promise crushed all his hopes, and elicited one of the noblest monuments of pathetic oratory. His finest written compositions are his Letter to a Noble Lord, in which he defends himself against the aspersions of the Duke of Bedford who had attacked him for accepting a pension, his Reflections on the French Revolution, and his Letter on a Regicide.

Peace In Parliament, though his speeches were perhaps unequalled for splendour of illustration, for an almost supernatural acuteness of political foresight, and for the profoundest analysis of constitutional principles, he was often less popular than many inferior debaters. he spoke over the heads of his audience, but he will ever be regarded as one of the greatest orators and statesmen of any age or country.

§ 10 The last half of the eighteenth century was a very gloomy and agitated crisis. The dispute between Great Britain and her American colonies, the lowering and ominous looming of the great revolutionary tempest of France, and many internal subjects of discussion involving important constitutional questions, rendered the political atmosphere gloomy and thunder-charged. From about the beginning of 1769, and with occasional interruptions down to 1772 there appeared in the 'Public Advertiser,' one of the leading London journals, then published by Woodfall, a series of Letters for the most part signed Junius. They exhibited so much weight and dignity of style, and so minute an acquaintance with the details of party tactics, and breathed such a lofty tone of constitutional principle, combined with such a bitterness, and even ferocity of personal invective, that their influence was unbounded. Government made the most violent, but fruitless efforts to discover the writer, and Woodfall submitted to severe punishment, though there is every reason to believe that he too was kept in perfect ignorance of the real name of his correspondent. The chief objects of the attack of Junius were the Dukes of Grafton and Bedford, and he strongly pronounced himself against the infringement of constitutional liberty in the expulsion of Wilkes from the House of Commons and the seizure of his papers. but the concealed writer does not confine himself to great public questions, but exhibits minute knowledge of disputes and intrigues in the subordinate department of the War-office, and shows all the rancour of a man who felt himself personally aggrieved. The whole annals of political controversy show nothing so bitter and terrible as the personalities and invectives of Junius, which are rendered more formidable by the loftiness of the language, and by the moderate and constitutional principles which he professes to maintain. These letters will always be regarded as masterpieces in their particular style. Many efforts, some very learned, ingenious, and elaborate, have been employed to clear up the riddle of the real authorship of these letters. but the enigma still remains one of the most mysterious in the history of letters. Burke, Hamilton, Francis, Lyttelton, and Lord George Sackville, have been successively fixed upon as the writer, and the mingled glory and shame—glory for the high merits of the composition, and shame for the atrocious spirit of calumny—has been transported by successive demonstrations to one or to the other

Among the numerous claimants to the doubtful honour Sir Philip Francis appears to have the strongest suffrages the opinion of Macaulay, whose knowledge of the history of the time was unrivalled, is unconditionally in favour of Francis. but a recent investigator has brought forward some ingenious arguments in favour of Lyttelton. It is hardly probable that this curious and much-vexed question will now ever be settled by anything more conclusive than more or less strong presumptive evidence, and the authorship of the Letters of Junius will remain a singular example of an unsolved political mystery like the Man in the Iron Mask or the Executioner of Charles I. However this may be, the letters themselves will ever be a monument of the finest but fiercest political invective.

§ 11 ADAM SMITH (1723-1790) was the founder, in England, of the science of Political Economy. He was a Scotchman, and exhibited in a high degree that aptitude for moral, metaphysical, and economic investigation which seems to be so general in his country. He was successively Professor of Logic and of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow. At one period of his life he lectured with success at Edinburgh on rhetoric and belles lettres, and was persuaded to travel with the young Duke of Buccleuch, whose education he superintended. His most important work is the Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, the fruit of ten years of study and investigation, and which laid the foundation for modern economic science. It was the first systematic treatise produced in England upon a most important subject, and though not free from erroneous deductions was the most valuable contribution ever made to a science, then almost in its infancy, and which was destined, thanks in a great measure to his clear and logical reasoning and abundant and popular illustration, to exert an immense and beneficial influence on legislation and commerce. The fundamental principles taught by Adam Smith are chiefly, that gold and silver are by no means wealth either to individuals or communities, being only symbols and conventional representatives of value, that labour is the true source of riches, and that any state interference with the distribution or production of commodities can only aggravate the evils it is intended to cure. He was the first to show, by apt and picturesque illustration, the wonderful results of the division of labour, both as regards the quantity and quality of the product. His moral and metaphysical theories are now nearly forgotten, but his Inquiry will ever remain the alphabet or text-book of the important science of which he was the pioneer.

§ 12 Something similar to what Adam Smith performed for political economy, SIR WILLIAM BLACKSTONE (1723-1780) did for the vast and complicated study of the Constitution and the Laws of England He was by profession a lawyer, though he mingled a strong taste for elegant literature with the graver studies of his profession and he ultimately became a Justice of the Common Pleas His Commentaries on the Laws of England gave the first example of a systematic work combining and popularizing all the elementary and historical knowledge requisite for the study, and this book, which is written in a singularly easy and pleasant style, is the groundwork of every legal education, nay, the accidence, so to say, of the grammar of English law Numerous editions have been published, bringing up the work to the existing state of legal knowledge, and showing such modifications as from time to time have been made in our legislation, and Blackstone's Commentaries still continue the best and completest outline of the history and principles of English law The great questions of right and property which lie at the bottom of all social organization are lucidly treated, and the mingled web of Tentonic, Feudal, Parliamentary, and Ecclesiastical legislation is carefully unravelled and disposed with luminous distinctness

§ 13 The most prominent names in the English theological philosophy of the eighteenth century are those of BISHOP BUTLER (1692-1752) and WILLIAM PALEY (1743-1805) The former is more remarkable for the severe and coherent logic with which he demonstrates his conclusions, the latter for the consummate skill with which he popularized the abstruser arguments of his predecessors Butler's principal work is The Analogy of Religion Natural and Revealed to the Constitution and Course of Nature, in which he examines into the resemblance between the existence and attributes of God, as proved by arguments drawn from the works of Nature, and shows that that existence and those attributes are in no way incompatible with the notions conveyed to us by Revelation The writings of Butler have filled the greatest thinkers with admiration, and their study has contributed to form some of the most accomplished dialecticians but the closeness of his reasoning, which necessitates an unusual degree of attention and a rare faculty of following his analysis, places his writings out of the reach of ordinary readers His moral theory is mainly based upon the existence, in every mind, of a guiding and testing principle of conscience, furnishing an infallible and supreme criterion of the goodness or wickedness of our actions

Many of Butler's arguments are rendered more accessible in the easy and animated pages of Paley, who was like Butler an ornament of the Church His books are numerous, and all excellent the principal of them are Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy, the Horæ Paulinæ, the Evidences of Christianity, and the wonderful production of his old age, the Treatise on Natural Theology 1' will be seen from the titles of these books over what an immense extent of moral and theological philosophy Paley's mind had travelled, for in the first of the above books he investigates the principles of human action whether exhibited in the individual or the community, in the second he establishes the genuineness of St Paul's Epistles by undesigned coincidences between them and the Acts of the Apostles, and in the third he demonstrates the credibility of the Christian miracles, defending them against the arguments of scepticism, and in particular against the scepticism of Hume. The Natural Theology deduces the existence and the benevolence of God from the evidence afforded by the phenomena of nature in favour of design, power, and beneficence and to supply himself with materials Paley studied physiology, and has described the structure and functions of animated beings with a vivacity and a knowledge that give him a very honourable place among writers on anatomy. For clearness, animation, and easy grace, the style of Paley has rarely been equalled.

§ 14 If the palm of merit is to be awarded less to the pretension of a literary work than to a universal popularity arising from a consummate charm of execution, then the fame of GILBERT WHITE, (1720-1793) is to be coveted little less eagerly than that of Isaac Walton. The greater portion of his life was passed in the sequestered village of Selborne, in Hampshire, which he has immortalized in one of the most enchanting books in the world. White was educated at Oxford, where he became a fellow of Oriel College, but, declining all college livings, he resided in his native village of Selborne, and there devoted his happy and tranquil life to the observation of nature. In a series of letters to Pennant and Daines Barrington, he has registered every phenomenon both of animal and vegetable life as well as of scenery and meteorology which came under the eye of a most curious, patient, and loving observer, and a thousand details so slight or so familiar as to escape the attention of previous naturalists, have been chronicled with exquisite grace, and form valuable contributions to science. Every change of weather, every circumstance in the habits of birds, beasts, and insects, were noted by him with an interest and enthusiasm that captivates the duller reader, and the Natural History of Selborne has made at least as many naturalists as Robinson Crusoe has made sailors. The benevolent playfulness which overflows in White's remarks, the pleasant touches of credulity, as in his obstinate desire to find proofs that swallows hibernate under water, the intense personality with which he is associated with the beautiful scenes he loved so well, the ardent fondness for natural objects—every feature of his character heightens the charm of this most fascinating book.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

THEOLOGICAL WRITERS

DR. HUMPHREY PRIDEAUX (1648-1723), one of the best known and most valuable theological writers, author of the Connection of the Old and New Testaments 1716 7. He was a scholar of great research, and professor of Hebrew at Oxford.

DR. WILLIAM NICHOLSON (1655-1727), an Irish prelate and learned antiquary, wrote on Border Laws, Laws of Anglo-Saxons. In 1776 he produced a catalogue of books and MSS., the Historical Libraries of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

DR. BENJAMIN HOADLEY (1670-1761) occupied successively the sees of Bangor, Hereford, Salisbury, and Winchester. He espoused the cause of the Whigs, and was a great controversialist on the more liberal side both in the Church and in politics. His chief works were On the Nature of the Kingdom or Church of Christ which gave rise to the celebrated Bangorian controversy, Reasonableness of Conformity, Terms of Acceptance Treatise on the Sacrament.

CHARLES LESLIE (1650-1722), a clergyman and controversialist, chiefly known for A Short and Easy Method with the Deists. The whole of his works were published at Oxford in 1832.

WILLIAM WHISTON (1667-1752) a mathematician of the school of Newton whom he succeeded as professor at Cambridge. He was not first a clergyman but was expelled the Church on account of his Arian opinions, became lecturer on astronomy in London and before his death held the principles of the Baptist body and the millenarian doctrines. His chief works are—Theory of the Earth, 1696 Essay on the Revelation of St. John 1706, Sermons 1708, Primitive Christianity Revived, 1712, Memoirs, 1749 50.

BISHOP WARBURTON (1698-1779) one of the celebrated writers of his day, but the value of his works was ephemeral, and, with the exception of his Divine Legation of Moses, they are almost forgotten. He was born at Newark, received no education for the Church yet, by assiduous and brilliant use of the pen, obtained presentations to livings, and not last was raised to the See of Gloucester. He enjoyed the friendship and assistance of the leading men of the day, but his love of paradox and startling hypotheses did much to lessen the lasting value and influence of his writings. Warburton was a man of force and genius, but spoilt his efforts for real success by his display and arrogance. A modern critic applies Gibbon's epithet of the Legation to the life and works of the author "A splendid ruin"—"not venerable from cherished associations, but great, unsightly, and incongruous."

DR. ROBERT LOWTH (1710-1787) successively Bishop of St. David's, Oxford, and London, was a man of great learning. His chief works are—Translation of Isaiah and Preflections on Hebrew Poetry, the latter being in Latin, delivered by him when he was Professor of Hebrew at Oxford.

REV WILLIAM LAW (1686-1761), a Jacobite Nonconformist, whose Serious Call to a Higher Life deserves mention not only from its being popular, but also because the reading of it is said by Dr. Johnson to have been 'the first occasion of his thinking in earnest of religion after he became capable of rational inquiry.'

DR. RICHARD WATSON (1737-1816) Bishop of Llandaff, and author of replies to Paine and Gibbon. The Apologies for Christianity and the Bible are well known.

DR. SAMUEL HORSLEY (1733-1806), secretary of the Royal Society, and successively Bishop of St. David's, Rochester and St. Asaph. His principal works are translations of the Psalms, and his controversial writings with Priestley.

DR. JOHN JORTIN (1698-1770), Proben-dary of St. Paul's and Archdeacon of London author of works on Ecclesiastical History 1751-4, Life of Erasmus 1758, which are written in a striking, lively style.

DR. RICHARD HUNN (1720-1808), successively Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry and of Worcester, a great friend of Warburton and an elegant scholar, wrote among other things, Discourses on the Prophecies, and a Life of Warburton.

DR. GEORGE HORNE (1730-1792), Bishop of Norwich, wrote the well known Commentary on the Psalms 1776.

DR. NATHANIEL LARDNER (1684-1769), a Presbyterian divine the author of a very learned work on The Credibility of the Gospel History, 1730-57. He also wrote a work similar to the above entitled A Large Collection of Ancient Jewish and Heathen Testimonies to the Truth of the Christian Religion.

DR. PHILIP DODDRIIDGE (1702-1751), one of the most distinguished Nonconformist divines. He was born in London was educated among the Dissenters, became minister at Northampton, and died at Lisbon whither he had departed for the benefit of his health. Doddridge was a man of learning and earnest piety. He was beloved and admired by all the religious bodies of the country. His style is plain simple, and forcible. He was a critic of some acumen, and a preacher of great distinction. But his name lives from his practical works and expository writings the chief of which are—Discourses on Regeneration 1741, Rise and Progress of Idign in the Soul, 1745, and his greatest and most extensive work, The Family Expositor, one of the most widely circulated works of its class.

DR. GEORGE CAMPBELL (1709-1796), Professor of Divinity at Aberdeen, was one of the most celebrated of the clergymen of the Scotch Church. His Dissertation on Miracles was in reply to Hume. The Philosophy of Rhetoric is one of the ablest works that has appeared on that subject. He also wrote A Translation of the Four Gospels, and Lectures on Ecclesiastical History. Few men have shown greater skill in polemical writing combined with a gentleness and regard for the opponent, and a modern critic places him next to Robertson the historian at the head of the clergy of the Scottish Church.

The following are authors of works of no high literary value, but yet have been of great service in shaping the moral and religious thought of the country.

GEORGE WHITFIELD (1714-1770)

JOHN WESLEY (1703-1791), the founder of the sect of Wesleyan Methodists, and author of several practical works, chiefly homiletic.

JAMES HERVEY (1714-1759) author of The Meditations Theron and Asaph, &c.

BENJAMIN LINSKYE (1680-1754), and RALPH LINSKYE (1685-1752).

PHILOSOPHICAL WRITERS.

DR. FRANCIS HUTCHESON (1694-1747), a native of Ireland studied at Glasgow and became Professor of Moral Philosophy in that University. He did much to restore the study of philosophy in Scotland, and is considered as the founder of the Scotch School of Metaphysics. In 1726 he published an Inquiry into Beauty and Virtue. His chief work was A System of Moral Philosophy, which was given to the world by his son after his death.

DR. MATTHEW TINDAL (1657-1733), turned Roman Catholic under James II., but afterwards became an unbeliever, and is well known for his attack on Christianity, entitled Christianity as Old as the Creation. Dr. Tindal's nephew, NICHOLAS TINDAL (1687-1774) was the continuer of the History of England left incomplete by Rapin.

HENRY HOME, LORD KAMES (1696-1782), a lawyer, judge and mental philosopher resided in Edinburgh, and there drew round him many of the leading thinkers and writers. His chief works were—Essays on the Principles of Morality and Religion, Introduction to the Art of Thinking, The Elements of Criticism, Sketches of the History of Man the last of which works is a collection of anecdotes and miscellaneous facts picked up in the course of his reading.

DR. SAMUEL CLARKE (1675-1729) one of the ablest metaphysicians that England has produced. He was a native of Norwich, was educated at Caius College Cambridge, and became chaplain to Bishop Moore of Norwich. In 1704 he delivered the Boyle Lectures, in which he brought forward his celebrated argument a priori for the being of a God, grand in conception but, like all arguments of that class, really resting on the a posteriori expressed or implied. He wrote on the Immutability and Immortality of the Soul, and translated Newton's Optics into Latin. In 1709 he was presented to the rectory of St. James's, and was appointed one of the Queen's chaplains. His controversies with the Trinitarians arose from his espousal of the Arian doctrine in his treatise on the Trinity. He defended the Newtonian philosophy against Leibnitz and in 1717 the papers were published. In 1724 he published seventeen sermons, partly metaphysical and partly practical. He refused the offer of the Mastership of the Mint in 1727. He died on the 17th of May, 1729. He has not the extensive grasp and original views of Locke, but he exhibits more of the accuracy of the dialectician. Many of his speculations are too refined. His moral system, which makes the rule of virtue consist in the fitness of things, or a "congruity of relations," and neglects the distinction and prior discernment of good ends from bad, has been condemned by the Butlerian school and modern moralists as too limited and confined. Dr. Clarke's style is simple, and free from meretricious adornment, vigorous and at times really eloquent, a model of philosophical and controversial writing.

DR. ADAM FERGUSON (1724-1816), a native of Perthshire, educated at St. Andrew's, Professor of Natural and Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, author of several works on philosophy and history, the chief of which are—A History of the Roman Republic, 1783, Principles of Moral and Political Science 1792.

JAMES BURNET LORD MONBODDO (1714-1799) a Scotch Judge, and an eccentric but learned writer, author of an Essay on the Origin and Progress of Language, 1771-3, and a Work on Ancient Metaphysics, 1779. Monboddo is best known for his theory of mankind having at one time possessed tails like other monkeys, but which by a long course of sitting have been worn away.

DAVID HARTLEY (1705-1757), was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, and practised medicine. He was the founder of a school embracing at one time a large number of English thinkers. He explained the various states of the mind by the principle of association. His chief work was Observations on Man &c., which appeared in 1749.

DR. RICHARD PRICE (1723-1791), a Nonconformist minister and writer on morals who endeavoured in his Review of the Principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals 1758 to revive the Cudworth school which traced moral obligation to the perceptions of the understanding. He wrote several able works on financial subjects, and was invited by the United States in 1778 to settle in America. In order to assist them in regulating their finances H. was a warm advocate of civil and religious liberty, and is best known in the history of literature by the attack made upon him by Burke, in his Reflections on the Revolution in France.

ABRAHAM TUCKER (1705-1774), an English country gentleman, who devoted himself to metaphysical studies. He held for the most part the Hartleian doctrines. His celebrated work was entitled The Light of Nature Pursued, 1769 (written under the name of Edward Search, Esq.).

DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY (1733-1804), an eminent Nonconformist minister who went over from the Calvinistic school of theology to the Unitarian. He was settled in Birmingham for some time and it was there that the rioters set fire to his house at the time of the French Revolution in 1791. His philosophical opinions were opposed to the Scotch school. In Matter and Spirit (1777) he inclined to materialism and necessity. A large number of tracts issued from his pen, which was ever kept at work from the assiduity of his opposers. Priestley shines most, however in experimental physics. He was one of the fathers of chemistry and made several discoveries in relation to light and colour. He left England for America in 1794, and died in Northumberland, Pennsylvania, in 1804.

DR. THOMAS REID (1710-1796) one of the founders of the Scotch School of Metaphysics, was a Presbyterian clergyman and Professor of Moral Philosophy first at King's College, Aberdeen and afterwards at Glasgow where he succeeded Adam Smith. His Inquiry into the Human Mind (1764) was directed against the Ideal system, and the scepticism of Hume. In 1785 he published his Essays on the Intellectual Powers and in 1788 his Essays on the Active Power of the Human Mind.

DEGALD STEWART (1753-1828) a pupil of Reid, whose philosophical system he adopted and taught with great elegance of style, was Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh from 1785 to 1810. His Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind appeared in 1792 and his Philosophical Essays on which his fame chiefly rests, in 1810. Sir James Mackintosh remarks that "it is in Essays of this kind that Stewart has most surpassed other cultivators of men's philosophy. His remarks on the effect of casual associations may be quoted as a specimen of the most original and just thoughts conveyed in the best manner."

DR. THOMAS BROWN (1778-1820), who properly belongs to the next century is mentioned here on account of his close connexion with Reid and Stewart. He succeeded the latter in the chair of Modern Philosophy at Edinburgh in 1810. As a philosopher he was distinguished by the power of analysis. He was also the author of several poems which are now forgotten.

HISTORIANS AND SCHOLARS

LORD LITTELTON (1709-1773), the first lord of this title and Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1756 is the author of a History of Henry II (1761-1767), a work of learning and research, but is perhaps best known by his Observations on the Conversion of St Paul. His poetry has gained for him a place in Johnson's Lives, but it is of slender merit.

THOMAS CARTER (1626-1754) the author of a History of England, coming down to 1654, and a Life of the Duke of Ormond was a strong Jacobite in politics.

DR. CONFERUS MIDDLETON (1693-1750), librarian of the University of Cambridge and one of the opponents of the celebrated Bentley. Indeed, he is said to have been the only adversary whom Bentley really feared. When the latter was deprived of his degree by the University, Middleton addressed to him a letter entitled 'The Rev Richard Bentley, late D.D.' Middleton is now best known for his Life of Cicero—a work of research, and written in an elegant and perspicuous style, but he also wrote several works on ecclesiastical history. His Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers possessed by the Christian Church advocates many of the views adopted by what is called the school of the modern Rationalists.

LORD HERVEY (1696-1743), the author of Memoirs of the Reign of George II., published first in 1848, under the editorship of Mr Croker. Hervey was in constant attendance upon Queen Caroline, the wife of George II., was a friend of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, and the object of Pope's severest satire, by the name of Sporus.

The Universal History, in 23 vols., was completed in 1760, under the care of Bower, Campbell, William Guthrie, and Psalmannazar Goldsmith wrote a preface for it, and received three guineas for the task.

WILLIAM TYTLER (1711-1782), the father of Alexander Fraser Tytler, the author of Elements of General History, was himself the author of an Inquiry into the Evidence against Mary Queen of Scots, and an Examination into the Histories of Robertson and Hume.

DR. THOMAS BIRCH (1705-1766) a clergyman, was the author of many laborious historical works, relating to modern history. He also published a General Dictionary, Historical and Critical and edited Thurloe's State Papers.

DR. ROBERT HENRY (1718-1780), a native of Shropshire, and clergyman in Lillingburgh, published a History of Great Britain, which was popular in its day. It extended to the reign of Henry the Eighth and treated at some extent, with the internal events, the manners and customs of the people.

DR. POTTER (1674-1747), born at Wakefield in Yorkshire, educated at University College, Oxford, Archbishop of Canterbury, best known for his work on the Antiquities of Greece, which was for a long time the chief authority on the subject.

BASIL HERRITT (1674-1714) was educated at Oxford, and became English chaplain at Leghorn, is known for his work on Roman Antiquities.

RICHARD PORSON (1759-1808), was born in Norfolk, of humble parents but became one of the greatest Greek scholars of the country, and in 1790 was appointed Greek Professor at Cambridge. Besides his well known contributions to classical literature, Porson deserves a place in English Literature, on account of the admirable style of his Letters to Archdeacon Travis (1780) upon the disputed verse in 1 John v. 7. His Adversaria were published after his death by Monk and Blomfield.

JOHN LOUIS DE LOURIE (1740-1806) published in 1775 a work on the Constitution of England. It was of value and an authority in its day, but is now supplanted by more modern works. Its interest to the student of English literature arises from the ease and skill with which a native of Geneva wrote our language.

MRS. CATHARINE MACAULAY (1733-1781), the wife of a physician, called by Walpole "the henbrood of faction" was the authoress of the celebrated Republican History of England during the Stuart Dynasty. This work received considerable attention at the time. It is of no great historical value, but the style is vigorous and popular. Mrs. Macaulay crossed the Atlantic and had an interview with George Washington. She even ventured to measure her strength against Burke, and attacked his work on the French Revolution.

WILLIAM ROSCOE (1753-1831) was born in Liverpool, and spent his early years at the desk of an attorney. In 1806 he was chosen member of parliament, but soon retired from public life, and steadily refused all applications which were made him to return. In 1786 he published The Life of Lorenzo de Medici which was one of the most popular works of the day. The style was easy, graceful and pleasing,

Leo X., which was published in 1805, did not attain the same popularity. There were questions of a most delicate nature to be discussed, the reformation presented points of deepest interest to Papist and to Protestant, and the historian had to guard against offending either party.

NATHANIEL HOOKE (d. 1764) a Roman Catholic, and a friend of Pope, the author of a Roman History, which was for a long time the standard work on the subject, but is deficient in criticism, and is now entirely superseded. Hooke was a warm partisan of the plebeians in their struggles with the patricians.

JACOB BRYANT (1716-1804), secretary to the Duke of Marlborough, who gave him a lucrative place in the Ordnance Office, was the author of several works on classical and mythological subjects. His fancy carried him often too far in paradox and speculation but he established and defended his theories with great ingenuity and research. His leading works were A New System or Analysis of Ancient Mythology 1774-76, On the Plain of Troy 1796, and On the Trojan War, 1798.

GILBERT WAKEFIELD (1756-1801) a well known writer on divinity, and a classical scholar. He left the church from Unitarian views and published a translation of the New Testament, and a work on the Evidences of Christianity in answer to Paley. He was found guilty of libel in his reply to the Bishop of Llandaff in defence of the revolution in France and imprisoned for two years. He was a hasty but honest man, "as violent against Greek accents as he was against the Trinity and anathematized the final v as strongly as episcopacy."

DR. GILBERT STUART (1742-1786) born in Edinburgh was an active writer in the Reviews, in which he attacked many of his contemporaries with extreme bitterness. He wrote a History of the Reformation of Religion in Scotland and a History of Scotland in which he vehemently attacks Robertson.

DR. WARNER (d. 1767) and DR. LELAND (1722-1785) published histories of Ireland the latter was author of the well known translation of Demosthenes.

The History of Manchester and Indication of Mary Queen of Scots by JOHN WHITTAKER (1735-1808), deserve a passing mention.

REV. JAMES GRANGER'S (d. 1773) Biographical History of England, which was continued by Noble, may still be consulted with advantage.

JAMES MACPHERSON (1736-1798), mentioned in the next chapter in connexion with the poems of Ossian (p. 394), appeared as a historian and defender of the Tories in his History of Great Britain from the Restoration to the Accession of the House of Hanover, 1776, a work of some value from the private history which it reveals.

LORD HAILES, SIR DAVID DALRYMPLE (1720-1792) was a well known lawyer and judge, a man of great erudition, and author of Annals of Scotland, published in 1776 and other legal and historical works.

Robertson's History of Charles I was continued by ROBERT WATSON (d. 1780) Professor of Logic at St. Andrew's, in a History of Philip II, a work of no merit.

DR. WILLIAM RUSSELL (1741-1793), born at Selkirk, the author of a history of Modern Europe which is now superseded by Mr. Dyer's.

MALCOLM LAING (1782-1818), born in Orkney, which he represented for some time in Parliament, wrote a History of Scotland, from the Union of the Crowns on the accession of James VI to the throne of England, to the Union of the Kingdoms in the reign of Queen Anne.

JOHN PINKERTON (1758-1826) born in Edinburgh, a laborious and learned writer, the author of numerous works among which may be mentioned a History of Scotland, Modern Geography, Travels and Travels, &c.

MISCELLANEOUS WRITERS.

PHILIP DORNER STANHOPE, EARL OF CHESTERFIELD (1694-1773), was one of the most accomplished men in the Court of the Georges, but his only lasting contribution to literature is his Letters containing advice to his son. The style is agreeable, but the moral tone is low, Mr. Johnson said it taught the morals of a courtesan and the manners of a dancing master, but something of this severity must be set down to the relation which subsisted between Johnson and Chesterfield. The speeches, essays, &c., with memoir of Chesterfield were published by Dr. Maty in 1774. The copyright of Chesterfield's Letters realized 1600*l.*, and in the year succeeding their publication five editions were distributed.

THOMAS AMORY (1692-1789) a native of Ireland, was educated as a physician, and resided in Westminster. As a writer he is humorous, but pedantic. His chief works were—Memoirs, containing the Lives of several Ladies of Great Britain 1755,

CHAPTER XIX

THE DAWN OF ROMANTIC POETRY

- § 1 Revolution in popular taste The Minstrel of BEATTIE The Grave by BLAIR The Spleen by GRAY § 2 JAMES THOMSON The Seasons The Castle of Indolence Ode to Liberty Tragedy of Sophonisba § 3 The Schoolmistress of SHENSTONE The Odes of COLLINS The Pleasures of the Imagination by ARLENSIDE § 4 THOMAS GRAY Ode on Eton College Elegy written in a Country Churchyard Pindaric Odes § 5 JOSEPH and THOMAS WARTON History of English Poetry § 6 WILLIAM COWPER His life The Task, Table-Talk Tirocinium Translation of Homer Characteristics of his poetry § 7 Poems of a technical character The Shipwreck by FALCONER Loves of the Plants by DARWIN § 8 Literary forgeries MACPHERSON'S Ossian § 9 CHATFIELD'S forgeries IRELAND'S forgeries § 10 GEORGE CRABBE His life and writings § 11 ROBERT BURNS His life and writings § 12 JOHN WOLCOT, better known as PETER PINDAR § 13 History of the Comic Drama from the middle of the eighteenth century GARRICK, FOOT, CUMBERLAND, the two COLMANs, and SHERIDAN The Rivals the School for Scandal, the Critic, and the Rehearsal

§ 1 THE great revolution in popular taste and sentiment which substituted what is called the romantic type in literature for the cold and clear-cut artificial spirit of that classicism which is exhibited in its highest form in the writings of Pope was, like all powerful and durable movements, whether in politics or in letters, gradual. The mechanical perfection of the poetry of the age of Queen Anne had been imitated with such success that every versifier had caught the trick of melody and the neat antithetical opposition of thought, and indications soon began to be perceptible of a tendency to seek for subjects and forms of expressions in a wider, more passionate, and more natural sphere of nature and emotion. In the Minstrel of JAMES BEATTIE (1735-1803), in the striking meditative lines entitled The Grave by ROBERT BLAIR (1699-1746), this tendency is perceptible, and may be in some measure ascribed to the weariness inspired by the eternal repetition of the neat and epigrammatic ingenuity which had gradually become a mere far-off echo of Pope. Under the influence of this weariness, poets began to seek for materials in a more direct and picturesque reproduction of nature, and endeavoured to give freshness to their diction by rebaptising it in the deep and sparkling fountains of our older literature.

The principal agent, however, in this revolution was Bishop Percy, whose publication in 1765 of the Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, of which I shall speak more fully in the next chapter, showed the world what treasures of beauty, pathos, and magnificence lay buried in the old Minstrel ballads of the Middle Ages. In the poets who will form the subject of this chapter, extending from Thomson to Burns, we shall see how gradual the movement was. I cannot omit all mention of MATTHEW GREEN (1696-1737), whose pleasant and truly original poem The Spleen was written to point out the mode of remedying that insupportable species of moral depression. It is written in easy octosyllabic verse, and contains a multitude of passages where new ideas are expressed in singularly felicitous images. The prevailing tone is cheerful and philosophic, and is highly honourable not only to the talents but to the principles of the author. Green was originally a dissenter, but his work shows no traces of sectarian gloom and narrow-mindedness. He is said to have been himself a sufferer from the malady he describes, which was long satirically supposed to be peculiarly common in England. and, like Burton, he wrote on melancholy to divert his mind from its sufferings.

§ 2 JAMES THOMSON (1700-1748) is the poet who connects the age of Pope with that of Crabbe, and it is delightful to think of the sympathy and appreciation shown to his gorgeous and picturesque genius by the former of these great writers, who hailed his appearance with warm admiration. Thomson was born in a rural and retired corner of Scotland, in 1700, and after receiving his education at Edinburgh, came to London, like Smollett, sixteen years later, "smit with the love of sacred song," and eager to try his fortune in a literary career. He carried with him the unfinished sketch of his poem of Winter, which he showed to his countryman Mallet, then enjoying some authority as a critic, and was advised by him to complete and publish it. Thomson at first adopted the profession of private tutor, and was entrusted with the care of the son of Lord Binning, after which he entered the family of the Chancellor Talbot, and travelled with the son of that dignitary in Italy. The poem of Winter appeared in 1726, and was received with great favour, obtaining the warm suffrages of Pope, then supreme in the literary world, and who not only gave advice to the young aspirant, but even corrected and retouched several passages in his works. Summer was given to the world in the succeeding year, and Thomson then without delay issued proposals for the completion of the whole cycle of poems, Spring and Autumn being still wanting to fill up the round of the Seasons. The patronage of Talbot, by conferring on Thomson a place in the Chancellor's gift, assisted the poet in attaining independence, but losing this post on the death of the minister, its loss was afterwards supplied first with one, and afterwards with another sinecure post which soon placed the poet out of the reach of difficulty. Though somewhat sensual and extraordinarily indolent and self-indulgent, Thomson was not devoid of the prudence so general among his countrymen. He purchased a snug cottage near Richmond, and lived in modest luxury and literary ease. He was of an extremely kind and generous disposition, and his devotion to his relations is an amiable trait in his character. He was also generally loved, and does not appear to have had a single enemy or ill-wisher. His death was premature, for, catching cold in a boating-party on the Thames, he died of a fever in the 48th year of his age. During the years of his happy retirement he had not only revised and corrected innumerable passages of his Seasons, but had time to compose his delightful half-serious, half-playful poem of the Castle of Indolence, the most enchanting of the many imitations of the style and manner of Spenser, and a work which, at the same time possesses the finest qualities of Thomson's own natural genius. He was also the author of a somewhat declamatory and ambitious poem on the tempting but impracticable subject of Liberty, and of a few tragedies, some of which, as Sophonisba, were acted with temporary success. The Seasons, consisting of the four detached poems, Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter, must be considered as the corner-stone of Thomson's literary fame. It is a poem, in plan and treatment, entirely original, and gives a general, and at the same time a minute description of all the phenomena of Nature during an English year. Perhaps the very uncertainty of our climate, by giving greater variety to our scenery and greater vicissitudes to our weather than can be seen in more apparently favoured countries, as Italy or Greece, was favourable to Thomson's undertaking, which could hardly have prospered in the hands of a poet who might have been born in more genial climes. It is certain that he has watched every fleeting smile or frown on the ever-changing face of Nature with a loving and an observant eye, there is hardly a phase of external appearance, hardly an incident in the great drama of the seasons which he has not depicted with consummate success. He is especially happy in sketching the manners of birds and domestic animals, and every line of his poem breathes an ardent benevolence and a deep sense of the majesty and goodness of God. The metre is blank-verse, which, though seldom showing anything of the Miltonic swell or tenderness, is rich and harmonious. Thomson's chief defect is a kind of pompous struggle after fine language, which sometimes degenerates into ludicrous vulgarity. In order to relieve the monotony of a poem entirely devoted to description, he has occasionally introduced episodes or incidental pictures more or less naturally suggested by the subject. Thus, in his Winter he gives the famous description of the shepherd losing his way and perishing in the snow, in Summer the story of Musidora bathing, in Autumn the narrative of Lavinia, which is borrowed, and spoiled in the borrowing, from the exquisite pastoral story of Ruth and Boaz. In such of these episodes as involve the passion of love, it must be confessed that Thomson's mode of delineating that feeling is far more ardent than ideal. In point of literary finish the Castle of Indolence is superior to the Seasons. The idea and treatment of this poem are Spenserian, and the versification, borrowed from the languid and dreamy melody of the Faerie Queene, corresponds admirably with the rich and luxurious imagery in which Thomson revelled. The allegory of the enchanted "Land of Drowsihead," in which the unhappy victims of Indolence find themselves hopeless captives, and their delivery from durance by the Knight Industry, whose pedigree and training are given in an exact imitation of Spenser's manner, are relieved with occasional touches of a sly and pleasant humour, as in those passages where Thomson has drawn portraits of himself and of his friends. Hardly has Spenser himself surpassed the rich and dreamy loveliness or the voluptuous melody of the description of the enchanted Castle and its gardens of delight, and the strains of the Æolian harp, then a recent invention, are described in stanzas whose music forms a most appropriate echo to its harmonies.

§ 3 A passing notice will suffice for WILLIAM SHENSTONE (1714-1763), whose popularity, once considerable, has now given place to oblivion, but whose pleasing and original poem the Schoolmistress will deserve to retain a place in every collection of English verse. He is still more remarkable as having been one of the first to cultivate that picturesque mode of laying out gardens, and developing by well-concealed art the natural beauties of scenery, which, under the name of the English style, has supplanted the majestic but formal manner of Italy, France, and Holland. In the former Nature is followed and humoured, in the latter she is forced. The Schoolmistress is in the Spenserian stanza and antique diction, and with a delightful mixture of quaint playfulness and tender description, paints the dwelling, the character, and the pursuits of an old village dame who keeps a rustic day-school. The Pastoral ballads of Shenstone are melodious, but the thin current of natural feeling which pervades them cannot make the reader forget the improbability of the Arcadian manners, such as never existed in any age or country, or the querulous and childish tone of thought.

The career of WILLIAM COLLINS (1721-1759) was brief and unhappy. He exhibited from very early years the strong poetical powers of a genius which, ripened by practice and experience, would have made him the first lyrical writer of his age, but his ambition was rather feverish than sustained, he led a life of projects and dissipation, and the first shock of literary disappointment drove him to despondency, despondency to indulgence, and indulgence to insanity. This gifted being died at 38, after suffering the cruellest affliction and humiliation that can oppress humanity. He was educated at Winchester School, and afterwards at Magdalen College, Oxford, and entered upon the career of professional literature, full of golden dreams, and meditating vast projects. His first publication was Persian Eclogues (1742), transferring the usual sentiments of pastoral to the scenery and manners of the East. Oriental, or Persian, incidents were for the first time made the subjects of compositions retaining in their form and general cast of thought and language the worn-out type of pastoral. Thus the lamentation of the shepherd expelled from his native fields is replaced by a camel-driver bewailing the dangers and solitude of his desert journey, and the dialogues so frequent in the bucolics of Virgil or Theocritus are transferred into the amœbean complaints of two Circassian viles. The national character and sentiments of the East, though every effort is made by the poet to give local colouring and appropriate costume and scenery, are in no sense more true to nature than in the majority of pictures representing the fabulous Arcadia of the poets, and though these eclogues exhibit traces of vivid imagery, and melodious verse, the real genius of Collins must be looked for in his Odes (1746). Judged by these, though they are but few in number, he will be found entitled to a very high place for true warmth of colouring, power of personification, and dreamy sweetness of harmony, no English poet had till then appeared that could be compared to Collins. His most commonly quoted lyric is the ode entitled The Passions, in which Fear, Rage, Pity, Joy, Hope, Melancholy, and other abstract qualities are successively introduced trying their skill on different musical instruments. Their respective choice of these, and the manner in which each Passion acquits itself, is very ingeniously conceived. Moreover, many of the less popular odes, as those addressed to Fear, to Pity, to Simplicity, and that On the Poetical Character, contain happy strokes, sometimes expressed in wonderfully laconic language, and singularly vivid portraiture. Collins possessed to an unusual degree the power of giving life and personality to an abstract conception, and that this power is exceedingly rare may be seen by the predominant coldness and pedantry which generally prevail in modern lyric poetry, where personification has been abused till it has become a mere mechanical artifice. In Collins the prosopopœia is always fresh and vivid. In the unfinished Ode on the Superstitions of the Highlands there are many fine touches of fancy and description but the reader cannot divest himself of a consciousness

§ 4 The greatest of the exclusively lyrical poets that England had hitherto produced was THOMAS GRAY (1716-1771), a man of vast and varied acquirements, and whose life was devoted to the cultivation of letters. He was the son of a respectable London money-scrivener, but his father was a man of violent and arbitrary character, and the poet owed everything to the tender care of an excellent mother, who endured cruel treatment from her tyrannical husband. He received his education at Eton, and afterwards settled in learned retirement at Cambridge, where he passed nearly the whole of his life. He travelled in France and Italy as the friend of Horace Walpole, but quarrelling with his companion he returned home alone. Fixing himself at Cambridge, he soon acquired a high poetical reputation by his beautiful Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College, published in 1747, which was followed, at pretty frequent intervals, by his other imposing and highly-finished works, the Elegy written in a Country Churchyard (1751), the Pindaric Odes, and the far from numerous but splendid productions which make up his works. His quiet and studious retirement was only broken by occasional excursions to the North of England, and other holiday journeys, of which he has given in his letters so vivid and animated a description. His correspondence with his friends, and particularly with the poet Mason, is remarkable for interesting details, descriptions, and reflections, and is indeed, like that of Cowper, among the most delightful records of a thoughtful and literary life. Gray refused the Laureateship, which was proposed to him on the death of Cibber, but eleven years later accepted the appointment of Professor of Modern History in the University, though he never performed the functions of that chair, his fastidious temper and ardour for knowledge keeping him perpetually engaged in forming vast literary projects which he never executed. He appears not to have been popular among his colleagues, his haughty, retiring and extremely serious character prevented him from sympathising with the indolent Cambridge of that day, and he was at little pains to conceal his contempt for academical society. His industry was untiring, and his acquirements undoubtedly immense, for he had pushed his researches far beyond the usual limits of ancient classical philology, and was not only deeply versed in the romance literature of the Middle Ages, in modern French and Italian, but had studied the then-almost unknown departments of Scandinavian and Celtic poetry. Constant traces may be found in all his works of the degree to which he had assimilated the spirit not only of the Greek lyric poetry, but the finest perfume of the great Italian writers. Many passages of his works are a kind of mosaic of thought and imagery borrowed from Pindar, from the choral portions of the Attic tragedy, and from the majestic lyrics of the Italian poets of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. but though the substance of these mosaics may be borrowed from a multitude of sources, the fragments are, so to say, fused into one solid body by the intense flame of a powerful and fervent imagination. His finest lyric compositions are the Odes entitled The Bard, that on the Progress of Poesy, the Installation Ode on the Duke of Grafton's election to the Chancellorship of the University, and the short but truly noble Hymn to Adversity, which breathes the severe and lofty spirit of the highest Greek lyric inspiration. The Elegy written in a Country Churchyard is a masterpiece from beginning to end. The thoughts indeed are obvious enough, but the dignity with which they are expressed, the immense range of allusion and description with which they are illustrated, and the finished grace of the language and versification in which they are embodied, give to this work something of that wonderful perfection of design and execution which we see in an antique statue or a sculptured gem. In The Bard, starting from the picturesque idea of a Welsh poet and patriot contemplating the victorious invasion of his country by Edward I, he passes in prophetic review the whole panorama of English History, and gives a series of most animated events and personages from the thirteenth to the sixteenth century. It is true that he is occasionally turgid, but the general march of the poem has a rush and a glow worthy of Pindar himself. The phantoms of the great and the illustrious flit before us like the shadowy kings in the weird procession in Macbeth, and the unity of sentiment is maintained first by the gratified vengeance with which the prophet foresees the crimes and sufferings of the oppressors of his country and their descendants, and by the triumphant prediction of the glorious reign of the Tudor race in Britain. In the odes entitled The Fatal Sisters and The Descent of Odin, Gray translated or paraphrased from the Scandinavian legends. The tone of the Norse poetry is on the whole very faithfully reproduced, and the fiery and gigantic imagery of the ancient Scalds was for the first time made accessible in English, and though the chants retain some echoes of the sentiment and versification of more modern and polished literature, these attempts to revive the rude and archaic grandeur of the mythological traditions of the Eddas deserve no niggardly meed of approbation. In general Gray may be said to overcolour his language, and to indulge occasionally in an excess of ornament and personification, he will nevertheless be always regarded as a lyric poet of a very high order, and as one who brought an immense store of varied and picturesque erudition to feed the fire of a rich and powerful fancy.

§ 5 The poetical instinct must have been unusually strong in the family of the Warton's to have made three of its members more or less distinguished at the same time. The two brothers, JOSEPH WARTON (1722-1800) and THOMAS WARTON (1728-1790) were the sons of a Professor of Poetry at Oxford, and both brothers, especially the younger, deserve a place in the annals of our literature. Joseph was head master of Winchester School, and his brother Thomas, an Oxford Fellow, and during some time poet laureate, was a pleasing writer, one of the first to infuse into his writings a taste for the romantic sentiment. He rendered great service to literature by his agreeable but unfinished History of English Poetry, which unfortunately comes to an abrupt termination just as the author is about to enter upon the glorious period of the Elizabethan era, but the work is valuable for research and a warm tone of appreciative criticism. Thomas Warton exhibited his knowledge of and fondness for Milton's Minor Poems in an excellent edition, enriched with valuable notes. The best of his own original verses are sonnets, breathing a peculiar tender softness of feeling and showing much picturesque fancy. His brother's talent, though inferior, has a strong family resemblance to his.

§ 6 The progress which carried our national taste most rapidly from the correct and artificial type of Pope in the direction of the real sympathies of general humanity is most strongly exemplified in the writings of WILLIAM COWPER (1731-1800). He is eminently the poet of the domestic affections and the exponent of that strong religious feeling which, originating in the revival of Evangelical piety generated by the preaching of Wesley and Whitefield, began to penetrate and modify all the relations of social life. His story is singularly sad. He was of ancient and even illustrious race, the grandnephew of Lord Chancellor Cowper, and was born with an extremely tender and impressionable character. After being cowed by bullying at a private school he was sent to Westminster School, and afterwards placed in an attorney's office, where one of his desk companions was Thurlow, afterwards celebrated as Chancellor for his sternness and political bigotry, and here he acquired some knowledge of the law, though he was destined never to practise it as his profession.

Obtaining the nomination to a comfortable and lucrative post, that of Clerk of the Journals to the House of Lords, Cowper's sensitive and morbid disposition was so terrified at the idea of making a public appearance, that he fell into a gloomy despondency, and attempted to put an end to his existence. An attack of madness rendered it necessary that he should be confined in an asylum, from whence he was after some time discharged, with his intellect restored indeed, but with his sensitive nature so deeply shaken that any active career in life had become an impossibility. Possessing a small income, and assisted by his family, he passed the remainder of his life in the country, having soon become a bosom-friend and inmate in the family of Mr Unwin, a clergyman in Huntingdon. His virtues and accomplishments inspired every person in the small circle with which he was in contact with the tenderest attachment, and with Mrs Unwin in particular he laid the foundation of a tender and lifelong friendship. Cowper's mind, always impressionable, and still smarting under the tremendous affliction which it had undergone, became morbidly susceptible of enthusiastic religious impressions, and in the occasional relapses of his dreadful malady his hallucinations took that most unhappy form of mental disease—a form unfortunately the most common in England—of religious despair. The strong and elastic mind of Bunyan, and his natural cheerfulness of disposition, was able to triumph over these gloomy phantoms; but Cowper's more feminine organisation succumbed in the trial. On the death of Unwin he removed, with the widow, to Olney (1767), where he made the friendship of John Newton, a man of great eloquence, and who professed the theology of the more Calvinistic section of the English Church. This connexion was probably injurious to Cowper in his morbid state. By perpetually dwelling upon mysterious and gloomy religious questions, and by encouraging the fatal habit of analysing his own internal sensations, the poet's tendency to enthusiasm was aggravated, and, though it could not diminish the charm of his genius, or the benevolence of his heart, this religious fanaticism entirely destroyed the happiness of his life. In 1773 and the two following years he suffered a relapse of his malady, on recovering from which he endeavoured to calm his shattered spirits with a variety of innocent amusements, gardening, carpentering, and taming hares. He began to cultivate literature at first merely as a pastime, and as a means of distracting his attention from his own more than half-imaginary sufferings, but the force, originality, and grace of his genius soon acquired popularity, and he pursued as a profession what he had at first taken up as a diversion. His poetical talent did not flower until late: his first important publication did not appear till he had reached middle life. His first poems, Table-Talk, Progress of Error, Conversation, and others, were given to the world in 1782, but the volume was not popular, and indeed did not really exhibit Cowper's full powers. Then his friend Lady Austen, a woman of cheerful, accomplished mind, playfully gave him the Sofa as a subject. Upon this he composed his poem of The Task (1785). His most laborious but least successful undertaking was the translation into English blank verse of the Iliad. He justly considered that the next and artificial style of Pope had done but scant justice to the father of Greek poetry, but in endeavouring to give greater force and vigour to his own version, he fell into the opposite fault to that of Pope, and made his translation harsh and rugged, without approaching one whit nearer to the true character of his original. Cowper left Olney in 1786, and during the rest of his life made several changes of residence. In 1796 Mrs. Unwin died, and this loss clouded the remaining days of the unhappy poet with redoubled gloom.

The longer and more important poems of Cowper are written in a peculiar and entirely original manner, and on a plan then entirely new in literature. They contain a union of reflection, satire, description, and moral declamation. His great poem, The Task, is in blank verse, in the others he has employed rhyme. His aim was to keep up a natural and colloquial style, and he is the declared enemy of all the pomp of diction which was at that time regarded as essential to poetry. His pictures of life and nature, whether of rural scenery or of indoor life, have seldom been surpassed for truth and picturesqueness, and his satirical sketches of the follies and absurdities of manners, and his indignant denunciations of national offences against piety and morality, are equally remarkable, in the one case, for sharpness and humour, and in the other for a lofty grandeur of sentiment. The district in which he lived is one of the least romantic in England, yet nothing more victoriously proves that true poetical genius can give a charm and an interest to the most unpromising subjects, than the fact that Cowper has communicated to the level banks of the Ouse a magic that will never pass away. Similarly the quiet home circle of middle English life, the tea-table, the newspaper, and the hearth, have derived from him a beauty and a dignity which other men have failed to communicate to the proudest scenes of camps and courts. Though the morbid and fanatical religious system of Cowper has here and there tinged his works, the natural goodness and benevolence of his disposition more than neutralise the impression such passages produce, and in many of his comic and humorous delineations we see in full effulgence a playful gaiety which no cloud can dim. Of all our poets Cowper is essentially the painter of domestic life, and his writings have deeply incorporated themselves into the tissue of our household existence. Their mixture of worldly observation, delicate painting of nature, and intense religious feeling peculiarly endear them to the great middle class in England. Many of Cowper's shorter lyrics are sweet and true in thought and expression, and his beautiful lines On Receiving my Mother's Picture will ever be read with delight. His comic ballad John Gilpin is a pleasant drollery. But his last verses, The Castaway, give a painful reflection of his despairing and unhappy creed. Cowper's letters are perhaps the most charming in the language, they show the poet in his most amiable light, and invest every trifle which surrounds him with a sort of halo of purity and goodness.

§ 7 Several poems have appeared in England possessing what may be called a technical character, being either devoted to the teaching of some art, or describing some special sport or amusement. I may mention ARMSTRONG'S Art of Preserving Health, GRAINGER'S Sugar-Cane, PHILIPS'S Cyder, and SOMERVILLE'S Chase. Many of these works, in spite of the impracticable nature of their subjects, show considerable power of execution, and contain passages of excellence, but the most popular and successful work of this kind is the Shipwreck of WILLIAM FALCONER (1732-1769), a self-taught poet, who, as a professional seaman, had himself witnessed the calamity he describes so well. He was born in 1732, and perished at sea in a man-of-war which sailed on a cruise in 1769, and was last seen off the Cape. Falconer's principal work, the Shipwreck, is a narrative poem in three cantos, detailing the danger and ultimate loss of a merchant-ship on a voyage to Venice, which is cast away, after experiencing a violent gale in the Greek archipelago, on the dangerous rocks of Cape Colonna, the ancient Sunium. The description of the vessel, of her various manœuvres during the hurricane, and of the ultimate destruction which she encounters, are all strictly in accordance with nautical experience. Every detail of seamanship is given in its proper technical language, and the poem has not only the merit of vigorous and correct painting of nature under her wildest aspects of storm and terror, but is minutely accurate in point of seamanship. Falconer wisely and with good taste did not scruple to use the terms of his art, and has thus not only given truth and vivacity to his picture, but has produced a work that may serve the young navigator as a sort of grammar of his art. He was the author of a useful Dictionary of Marine Terms, and the accurate practical knowledge which he possessed of the details of his noble profession he has in his poem clothed with the charm of no ignoble verse. The least interesting portions of the poem are the romantic and sentimental details with which he clothes the persons of his officers, but no one ever read the Shipwreck without following, with breathless interest, the course of the fated ship from Candia to her death-struggle among the breakers of Cape Colonna.

To the department of technical poetry belongs also ERASMUS DARWIN (1731-1802), who endeavoured to cloth in dazzling and somewhat tinsel splendour the principles of the Linnæan sexual system of vegetable physiology. Darwin was a man of unquestionable genius, and even of large scientific acquirements, but he unfortunately guided himself by the notion that poetry must address itself to the senses rather than to the sentiments, and produced a series of pictures which strike the fancy but never touch the heart. Every object he struggled to present vividly, as it were, to the eye; and his abuse of personification, which is repeated so as to become a wearisome as it is generally fantastical, together with his meretricious and tawdry diction, though it gave him a great momentary popularity, has condemned him to neglect within half a century. His principal work is the Botanic Garden, the first part of which was entitled the Economy of Vegetation, and the second the Loves of the Plants. He wrote another poem, entitled The Temple of Nature, or, the Origin of Society. The system which he wrote to illustrate gave him but too abundant opportunity of indulging in that highly-coloured and somewhat sensual vein of description and impersonation which he carried to excess, and the elaborate and ambitious melody of his versification has not sufficed to compensate for the overwrought and fatiguing monotony of his imagery. The decline of his fame, once very great, may also in some degree be attributed to a tendency in his doctrines, which some readers blame as not slightly tinged with materialism. Many of his episodes and subordinate descriptions exhibit a great force of language and a powerful faculty of the picturesque.

§ 8 The middle of the eighteenth century was remarkable for several nearly contemporaneous attempts at literary imposture—the poetical forgeries of Macpherson, Chatterton, and Ireland. The first of these three has alone survived, in some part, the ordeal of strict critical examination, and that because, though the totality of the works palmed upon the public as Ossian's have no claim whatever to the character arrogated for them by their pretended translator, they are nevertheless filled with names, incidents, and allusions really traceable to Celtic antiquity. JAMES MACPHERSON (1738-1796) was a Scotchman, and a sort of literary adventurer of rather equivocal reputation. Originally a country schoolmaster, and afterwards a tutor, he pretended to have accumulated, in his travels through the Highlands of Scotland, an immense mass of fragments of ancient poetry composed in the Gaelic or Erse dialect common to that country and Ireland. The first portion of these—not, however, a very large one—he showed to Home, the author of the once-admired Tragedy of Douglas, and they were printed (1760), exciting intense enthusiasm, and soon giving ground to one of the most vehement controversies that have ever raged among antiquarians and literary men. The translations, which Macpherson professed to have made from the originals, were composed in a pompous and declamatory rhetorical sort of prose, something like the versions of the poetical portions of the Scriptures. The Highlanders, eager for the honour of their country, maintained the authenticity of these poems, and asserted that the name of Ossian, the supposed author, as well as innumerable persons, descriptions, and historical events mentioned in them, had been familiar to their memories as the legends of their childhood. The Southern critics, however, among whom

Johnson occupied a foremost place, expressed the strongest scepticism, basing their disbelief upon the want of evidence that there existed among the Scottish Celts any written literature approaching in antiquity to the date assigned to the fragments, and also upon the impossibility of such a state of society and such refined and chivalrous sentiments ever having prevailed among so rude a people as the Highlanders were at the supposed period. Macpherson might at once have settled the question by producing the supposed originals, a philological and critical examination of which would, of course, have instantly decided their degree of authenticity and the age and country which produced them, but this Macpherson, after much shuffling, refused to do, under the pretext that his honour had been impeached. He afterwards published two long poems in the same style, Fingal (1762) and Temora (1763), which he attributed, like the preceding fragments, to the genius of the Celtic Homer. The regularity of construction in these works, the numerous passages in them as well as in their predecessors evidently plagiarised from the whole range of literature, from the Bible and Homer down to Shakspeare, Milton, and even Thomson, the artificial and monotonous though strained and highly-wrought diction, and above all the sentiments in constant discordance with the real manners of the ancient Highlanders would have sufficed, even in the general ignorance of the Gaelic language, to undeceive all except those who were ignorantly carried away by the imposing but hollow magnificence of the style. More accurate investigation established that though these poems are crowded with names and allusions which really abound in the old Irish and Highland legends, no entire poem, nay, no considerable fragment of a poem, has ever been found in the least corresponding with any of Macpherson's pretended discoveries. Yet more, the scanty remains of Celtic verse attributed upon more solid grounds to Ossian, have a character totally different, and evidently belong to an age considerably later than that assigned by him, for they contain allusions to Christianity, of which there is no trace in the pretended antiquities of Macpherson. The wild and overstrained style and imagery of Ossian long made Macpherson's forgeries enormously popular throughout Europe, poetry and painting, and even the stage, were filled with the "daughters of the snow," "car-borne heroes," and misty phantoms. In Germany the admiration was long in subsiding, the mania for Ossianic imagery extended even to Russia, and perhaps the only poetry which attracted the imagination of Napoleon was the wild declamatory rhapsody which left no faint traces upon his bulletins. The vague yet monotonous imagery, the sham and theatrical sentiment, and the colossal amplifications of these works, while operating fatally upon their authenticity, will perhaps always give them a sort of charm to the taste of young and uncultivated readers. Maepherson accumulated a considerable fortune, became a political pamphleteer, sat in Parliament, and died without leaving any clue to elucidate the true secret of what is now considered an audacious imposture.

§ 9 The annals of literature hardly present a more extraordinary example of precocious genius than that of THOMAS CHATTERTON (1752-1770), nor an instance of a career more brief and melancholy. Born in 1752, the posthumous son of a cathedral sub-chantor and schoolmaster at Bristol, he died, by suicide, before he had completed his eighteenth year. Within this short interval he gave evidence of powers that would in all probability have placed him at the head of the poets of his day, and he executed a series of literary forgeries which have hardly any parallel for extent and ingenuity. He produced at eleven years of age verses which will more than bear a comparison with the early poems of any author; and though he had received little education beyond that of a Blue Coat school, he conceived the project of deceiving all the learned of his age, and creating, it may almost be said, a whole literature of the past. He was passionately fond of black letter, heraldry, and old architecture, and his imagination had probably been fired by the numerous fine remains of mediæval building in which Bristol abounds. One of the most remarkable of these is the noble old church of St Mary Redcliffe, of which his grandfather had been sexton, and which was the place of sepulture of Canynge, a rich citizen of Bristol, and benefactor to the church in the reign of Edward IV. In the monument-room of this edifice had been kept a chest called Canynge's coffer, in which had been preserved charters and other documents connected with Canynge's benefactions to the church. Many of these had been removed, but there remained a large mass of parchments which had been thrown aside as of no value, and had been employed by Chatterton's father for covering his scholars' copy-books. The young poet, familiarised with the sight of these antiquated writings, conceived the idea of forging a whole series of documents, which he pretended either to have found in Canynge's coffer, or to have transcribed from originals in that mysterious receptacle. These he produced gradually, generally taking advantage of some topic of public interest to bring forward and contribute either to the local newspapers or to his acquaintances in the town, the pretended originals or transcripts from the pretended originals having some relation to the matter in hand. Thus on the occasion of the opening of a new bridge over the Avon he produced an account of processions, tournaments, religious solemnities and other ceremonies which had taken place on the opening of the old bridge. To Mr Burgum, an honest pewterer of Bristol, who happened to have a taste for heraldry, he gave a pedigree tracing his descent to Simon de Seynet Lyze, earl of Northampton. Horace Walpole was then writing his Anecdotes of British Painters. Chatterton furnished him with a long list of mediæval artists who had flourished in Bristol. All these documents, which he pretended to have found in the chest of the muniment-room, he fathered upon a priest, Thomas Rowley, whom he represents to have been employed by the munificent Canynge as a sort of agent for collecting works of art, who was the author of the poems that constitute the majority of the parchments. The poems are of immense variety and unquestionable merit, and though modern criticism will instantly detect in them, as did Gray and Mason when Walpole submitted some of them to their opinion, the most glaring marks of forgery, yet their brilliancy and their number were enough to deceive many learned scholars in an age when minute antiquarian knowledge of the Middle Ages was much rarer than at present. Besides, the apparent impossibility of such works being produced by an uneducated boy, without aid and without apparent motive, still further intensified the mystery. In those documents which Chatterton tried to pass off as originals he imitated as near as he could the antiquated handwriting, which his practice as an attorney's clerk assisted him to do. He also carefully discoloured his parchment, and used every means to give it an air of antiquity. In those documents, far more numerous, which he brought forward as copies or transcripts of originals, he trusted to an elaborate grotesqueness of style and spelling, he carefully introduced every quaint odd-looking word which he picked up in some English glossaries and dictionaries that he greedily studied. No task is so difficult as that of successfully imitating ancient compositions, and the wonder is rather that Chatterton should have done this without immediate exposure than that he should have fallen into errors which detect him at once. Thus in his eagerness to incrust his diction with the rust, the æruugo, of antiquity he overlays his words with such an accumulation of consonants as belong to no orthography of any age of our language. And this æruugo is merely superficial. divested of their fantastic spelling, his lines have the cadence and the regularity of modern composition, and the grammatical structure in no respect differs from the English of the eighteenth century. He has also, as was inevitable, sometimes made a slip in the use of an old word, as when he borrowed the expression mortmal which occurs in Chaucer's description of the Cook, he employed it, having forgotten its meaning, to signify, not a disease, the gangrene, but a dish. In the same way he uses the word drawing in the modern sense, whereas it was unquestionably never employed with that meaning till in comparatively modern times. Of the same kind are his innumerable examples of impossible architecture and heraldry at variance with every principle of the art. Burning with pride, hope, and literary ambition, the unhappy lad, after writing a wild and deistical paper which he called his will, betook himself to London, and unsuccessfully attempted to gain a subsistence as a political pamphleteer and satirical poet. He was a professed deist, but he was free from the grosser vices, and he was not only frugal and industrious, but always showed himself a most affectionate son and brother. After struggling a short time with distress and with dire starvation, in London, he shut himself up in despair in his miserable garret, tore up all his manuscripts, and poisoned himself with a dose of arsenic on the 24th of August, 1770. Singularly enough his acknowledged poems, though indicating very great powers, are manifestly inferior to those written in the assumed character of Thomas Rowley. The best of these are a tragical interlude Ælla, the ballad of Sir Charles Bawdin, both connected with the ancient history of Bristol, the ballad Charitas, and several pastorals, which, like that entitled Elinour and Juga, betray by their very nature the impossibility of their having been really produced at the time assigned for their composition.

WILLIAM HENRY IRELAND (1777-1835) deserves mention only on account of his Shaksperian forgeries, among which was a play entitled Vortigern, in which John Kemble acted in 1795. Ireland soon afterwards acknowledged that he was the author of these forgeries.

§ 10 If Cowper be rightly denominated the poet of the domestic hearth, GEORGE CRABBE (1754-1832) is eminently the poet of the passions in humble life. In his long career he is the link connecting the age of Johnson and Burke with that of Walter Scott and Byron, and his admirable works, while retaining in their form much of the correctness and severity of the past age, exhibit in their subjects and treatment that intensity of human interest and that selection of real passion which constitute the distinguishing characteristic of the writers who appeared at the beginning of the present century. He was born at the little seaport-town of Aldborough in Suffolk, where his father was salt-master or receiver of the customs duties on salt, and besides was part-owner of a fishing-boat, and his childhood was miserable through bodily weakness and the sight of continual dissensions between his parents. After a dreamy and studious childhood, during which his thirst for knowledge was encouraged by his father, a man of violent passions but of considerable intellectual development for one in his humble position, young Crabbe was apprenticed to a surgeon and apothecary, and first exercised his profession in his native town. Passionately fond of literature and botany, his success in business was so small that he determined to seek his fortune in London, where he arrived (1780) with only about 3*l* in his pocket, and several poems. He published The Candidate, but it was coldly received. After some stay in London he found himself reduced to despair, and even threatened with a prison for some small debts he had contracted, and after vainly applying for assistance to various persons connected with Aldborough, he addressed a manly and affecting letter to Edmund Burke, who immediately admitted him to his house and friendship. From this moment his fortune changed, he was assisted, both with money and advice, in bringing out his poem The Library (1781), was induced to enter the Church, and was promised the powerful influence of Lord Chancellor Thurlow. He became domestic chaplain to the Duke of Rutland, and lived some time at the magnificent seat of Belvoir, but this dependent position seems to have been accompanied with circumstances distasteful to Crabbe's manly character. It, however, enabled him to marry a young lady to whom he had been long attached, and he soon after changed the splendid restraint of Belvoir for the humbler but more independent existence of a parish priest. From this period till his death at the great age of 78, his life was passed in the constant exercise of his pastoral duties in various parishes, and in the cultivation of literature and his favourite science of botany.

In his first poem, The Library, it was evident that Crabbe had not yet hit upon the true vein of his peculiar and powerful genius. It was not till the appearance of The Village, in 1783, that he struck out that path in which he had neither predecessor nor rival. The manuscript of this poem was submitted to Johnson, who gave some advice and assistance in the correction and revision of the style. The success of The Village was very great, for it was the first attempt to paint the manners and existence of the labouring class without dressing them up in the artificial colours of fiction. In 1785 appeared The Newspaper, then for twenty-two years not a line of verse. During the interval he was busied with his professional duties, and enjoying the happiness of domestic life, which no man was ever more capable of appreciating. He, however, does not appear to have relaxed his habit of composition. His next work was The Parish Register (1807), in which the public saw the gradual ripening of his vigorous and original genius, and this was followed, at comparatively short intervals, by The Borough, Tales in Verse, and Tales of the Hall. These, with the striking but painful poems, written in a different measure, entitled Sir Eustace Grey and The Hall of Justice, make up Crabbe's large and valuable contribution to the poetical literature of his country. Almost all these works are constructed upon a peculiar and generally similar plan. Crabbe starts with some description, as of the Village, the Parish Church, the Borough—just such a deserted seaport-town as his native Aldborough—from which he naturally proceeds to deduce a series of separate episodes usually of middle and humble life, appropriate to the leading idea.

Thus in the Parish Register we have some of the most remarkable births, marriages, and deaths that are supposed to take place in a year amid a rural population, in the Borough, the lives and adventures of the most prominent characters that figure on the narrow stage of a small provincial town. The Tales are a series of stories, some pathetic and some humorous, each complete in itself, and in the Tales of the Hall two brothers, whose paths in life have separated them from boyhood, meet in their old age and recount their respective experiences. Sir Eustace Grey is the story of a madman related with terrific energy and picturesqueness by himself, and in the Hall of Justice a gipsy criminal narrates a still more dreadful story of crime and retribution. With the exception of the two last poems, in stanzas of eight-syllable lines, with alternato rhymes, Crabbe's poems are in the classical ten-syllabled heroic verse, and the contrast is strange between the neat Pope-like regularity of the metre, and the deep passion, the intense reality, and the quaint humour of the scenes which he displays. He thoroughly knew and profoundly analysed the hearts of men—the virtues, the vices, the weakness, and the heroism of the poor—he has anatomised with a stern but not unloving hand. No poet has more subtly traced the motives which regulate human conduct, and his descriptions of nature are marked by the same unequalled power of rendering interesting, by the sheer force of truth and exactness, the most unattractive features of the external world. The village-tyrant, the poacher, the smuggler, the miserly old maid, the pauper, and the criminal, are drawn with the same gloomy but vivid force as that with which Crabbe paints the squalid streets of the fishing-town, or the fen, the quay, and the heath. The more unattractive the subject the more masterly as the painting, whether that subject be man or nature. Crabbe is generally accused of giving a gloomy and unfavourable view of human life, but his pathos, when he is pathetic, reaches the extreme limit which sensibility will bear, and in such tales as Phoebe Dawson, Edward Shore, the Parting Hour, the intensity of the effect produced by Crabbe is directly proportioned to the simplicity of the means by which the effect is attained. In painting the agonies of remorse, the wandering reason of sorrow or of crime, he is a master—and the story of Peter Grimes might be cited as an unequalled example of the sublime in common life. None of the great Flemish masters have surpassed Crabbe in minuteness as well as force of delineation, and like them his delineation is often most impressive, when its subject is most vile and even repulsive.

§ 11 The greatest poet, beyond all comparison, that Scotland has produced is ROBERT BURNS (1759–1796). He was born near Kirk Alloway in Ayrshire, and was the son of a small farmer of the yeoman class. Popular education was at that period far more generally diffused in Scotland than in any other country in Europe, and the future glory of his nation was able to acquire, partly by the wise care of his father, and partly by his own avidity for knowledge, a degree of intellectual culture which would have been surprising in any other country. He had a good general acquaintance with the great masterpieces of English literature, and could use with perfect facility the style and diction of the great classical authors of South Britain, though by far the finest and most characteristic of his works are written in the provincial dialect of his native land. His passions were unusually strong, and he began, from a very early age, to express in verse the impressions made upon his fancy by the beautiful and pastoral nature which surrounded him, and the outpourings of his own feelings and heart. Nor was the tendency to song a rare or unusual accomplishment in the district he inhabited and among the class to which he belonged. The Lowland Scotch dialect, once the language of the Court and of an extensive national literature, was still cultivated with enthusiasm among the middle and lower classes, and every valley, every village possessed its rustic poets, whose "unpremeditated strains" continued the traditions of that ancient and strongly national popular literature, which had exhibited an almost uninterrupted succession of splendid names, from David Lyndsay, Dunbar, and Gavin Douglas, to Allan Ramsay and the ill-fated Fergusson. In early life Burns laboured like a peasant upon his father's farm, and afterwards endeavoured, but without success, to conduct a farm with his brothers. His speculations failing he was on the eve of abandoning, in despair, his native country and emigrating to the West Indies, where so many Scotsmen by their intelligence, their parsimony, and their industry, have acquired honourable fortunes. In order to raise funds for this, he was induced to publish his poems (Kilmarnock, 1786), which immediately had a great local popularity, and a second edition was received by the cultivated society of Edinburgh with a tempest of enthusiasm that made the "Ayrshire ploughman" the idol of the fashionable and literary world. The peasant-poet was regarded as a species of phenomenon, and plunged into the intoxicating current of gay life with an ardour that unfitted him for returning to his humble existence, but which, though it increased his natural taste for gross convivial pleasures, could neither injure the natural dignity of his character nor corrupt the benevolence of his heart. After again falling into embarrassments, rendered more inextricable by his irregularities, he obtained an humble appointment in the Excise service, the duties of which were not only arduous and very scantily paid, but were of a nature to still further engross his time and to cherish habits of intemperance that had been continually growing upon him. His strong constitution was undermined by excess and excitement of all kinds, and the poet died of fever at Dumfries, in extreme poverty, in the 33th year of his age (July, 1796)

In Burns the highest and most apparently incompatible qualities were united to a degree which is rarely met with,—tenderness the most exquisite, humour the broadest and the most refined, the most delicate and yet powerful perception of natural beauty, the highest finish and the easiest negligence of style. He paints with the sharp and infallible touch of Homer or of Shakspeare, and amid the wildest ebullitions of gaiety he has thoughts that sound the very abysses of the heart. His writings are chiefly lyric, consisting of songs of inimitable beauty, but he has also produced works either of a narrative or satirical character, and in some of them the lyric element is combined with the descriptive. One of the most remarkable of his poems is Tam o' Shanter, a tale of popular witch-superstition, in which the most brilliant descriptive power is united to a pathos the most touching, a fancy the most wild, and a humour the quaintest, shiest, and most jovous. Tam is a drunken ne'er-do-weel of a horse-couper, who traversing a dreary moor at that hour of night when according to ancient tradition all demons and witches have power, passes, on his way home from a drinking-bout, near the old ruined Kirk of Alloway, which to his surprise he finds lighted up. Emboldened by John Barleycorn, he steals close to the window, looks in, and witnesses the sabbath of the witches, described by the poet with an inimitable mixture of grotesque humour and fantastic horror. Unable to conceal his delight at the agility of one of the dancers, he attracts their attention, and is pursued by the whole band till he can cross a running stream which defeats their power of enchantment. He is just in time to escape, and the tail of his grey mare remains as a trophy in the hands of his pursuers. Burns possesses, to a degree exceeded only by Shakspeare, the power of giving a human interest to material objects, a quality found only in poets of the highest order. Like Shakspeare, too, he brings into contact the familiar and the ideal, and combines the broadest humour with the profoundest pathos. Another admirable poem, half-narrative, but set thick with glorious songs, is the Jolly Beggars. Careless vagabond jollity, roaring mirth and gipsy merriment have never been so expressed though low in the extreme. Burns is never vulgar, his ragged bacchanals swagger and drink with inimitable grace and nature. In his Address to the Deil, Death and Dr Horn-bool, The Two Dogs, and the dialogue between the Old and New Bridges of Ayr, Burns combines humorous and picturesque description with reflections and thoughtful moralising upon life and society. The first-mentioned of these poems offers that exquisite stroke of tenderness where the poet refuses to despair of the ultimate pardon of the Evil One himself, and addresses him in language of infinite softness, to ask him what pleasure he can take in tormenting poor miserable sinners. The Dialogue between the Two Dogs is an elaborate comparison between the relative degree of virtue and happiness granted to the rich and the poor. Burns declares the balance to be pretty even, and there is no reason to doubt the correctness of his judgment. His description of the joys and consolations of the poor man's lot is perhaps even more beautiful in this poem than in the more generally popular Cotter's Saturday Night, written in stanzas, and in a language less provincial than the former. This circumstance has rendered the poem better known to such readers as are imperfectly acquainted with the Lowland dialect, but in my opinion the Cotter's Saturday Night, though containing many beautiful passages, is inferior in raciness to the Two Dogs. Certainly there has never been a nobler tribute paid to the virtues of the peasant class than has been given by Burns in these two poems. In the poem descriptive of rustic fortune-telling on Halloween, in the Vision of Liberty, where Burns gives such a sublime picture of his own early aspirations, in the unequalled sorrow that breathes through the Lament for Glencairn, in Scotch Drink, the Huguis, the lines on Captain Grose and the elegy on Matthew Henderson, in the exquisite description of the death of the old ewe Milie, and the poet's address to his old mare, we find the same capacity to feel both pathos and humour, that truest pathos which finds its materials in the common everyday objects of life and that truest humour which is allied to the deepest feeling. Examples of the same truth present themselves in every page of Burns, and quite as often in his shorter lyrics and songs. The famous lines On Turning up a Mouse's Nest with the Plough, and on destroying in the same way a Mountain Daisy will ever remain among the chief gems of tenderness and beauty.

I may here remark the peculiar charm of that stanza of four long and two short lines which Burns has so profusely employed, and which is a form of versification originally Scotch. The Songs properly so called are exceedingly numerous, and generally of great though sometimes of unequal merit. Those written in pure English have often an artificial and somewhat pretentious air, which places them below the Doric of the Lowland Muse. Intensity of feeling, condensed force and picturesqueness of expression, and admirable melody of flow, are the qualities which distinguish them. Some were based upon older verses originally written to be sung to some ancient air these Burns has frequently re-written, giving to them a power and a freshness altogether new. The list of subjects adapted for the purpose of the song-writer is always very limited—love, patriotism, and pleasure constitute the whole. To give variety to this narrow repertory is a difficult task, and no poet has exhibited greater fertility than Burns. In the song Ye fond Kisser and then we sever is concentrated the whole essence of a thousand love-poems; the heroic outbreak of patriotism in Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled is a lyric of true Tyrtæan force, and in those of a calmer and more lamenting character as, Ye Banks and Braes, there is the finest union of personal sentiment with the most complete assimilation of the poet's mind to the loveliness of external nature. The only defects with which this great poet can be reproached is an occasional coarseness of satire, as exemplified in the personalities of Holy Fair, a tone of defiant and needless opposition of one class against another, and now and then a vulgar and misplaced ornament which contrasts tawdrily with the sweet simplicity of the general style. This last is generally to be met with in such of Burns's poems as are written in English. Nor should I forget a somewhat sensual and over-ardent style of compliment which Burns has sometimes introduced into his love-verses, and which is the more reprehensible as it contrasts with the warm yet chastened spirit which generally breathes in his love-strains.

§ 12 The coarse but pungent and original humour of JOHN WOLCOT (1738-1819) gave him, during the reign of George III., a vogue which, like that of his fellow-satirist Churchill in the preceding period, was bright and brilliant. Under the pseudonym of PETER PINDAR he ridiculed the weaknesses and oddities of the King, attacked the Royal Academy with unrelenting pasquinades, and showed no mercy to Sir Joseph Banks and the court poets. The oddity and boldness of his irregular burlesque style, the abundance of quaint images and illustrations, and the unblushing impudence of his lampoons, make his writings curious to the student, though their grossness has excluded them from general readers. His knowledge and taste in painting were considerable, but the violence of his personalities and his frequent indecency render him rather a curious literary phenomenon than a name deserving of respect in literature. Some of his humorous tales, as The Pilgrims and the Peas, the Razor Seller, and the ludicrous amœbean strains of Bozzy and Pizzini in which he laughs at the rival biographers of Johnson, exhibit the peculiar manner in which he excelled, carried to the highest pitch of absurdity.

§ 13 In tracing the progress of the comic drama from the middle of the eighteenth century down almost to the present time, the chief names to be noted are those of Garrick, Foote, Cumberland, the two Colmans, father and son, of whom the second is by far the more considerable, and lastly Sheridan, that strange cometary genius, whose powers were so versatile and whose life was so brilliant and so disreputable. Garrick, Foote, and the Colmans were either actors or theatrical managers, DAVID GARRICK (1717-1779) was perhaps the greatest performer that the English stage had seen since the days of Burbage and Alleyn: his principal plays are the Lying Valet, and Miss in her Teens, which are still acted. SAMUEL FOOTE (1720-1777) was celebrated for his convivial humour and his power of mimicry, which made him at once formidable to his victims and the idol of his associates. He produced a considerable number of farcical and amusing pieces, most of which owed their chief success to the caricatures they contained of particular persons. Only one has constantly retained possession of the theatre, the coarse but excellently humorous farce The Mayor of Garratt, containing in particular the two admirable types of citizen life, Major Sturgeon, the Bobadill of the militia, and Jerry Sneak, the hen-pecked husband. RICHARD CUMBERLAND (1732-1811) was a man of learning and accomplishments, who obtained some reputation in various branches of literature. His dramas, of which the West Indian is a favourable specimen, are neatly constructed and show vivacity of dialogue, but they are tainted with that tendency to morbid sentimentalism which was the vice of our stage during some time, being the reaction against the barefaced immorality of the school of Wycheley and Congreve. The two Colmans (GEORGE COLMAN, the elder, 1732-1794, and GEORGE COLMAN, the younger, 1762-1836), were theatrical managers and prolific writers. The best production of the younger is the Heir at Law, a piece in some measure belonging to the same class as Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer, but relying for its interest principally on odd humours and quaint language, and in a rich abundance of absurd incidents more laughable than probable. In his piece of the Poor Gentleman also the farcical personages, as that of the half-militia officer half-apothecary Ollapod, are extremely amusing, but the sentimental scenes in this play, chiefly and most unadroitly copied from Sterne's Uncle Toby and Trism, are completely unworthy of the rest. What pleases in Colman is the air of dash and high spirits which pervades his scenes.

RICHARD BRINSLEY SHERIDAN-(1751-1816) is certainly one of the most remarkable figures in the social, political, and intellectual life of the period. He was endowed by nature, in a degree little inferior to Burke, with the talents of an orator. His colloquial repartees and witticisms made him the darling of society, and his place in the dramatic literature of his age is inferior to that of none of his contemporaries. Byron justly said that the intellectual reputation of Sheridan was truly enviable, that he had made the best speech—that on the Begums of Oude—written the best comedy, the School for Scandal, the best opera, the Duenna, and the best farce, the Critic. His whole life, both in Parliament and in the world, was a succession of extravagances and imprudences,

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

OTHER POETS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

JOHN BRYAN (1691-1763) born at Manchester, educated at Cambridge, inventor of a patented system of shorthand, and at last a private gentleman in his native place. Is best known for a pastoral which first appeared in the Spectator.—My time, O ye Muses, was happily spent. He wrote several other small poems, which have lately been published by a local Society in Manchester. His writings exhibit ease and fancy.

JOHN DYER (1700-1759) was born at Ayr, near Glasgow, educated at Westminster School, and travelled through Wales and Italy, studying painting, but afterwards became a clergyman of the Church of England. His best known poem is Grongar Hill. Some portions of the Annals of a Farm received the praise of Johnson. In 1757 he produced a poem on the unpoetic subject of The Fleecce, and died soon afterwards, on the 24th July 1759. Dyer is a poet who gives promise of the better school that was soon to adorn English literature. His imagination and style have received the praise of Wordsworth, and Gray writing to Walpole, says, "Dyer has more of poetry in his imagination than almost any of our number, but rough and unadorned." The moral reflections in his poetry are introduced very naturally, whilst most pleasing pictures of nature are expressed in easy and flowing verse.

NATHANIEL COTTON (1707-1783) author of Miscellaneous Poems. He was a physician at St. Alban's, and deserves remembrance from having Cowper as his patient, who speaks of "his well known humanity and sweetness of temper."

CHARLES CHURCHILL (1731-1764), the son of a clergyman, received his education at Westminster School and Cambridge, and became curate of Ralsham in Essex. In 1758 he succeeded his father as curate and lecturer of St. John's, Westminster, but his careless habits and neglect of clerical proprieties brought him into conflict with the dean, and ended in his resignation of his preferments, and retirement from the Church. He gave himself up to political and satirical writing. He was a great friend of and confidant with Wilkes, of the North Briton. His private and domestic life was embittered by quarrels with his wife and his habits of dissipation. He died at Boulogne, November 4 1764, on a visit to his friend Wilkes. His greatest work was the Rococo, published in 1761 which was placed by contemporaries on a level with the works of Pope and Dryden. It is easy in diction, and strong in language, the invective is bold, and the rhythm flowing, but it has little poetic fervour and the author has been well called nothing but a "pamphleteer in verse." In 1762 he wrote against the Scotch the Prophecy of Famine, which Lord Stanhope remarks, "may yet be read with all the admiration which the most vigorous powers of verse, and the most lively touches of wit, can earn in the cause of slander and falsehood." He also wrote a clever but savage attack in his Epistle to Hogarth, who in one of his pictures represented Churchill as a bear in clerical costume, with a pot of porter in his paw. Churchill sought immediate popularity and pay rather than lasting worth. He was for a time one of the most popular of English poets.

HENRY KIRKE WHITE (1785-1806) was born at Nottingham the son of a butcher. The poet assisted his father for some time, but when about fourteen was apprenticed to a weaver. This occupation he soon abandoned, and was placed with an attorney and there made rapid progress in various studies, gaining a silver medal when about fifteen for a translation from Horace in the Monthly Preceptor. His poems were published in 1803, and, though scornfully noticed in the Monthly Review, they attracted the attention of Mr. Southey and others. Resolving to enter the Church, he was enabled through Mr. Stimson to obtain a scholarship at St. John's College, Cambridge. His course here was rapid and brilliant. He won the first place in the College examinations, but his health gave way, and he died on the 19th October 1806. His Poems and Memoirs were published by Southey.

The works of White must be estimated as the productions of a young writer, and rather for their high promise than intrinsic worth. He would never have taken a rank among the first class of poets, but his position would have been very high among the second. His versification is correct, his language polished. Here and there a stroke of imagination or passion bursts upon the reader, but it is generally the quiet flow of a scallag and sensitive verse that wins admiration for the poet and affection for the man.

His longest work is Clifton Grove 1803, a descriptive poem. The best known of his writings are the Song to an Early Primrose, Gondoline and some of his hymns.

SIR CHARLES HANNIPT WILLIAMS (1709 1759), one of the most popular satirists of the reign of George II. Sir Robert Walpole was his chief patron and friend and found his pen no small aid in his political course. He was a member of parliament for some years, and afterwards was sent to the Prussian and Russian courts as an ambassador. His poems are generally fugitive pieces. They were imperfectly collected in 1822; but have now lost their interest, as they have almost entirely reference to the events of that age.

WILLIAM JULIUS MICKLE (1734 1788), a native of Dumfriesshire at first in business in Edinburgh and afterwards corrector of the Clarendon press was author of Pollio, The Concubine, and a translation of the Lusad of Camoens 1775. The latter years of his life were spent near Oxford where he died in 1788. He is said to be the author of The Mariners' Wife, one of the most exquisite little songs written in the lowland Scotch. Cumner Hall is perhaps the best known of the original poems of Mickle.

HANNAH MORE (1745 1833) was the daughter of Jacob More, schoolmaster at Stapleton, in Gloucestershire. The family removed to Bristol, and the future authoress was there aided by the friendship of Sir James Stonehouse. In 1762 the Search after Happiness was published and was followed in a short time by The Inflexible Captive. When about twenty-eight Miss More removed to London, and there entered into the literary circle of Johnson, Burke, and Garrick, at the house of the last of whom she resided. Her Ierex was put on the Drury Lane stage by Garrick in 1777. Whilst in London she produced another tragedy, The Fatal Falls— hood, her last dramatic composition. Some Poems were published in 1786, portions of which were termed by Johnson a great performance. Hannah More now became wearied of the life of London, and retired to Bristol, where her sisters kept a large boarding school. Her pen was most busy, prose and poetry flowed unceasingly, embracing social, political, and ethical topics. Her monthly tales in the Repository, 1794 written against Jacobins and Levellers, reached a million in circulation. Her best known works are—Thoughts on the Manners of the Great, 1788, On Female Education, 1789, Cæcilia in Search of a Wife, 1809, Practical Piety, 1811, &c., making in all eleven volumes. Queen Charlotte consulted Hannah More on the education of the Princess Charlotte, which was the occasion of the writing of the work Hints towards forming the Character of a young Princess 1805.

Mrs. More's style is flowing and often sparkles with the light of a pleasant humour. Her later works are of a more sombre cast, from the deeper impressions which religion seemed to be making upon her, yet she retained to the last her position as one of the greatest if not the first of English authoresses. Johnson considered her the best of female versifiers, but her prose is equal if not superior to her poetry. Cæcilia is perhaps the chief of her works—a fiction of much beauty in style, with a mixture of quiet irony, the plot is well evolved but the characters are too few, and the incidents too tame, to make it in the present day a readable book. It has been well called a "dramatic sermon."

Mrs. More's dramas gave promise of much success in that form of literature, but her serious turn of mind prevented her proceeding so as to produce a masterpiece. She died on the 7th of September, 1833, at the age of 88.

ISAAC HAWKINS BROWNE (1706 1760) was Member of Parliament for Wealock, wrote some Latin imitations of Lucretius and a few English poems, the chief of which were a series of six parodies of contemporary writers, published in 1736 the subject of which is A Pipe of Tobacco. The imitations are of Chibber, Phillips Thomson, Young, Pope and Swift.

CHRISTOPHER ANSTET (1724-1805), author of the well known New Bath Guide, which was published in 1766, and became the most popular work of the day. The impression which it produced at the time may be seen from a letter of Horace Walpole to George Montague (June 20, 1766) "What pleasure have you to come! It is called the New Bath Guide. It stole into the world, and for a fortnight no soul looked into it, concluding its name was its true name. No such thing. It is a set of letters in verse in all kind of verses, describing the life at Bath and incidentally everything else, but so much wit, so much humour, fun, and poetry, so much originality, never met together before." Other poems were written by him but they attracted little notice.

Mrs. THEALE, afterwards Mrs. PROZZI (1740-1822), whose maiden name was Esther Lynch Salisbury a native of Bodville in Cambridgeshire married Mr. Henry Thrale the opulent brewer, in whose house Dr. Johnson found so frequent a home. She was the authoress of The Three Harnings, which is so good a piece of composition that Johnson has been supposed to have assisted in writing it. After the death of her husband she married Prozzi, an Italian music master, and left England. She wrote several other works but the one by which she is best known is Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson, 1786. She spent the latter portion of her life at Clifton where she died in 1822.

CHRISTOPHER SMALT (1722-1770) "an unfortunate and irregular man of genius, for some time a Fellow of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, author of a satire called the Hilliad, an attack on the well known Sir John Hill, and translator of Phadrus and Horace into prose. In 1754 he was placed in a madhouse and finally died in the king's Bench Prison. His most remarkable poem is the Song to David, indented on the wall of his cell with a key."

THOMAS BLACKLOCK (1721-1791) the blind poet, who lost his eyesight at the age of six months, was born in Annan received a good education at home and afterwards in Edinburgh, became in 1759 a preacher in the Scotch Church, wrote a treatise on Blindness in the Encyclopædia Britannica, sermons and theological discourses, and several poems. The poetry is limpid and dull, but the correctness of description and the occasional vivid appreciation of natural beauty are most surprising in one who could not have remembered the little he himself had seen. Dr. Blacklock distinguished colours by the touch.

MICHAEL BRUCE (1746-1767) a young Scotch poet of some promise was born at Kinnesswood in the county of Kinross, and educated at Edinburgh, but died soon after he left college, at his father's house. In 1770 his poems were published by John Logan. Editions more complete have been brought out in later times. His chief works were Lockleven and The Last Day. The style is immature, and there are many traces of borrowing from other poets, yet the poetry gives proofs of genius, and promise of high distinction.

JOHN LOGAN (1743-1783), at first a clergyman in the Scotch Church, lecturer in Edinburgh, author of Runnmede, a tragedy, contributor to different magazines, and writer of several poetical pieces, some of which have been claimed for Bruce whose literary executor Logan was. Logan's life was one of disappointment, and his ambition of excellence and literary glory was never realised. Some have said he died of a broken heart. The style of his writing is impressive, and his sermons won for him no small renown. His poetry is simple and pathetic. The Song to the Cuckoo which has been ascribed to Bruce and to Logan is one of the gems of English ballad literature.

ANNA SEWARD (1747-1800), known as the "Swan of Lichfield" daughter of a canon in the cathedral of that city, wrote Sonnets, and a poetical novel, called Louisa. Her poems were by general consent of Walter Scott, for publication but they are now utterly forgotten.

A SA LETITIA BARBAULD (1743-1825) daughter of a schoolmaster in Leicester shire, named Aikin, and wife of Rochemont Barbauld, a Frenchman by extraction, and minister of a dissenting congregation at Palgrave, in Suffolk. A little before her marriage she published Miscellaneous Poems, and soon after Hymns in Prose for Children. Mr. Barbauld became minister of a church at Newington in 1802, which brought Mrs. Barbauld into greater connection with the literary circles of the day. She wrote various other poems containing here and there some true touches of poetic genius. Her style is simple and graceful adorned by much exquisite fancy and imagery. Her most valued contributions have been her sacred pieces. That on The Death of the Righteous is one of the gems of English sacred poetry.

ROBERT DOBSON (1709-1763), deserves mention as the great publisher and patron of literature of his age. He proposed the Annual Register, made a Collection of Poems by several Hands, 1738, and was himself the author of several poetical and dramatic pieces. His shop was in Pall Mall, and he commenced his business by the assistance of Pope, who lent him 100*l*.

WILLIAM HAYLEY (1745-1820), at one time a popular poet, the friend and biographer of Cowper, was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. He wrote Triumphs of Temper, Triumphs of Music, poetical epistles, odes, essays, &c. His works in 1785 occupied six volumes.

ARTHUR MUMFHY (1730-1805), a native of Elphin, in the county of Roscommon, Ireland, received his education at St. Omer's, gave up the trade into which he had entered for literature, published The Gray's Inn Journal from 1752 to 1754, went on the stage, wrote dramas and took part in the great contest of parties, at last became a barrister and died a commissioner of bankruptcy. He published twenty-three plays of which the Grecian Daughter was the most popular. His translation of Tacitus had great repute in its day.

JOANNA BAILLIE (1762-1851), born at Bothwell, near Glasgow, the daughter of a Presbyterian clergyman, lived the greater part of her life at Hampstead. She wrote various plays, of which her tragedy of De Montfort is perhaps the finest.

JOHN HOME (1724-1808), author of the well-known tragedy of Douglas which appeared in 1756 and was acted with great applause, but it is now almost forgotten with the exception of the oft-repeated scene commencing with "My name is Norval." He was a minister of the Scotch Church, but his having written a tragedy gave such grave offence to the elders of the Kirk that he was obliged to resign his parish of Athelstaneford. He retired to England, and received a pension through the influence of the Earl of Bute. Sir Walter Scott, in his Diary (April 25, 1827), thus speaks of Home's works—"They are, after all, poorer than I thought them. Good blank verse and stately sentiment, but something lukewarmish, excepting Douglas, which is certainly a masterpiece. Even that does not stand the closet. The merits are for the stage, and it is certainly one of the best acting plays going."

HENRY BROOKE (1706-1783), the son of a clergyman in Ireland and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, came to London and was one of the poets patronised by Frederick Prince of Wales. His tragedy of Gustavus Vasa was supposed to have been directed against the prime minister Sir Robert Walpole, and the representation of it was forbidden by the Lord Chamberlain. He was also author of the Earl of Essex, and other plays, poems, translations, &c. He wrote The Farmer's Letters, which were published in Ireland at the time of the rebellion of 1745. He wrote the well-known novel, The Fool of Quality.

RICHARD GLOVER (1712-1785), a London merchant, and Member of Parliament for Weymouth, better known for his noble independence and worth in private and public life than for his literary efforts. He published at an early age (1737) an epic poem on the subject of the Persian wars called Leonidas, which was much praised in its day, but is now deservedly forgotten. He wrote a second epic poem, or kind of continuation of the former entitled Athenais which appeared after his death (1787).

WILLIAM MASON (1724-1797) was a native of Yorkshire, received his education at Cambridge, entered the Church, became rector of Aston in Yorkshire, and held the office of canon and precentor in the cathedral of York. His chief works were—the dramas of Elfrida, 1752, and Caractacus 1759, Odes on Independence, Memory, &c. The English Garden 1772-1782, a poem in blank verse, and a satire of much liveliness and force, An Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers 1773. Mason's style is wanting in simplicity. His dramas are on the model of the classic writers the language is ornate and somewhat stilted, and at the present day his works are scarcely known. Mason was the intimate friend of Gray, superintended the publication of the poet's works, and wrote his Life. He died at Aston, April 5 1797.

AARON HILL (1684-1749), best known through the conflict with Pope, on which he ventured after being satirised in the Dunciad. Seventeen plays are attributed to him, besides some other writings now altogether forgotten. The style is correct but cold, fashioned on the model of the French writers.

WILLIAM WHITEHEAD (1716-1788), poet laureate on the death of Cibber, after Gray had refused the office. He wrote seven dramas, of which the most important are the Roman Father, 1750, and Creusa, 1754.

Dr JAMES GRAINGER (1721-1767), was born at Dunse, county Berwick, was a surgeon in the army, and afterwards went to the West Indies. He wrote the Sugar Cane which has been severely dealt with by the critics. He calls the negroes "swains."

Among the translators of this age are to be mentioned—

GILBERT WEST (1705-1756), who translated Indar, 1749, and wrote some original works. He was a friend and connexion of Pitt and Lyttelton, and was appointed by Townshend one of the Clerks of the Privy Council. He is now best known by his Observations on the Resurrection (1730). Lord Lyttelton addressed to him his "Dissertation on the Conversion of St. Paul" (See p. 378, a).

ELIZABETH CARTER (1717-1806), who published a translation of Epictetus in 1758, besides various original poems, was most highly esteemed by Johnson, and her Ode to Wisdom is given by Richardson in his second novel, Clarissa Harlowe.

The principal Scottish poet of this period is—

ROBERT FERGUSON (1750-1774) who was born in Edinburgh, educated at St. Andrews, and died at an early age, having ruined his health by dissipation. His style and manner exercised no small influence upon Burns, whose "poetical progenitor" he has been called. His successful pieces are in the Scotch dialect.

CHAPTER XX.

WALTER SCOTT

§ 1 Romantic school Influence of BISHOP PERCY'S Reliques of Ancient Poetry § 2 WALTER SCOTT His life and writings § 3 His poems. § 4 Lay of the Last Minstrel, Marion, and the Lady of the Lake § 5 Rob Roy, Lord of the Isles, and minor poems § 6 Classification of the Waterley Novels § 7 Characteristics of the Novels Waterley Guy Mannering The Antiquary Rob Roy § 8 Tales of My Landlord — The Black Dwarf Old Mortality The Heart of Mid-Lothian The Bride of Lammermoor The Legend of Montrose § 9 Ivanhoe The Monastery and The Abbot Kenilworth The Pirate § 10 Nigel Peveril of the Peak Quentin Durward St Ronan's Well Redgauntlet § 11 Tales of the Crusaders — The Betrothed and The Talsman Woodstock § 12 Chronicles of the Canongate — The Highland Widow, The Two Drovers, The Surgeon's Daughter, and The Fair Maid of Perth Anne of Geierstein Count Robert of Paris, and Castle Dangerous

§ 1 THE great revolution in taste, substituting romantic for classical sentiment and subjects, which culminated in the poems and novels of Walter Scott, is traceable to the labours of BISHOP PERCY (1728-1811). The friend of Johnson, and one of the most accomplished members of that circle in which Johnson was supreme, Percy was strongly impressed with the vast stores of the beautiful, though rude, poetry which lay buried in obscure collections of ballads and legendary compositions, and he devoted himself to the task of explaining and popularising the then neglected beauties of these old rhapsodists with the ardour of an antiquary and with the taste of a true poet. His publication in 1765, under the title of Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, of a collection of such ballads, many of which had been preserved only in manuscript, while others, having originally been printed in the rudest manner on flying sheets for circulation among the lower orders of the people, had owed their preservation only to the care of collectors, must be considered as a critical epoch in the history of our literature. Many authors before him, as for example Addison and Sir Philip Sydney, had expressed the admiration which a cultivated taste must ever feel for the rough but inimitable graces of our old ballad-poets, but Percy was the first who undertook an examination, at once systematic and popular, of those neglected treasures. His Essay on the Ancient Minstrels, prefixed to the pieces he selected, exhibits considerable research, and is written in a pleasing and attractive manner, and the extracts are made with great taste, and with a particular view of exciting the public sympathy in favour of a class of compositions, the merits of which were then new and unfamiliar to the general reader. It is true that he did not always adhere with scrupulous fidelity to the ancient texts, and where the poems were in a fragmentary and imperfect condition he did not hesitate, any more than Scott after him in the Border Minstrelsy, to fill up the rents of time with matter of his own invention. This, however, at a period when his chief object was to excite among general readers an interest in these fine old monuments of mediæval genius, was no unpardonable offence, and gave him the opportunity of exhibiting his own poetical powers, which were far from contemptible, and his skill in imitating, with more or less success, the language and manner of the ancient Border poets. Percy found, in collecting these old compositions, that the majority of those most curious from their antiquity and most interesting from their merit were distinctly traceable, both as regards their subjects and the dialect in which they were written, to the North Countrée, that is, to the frontier region between England and Scotland which, during the long wars that had raged almost without intermission between the Borderers on both sides of the Debateable Land, had necessarily been the scene of the most frequent and striking incidents of predatory warfare, such as those recorded in the noble ballads of Chevy Chase and the Battle of Otterburn. The language in the Northern marches of England and in the Scottish frontier-region bordering upon them, was one and the same dialect, something between the Lowland Scotch and the speech of Cumberland or Westmoreland, and it is curious to find the ballad-singer modifying the incidents of his legend so as to suit the prejudices and flatter the national pride of his listeners according as they were inhabitants of the Northern or Southern district. In various independent copies or versions of the same legend, we find the victory given to the one side or to the other, and the English or Scottish hero alternately playing the nobler and more romantic part. Besides a very large number of these purely heroic ballads, Percy gave specimens of an immense series of songs and lyrics extending down to a comparatively late period of English history, embracing even the Civil War and the Restoration, but the chief interest of his collection, and the chief service he rendered to literature by his publication, is concentrated on the earlier portion. It is impossible to exaggerate the influence exerted by Percy's Reliques: this book has been devoured with the most intense interest by generation after generation of English poets, and has undoubtedly contributed to give a first direction to the youthful genius of many of our most illustrious writers. The boyish enthusiasm of Walter Scott was stirred, "as with the sound of a trumpet," by the vivid recitals of

[the old Border rhapsodists, and but for Percy it is possible that we should have had neither the Lady of the Lake nor Waverley. Nor was it upon the genius of Scott alone that is impressed the stamp of this ballad imitation. Wordsworth, Coleridge, even Tennyson himself have been deeply modified, in the form and colouring of their productions, by the same cause and perhaps the influence of the Reliques, whether direct or indirect, near or remote, will be perceptible to distant ages in English poetry and fiction.

§ 2 Literary history presents few examples of a career so splendid as that of WALTER SCOTT (1771-1832). A genius at once so vigorous and versatile, a productiveness so magnificent and so sustained, will with difficulty be found, though we ransack the wide realms of ancient and modern letters. He occupies an immense space in the intellectual horizon of the nineteenth century, and it will be no easy task to delineate, at once clearly and rapidly, the features of this colossal figure. He was born Aug 15, 1771, the son of a respectable Writer to the Signet in Edinburgh, and was connected, both by the father's and mother's side, with several of those ancient historic Border families whose warlike memories his genius was destined to make immortal. His constitution was not at first weakly, but an illness he met with in childhood caused a lameness in one of his legs, and rendered it necessary that he should pass some time in country air. For this purpose he was sent to the farm of his grandfather near Kelso, where he was surrounded with legends, ruins, and localities, of which he was to make in his works so admirable a use. Though remarkable neither at the High School nor at the University of Edinburgh, where he finished his education, for anything but good nature and a love for athletic sports, he had always been a devourer of miscellaneous books—his taste and inclination naturally leading him to prefer fiction, and chiefly the picturesque fiction, whether couched in prose or verse, of mediæval chivalry. On leaving the University he was destined to the profession of the bar, and he practised during some time as an advocate before the Scottish tribunals. His real vocation was, however, that of letters, and his legal experience did little more for him than furnish him with hints of incidents and traits of human nature which he afterwards worked up with admirable effect in his romances. He was unsuccessful in obtaining the object of his first love, Miss Stuart-Belches, whom he had known for six years when in 1796 she married William Forbes of Pitshgo. At the end of 1797 he married a young lady of French extraction, named Carpenter. The first literary direction of his mind was towards the poetical and antiquarian curiosities of the Middle Ages, but just at that time there had been awakened among the intellectual circles of Edinburgh a taste for German literature, then only beginning to become known, and Scott contributed several translations, as that of Goethe's Erl-König, of the Lenore of Burger, and afterwards Goethe's drama of Götz of the Iron Hand. Scott was now residing with his young wife at Lasswade, probably as happy as can be conceived. Before his marriage he had conceived the plan of rescuing from oblivion the large stores of Border ballads which were still current among the descendants of the Liddesdale and Annandale mossroopers, and travelled into those picturesque regions, where he not only accumulated a vast treasure of unedited legends and fragments of legends, but familiarised himself with the scenery and manners of that country over which he was to cast the magic of his genius. The result of his researches he published as Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border (1802-3), and in the skill with which he edited these poems, the immense and picturesque erudition with which he illustrated them, and the admirable manner in which he related striking and interesting facts connected with their elucidation, it was easy to see the germ of the great romantic poet, as well as of the antiquarian, then without a rival in historic and legendary lore. The learning and taste of this work gave Scott a high reputation, and in some degree contributed to induce him to abandon the profession of the law for that of literature. He had been further confirmed in his project by receiving (1799) the appointment of Sheriff of Selkirkshire, the duties of which left much leisure at his disposal. He continued his task of editor by publishing in 1804 the old romance of Sir Tristrem, which he elucidated by a commentary, he mistakenly ascribed Tristrem to Thomas of Ercildoune, whose prophecies had been regarded from the thirteenth century downwards with traditional awe and reverence. In 1804 he changed his residence to the pretty villa of Ashestiel on the Tweed, and in 1805 first burst upon the world in the quality of a great original romantic poet. It is difficult for us in the present day to conceive the rapture of enthusiasm with which the public received the rapid and dazzling succession of Scott's poems. They were poured forth with an unstinted freshness and uninterrupted rapidity from the above year till 1814, when he was as suddenly to burst forth with still greater splendour and still more wonderful fertility in a completely new and different line. Between 1805 and 1815 appeared the Lay of the Last Minstrel, Marmion, the Lady of the Lake, Robbery, and the Lord of the Isles, not to enumerate a number of less important and less successful works, such as the Vision of Don Roderick, the Bridal of Triermain, Harold the Dauntless, and the Field of Waterloo, the first and last of which were written with the special purpose of celebrating the triumph over Napoleon, and which, as is generally the case with such productions, are unworthy of the author's genius. In about twelve years this kingly poet poured forth five works of considerable length, perfectly original in subject and construction, and which absolutely revolutionised the public taste. Though considerably varied in scenery and dramatis personæ, the narrative romantic fictions which so rapidly succeeded each other were found, after some repetitions, to pall to a certain degree upon the public taste, and perhaps the very frenzy of enthusiasm which had welcomed the rich, vivid, and picturesque revival of the ancient chivalric poetry in the Lay, the Lady of the Lake, and Marmion, made the reader more ready to find some falling-off of interest in Rob Roy and the Lord of the Isles. It is certain that the popularity of Scott's poetry, though still very great, perceptibly declined with the former of these two works, which is partly to be attributed to the choice of an historical period for the action either less picturesque in itself or less favourable for the display of Scott's peculiar talent, than that particular epoch in which his immense knowledge caused him to be without a rival. Fully aware of the decline of his popularity, and with manly sense and dignified yet modest self-consciousness attributing it to its true cause just specified, and also perhaps in some degree to the startling sunrise of Byron's genius above the horizon, Scott, without a word of querulous complaint, immediately abandoned poetry to launch into a new career—a career in which he could have neither equal nor second.

In 1814 appeared Waverley, the commencement of which had been sketched out and thrown aside nine years before, and with Waverley began that noble series of romances, which poured forth with a splendour and facility surpassing even that of the poems. During the seventeen years intervening between 1814 and 1831 were written that collection, that library, or rather that whole literature of fiction, to which is generally given, from the title of the first, the name of the Waverley Novels. And they were produced with such inconceivable rapidity, that on comparing the number of these fictions, amounting to upwards of thirty independent works, almost all of them of considerable length, with the time during which they were composed, the result gives the surprising average of about two of such works in one year, and in reality there were years when Scott produced as many as three distinct novels. Our wonder at such fertility is still further augmented, when we learn that during this period Scott succeeded in writing, independently of the above fictions, a considerable number of works in the departments of history, criticism, and biography. I may mention only the Life of Napoleon, the Tales of a Grandfather, the amusing Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft, and many essays and reviews. The excellent editions, with Lives, of Dryden and Swift, were the work of Scott's poet-period. The Dryden appeared in 1808, the Swift in 1814. One principal secret of this enormous productiveness is to be found in Scott's passionate and long-cherished ambition to found a territorial family, and to be able to live the life of a provincial magnate. Spurred on by this desire, Scott bought a small house on his beloved Tweed, and land adjoining, in 1811, re-named it Abbotsford, and after removal thither, in 1812, he went on purchasing land, planting and improving, and transforming the cottage into a "romance in stone and lime," a baronial residence crowded with the rarest objects of mediæval antiquity. Here he exercised a truly princely hospitality, receiving every traveller of distinction, and "doing the honours of all Scotland" to those who were attracted in crowds by the splendour of his genius. The very large and continually-increasing outlay necessitated by this mode of life he supplied partly by his inexhaustible pen, and tried to increase his gains by most ill-advised partnerships in the printing and publishing firms of the Ballantynes, his intimate friends and schoolfellows. The profits of the publishing firm were due almost solely to the popularity of Scott's own works, and the Ballantynes were involved in the fatal commercial crisis of 1825 and 1826, which also reached and ruined the still vaster speculations of Constable and Co., with whom indeed the Ballantynes' affairs were connected. Scott found himself ruined, and responsible for a gigantic amount of debt. He might easily have escaped from his liabilities by taking advantage of the bankrupt law, but his sense of honour was so high and delicate that he only asked for time, and resolutely set himself to clear off, by unremitting literary toil, the vast accumulation of nearly 120,000*l.* He all but accomplished his colossal task, nay he did substantially accomplish it, but he died under the effort, nor does the history either of literature or commerce afford a brighter example of probity. The manifest inferiority of several of his last novels, as Count Robert of Paris and Castle Dangerous, and the somewhat gloomy and despondent tone which replaces, in those written after the crisis of his misfortunes, Scott's peculiarly healthy and joyous view of humanity, become, to all who know the history of this heroic struggle, facts and indications more touching than would have been the full continuance of Scott's wonderful powers. They tell, like the tottering step of the wounded gladiator, or the slackening pace of the noble steed, the failing of the powers so generously lavished. There is no more touching or sublime spectacle than that of this great genius, in the full plenitude of his powers voluntarily and without a word of repining abandoning that splendour he was so well qualified to adorn, and that rural life which he so well knew how to appreciate, and shutting himself up in a small house in Edinburgh, to wipe out, by incessant literary taskwork, the liabilities which he had too much delicacy to evade.

In 1820 Scott had been raised to the dignity of the baronetcy, for the enchanting series of the Waverley Novels, though anonymously published, were universally ascribed to him, as to the only man in Great Britain whose peculiar acquirements and turn of genius could have given birth to them, though those who saw Scott familiarly could hardly understand how the hospitable, sport-loving country gentleman, whose time seemed always at the disposal of his friends, could have found leisure for the mere physical amount of labour implied in the mechanical composition of such voluminous works. The secret was explained by the fact that Scott had always adopted the invaluable practice of early rising, and was thus able, after devoting the first hours of morning to composition, to give the remainder of the day to pleasure and to his official duties. The mystery of the true authorship of the Waverley Novels, though it had been long a very transparent one, was maintained by Scott with great care, and it was not till the failure of Ballantynes' house rendered concealment any longer impossible that he formally avowed himself the author of these fictions. Towards the year 1830, his brain, exhausted by such incessant toil, began to show symptoms of hopeless weakness. A stroke of paralysis affected his memory so much that, though he still continued to labour as eagerly as before, he sometimes forgot the commencement of the phrase he was dictating, and he was sent abroad to Italy and the Mediterranean in the vain hope of re-establishing his health. He returned home to die, and after lingering in a state of almost complete unconsciousness for a short time, this great and good man terminated his earthly career on the 21st of September, 1832, at Abbotsford, on the estate which his exertions had restored to his posterity. His personal character is almost perfect. High-minded, generous and hospitable to the extreme, he hardly had an enemy or a misunderstanding during the whole of a long and active career. He was the delight of society, for his conversation, though unpretending, kindly, and jovial, was filled with that union of old-world lore and acute and picturesque observation which renders his works so enchanting, and there never perhaps was a man so totally free from the pettinesses and affectations to which men of letters are prone. In his opinions he was a Tory of the most uncompromising stamp, which was natural enough in a man whose tastes and reading had been directed as his were, but of Toryism he exhibited only the gallant and chivalric side, and was totally free from its meaner and more narrow-minded features. He was emphatically a great and a good man, an honour to his age, to his country, and to human nature.

§ 8 The romantic narrative poems of Scott form an epoch in the history of modern literature. In their subjects, their versification, and their treatment, they were a novelty and an innovation, the success of which was as remarkable as their execution was brilliant. The materials were derived from the legends and exploits of mediæval chivalry, and the persons were borrowed partly from history and partly from imagination. Scott showed a power somewhat akin to that displayed by Shakspeare in combining into one harmonious whole actions partly borrowed from true history and partly filled up from fictitious invention, and in clothing the former with the romantic hues of imagination and picturesque fancy he showed his power no less than in giving to the latter the solidity and reality of truth. The theatre of his first and most original poem was that picturesque Border region which spoke so powerfully to his heart, with whose romantic legends he was so wonderfully familiar, and which furnished, from the inexhaustible stores of his memory, such a mass of striking incident and vivid detail. The notes which he appended in illustration of his poems, like those in which he had elucidated the relics of Border Minstrelsy, show how vast was his treasury of antique lore, and these relics of antiquarian erudition are lighted up with a glow of picturesque and poetical imagination which transforms the dry bones of mediæval learning into the splendid and living body of feudal revival. The greatest of these poems are unquestionably the first three—the Lay of the Last Minstrel, Marmion,—and the Lady of the Lake. According to Scott's own judgment, the interest of the Lay depends mainly upon the style, that of Marmion upon the descriptions, that of the Lady of the Lake upon the incidents. The form adopted in all these works, though it may be remotely referred to a revival of the spirit and modes of thought of the ancient French and Anglo-Norman Trouvères, was more immediately suggested, as Scott himself has confessed, by the example of Coleridge, who in his wild and irregular, but exquisitely musical and fanciful poem, Christabel, repeated by Mr John Stoddart to Scott, gave the key-note upon which Scott composed his vigorous and varied harmony. The real measure of the Trouvères, the octosyllabic rhymed couplet, was far too monotonous, and too liable to degenerate into tediousness, to be likely to please a fastidious age. Scott therefore, though employing this measure generally as the basis of his narrative passages,—for which purpose, from its ease and fluency, it is extremely well adapted,—had the good taste to vary and enliven it by a frequent intermixture of all other sorts of English verse, anapaestic, trochaic, or dactylic. But his principal metrical expedient in the Lay was the employment of two, three, or four verses of octosyllabic structure, rhyming together, and relieved at frequent intervals by a short verse of six syllables, giving at once great vigour and exquisite melody. The versification is more varied in the Lay than in the succeeding poems, and this work exhibits, with some traces of haste and inexperience, more of the lyric spirit, and perhaps more also of the true fire and glow of inspiration, than either of its successors. The plots or intrigues of these poems are in general neither very probable nor very logically constructed, but they allow the poet ample opportunities for striking situations and picturesque episodes. The characters are discriminated rather by broad and vigorous strokes than by any attempt at moral analysis or strong delineation of passion. They are drawn, so to say, from without, and not elaborated from within. The personages are rather general types of chivalric gallantry and female beauty and tenderness than individual men and women. They would interest us nearly as much were they impersonal and without names—the knight, the man-at-arms, the palmer, or the lady, and they derive their power of charming us less from their own individual feelings and experiences than from the admirable power, vivacity, and freshness of the incidents in which they move, and the details with which they are surrounded. Thus they resemble, in some degree, the figures introduced by Salvator Rosa in his landscapes, where the brigands owe their impressiveness to the magnificent background of rock and waterfall. The personages of Byron, on the contrary, like the figures of Titian, communicate their own colouring and sentiment to the landscape against which they are relieved. In his descriptions of scenery, which are exceedingly varied and intensely vivid, Scott sometimes indulges in a quaint but graceful vein of moralising which beautifully connects inanimate nature with the sentiments of the human heart. A charming instance of this will be found in the opening description of Rosalind.

§ 1. The Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805) is drawn from the legends of Border war of the sixteenth century, and necromantic agency, the tourney, the raid, and the attack on a strong castle, are successively described with unobtruding fire and energy. The midnight expedition of Deloraine to the wizard's tomb in Melrose Abbey, the order of battle, the alarm, the feast, and the penitential procession, are painted with the force and picturesqueness of real scenes. Nothing is more wonderful than the completeness with which the poet throws himself back into past ages, and speaks and thinks like a minstrel of the seventeenth century. The various cantos of his poems Scott generally connects together by some kind of framing or setting, often very ingenious in itself, and giving him the opportunity for introducing some of his most beautiful descriptions or most attractive reflections. Thus the fiction of the old Minstrel, who is supposed to recite the Lay for the amusement of the Duchess of Buccleuch, the introductory prefaces of each canto of Marmion, giving us such an enchanting glimpse into Scott's own rural and family life, are not only beautiful in themselves, but most artfully relieve the monotony of the principal subject.

In Marmion (1808) the action is of a loftier and more historical nature, and the catastrophe is made to coincide with the description of the great battle of Flodden, in which Scott gave career to powers

In this department of painting hardly inferior to those of Homer himself. It is indeed "a fearful battle rendered you in music," and the whole scene, from the rush and fury of the onset down to the least heraldic detail or minute trifle of armour and equipment, is delineated with the truth of an eyewitness. Much fault has been found with the awkward oversight of making the hero, the brave but unscrupulous Marmion, guilty of so unknighly a crime as that of forging documents, and similar objections have been made to the whole episode of the goblin page, who plays such fantastic pranks in the Lay, but such blemishes are more than compensated by the scene of the opening of the tomb in the latter poem, and by those of the battle and of the immuring of Constance in Marmion.

In the Lady of the Lake (1810) Scott broke new and fertile ground, he brought into one poem the wild half-savage mountaineers of the Highlands and the refined and chivalrous court of James V. The exquisite scenery of Loch Katrine became, when invested by the magic of the descriptions, the chief object of the traveller's pilgrimage, and it is no exaggeration to say, as Macaulay has said, that the glamour of the great poet's genius has for ever hallowed not only the nature thus first shown in all its loveliness to the curiosity of the world, but even the barbarous tribes whose manners Scott has invested with all the charms of fiction. The adventures of the disguised king, whose gallant and chivalrous character is very dramatically sustained, the dark and sombre Roderick Dhu, and the graceful tenderness of Ellen Douglas, are combined and contrasted with skill, but perhaps the finest passage in this noble poem is the description by the Highland Bard, of the Battle of Beal an Dhuin, and the death of the captive chieftain as he is listening to the fiery lay. Scott delighted in painting both the great warfare of the middle ages, and the lesser warfare, as it may be justly styled, of the chase, and the episode of the stag-hunt at the commencement of this poem is one of the most spirited of the numerous pictures of this kind. It is curious that that personality or individuality which I have asserted to be often wanting in the human characters of Walter Scott's poetry, is always to be found in his inimitable portraits of dogs and horses. This poem, as well as the others, affords striking instances of the truth and reality of his sketches of these noble animals. The sudden appearance of Roderick Dhu and his clan at Coilantogle Ford, the equally sudden vanishing of the armed men at the signal of their chief, and the combat between the royal adventurer Fitz-James with his fierce but chivalrous antagonist are highly dramatic, and exhibit that noble and gallant spirit—the fine flower of chivalric bravery and courtesy—which so universally pervades Scott's poetry as it animated his personal character. For not even the accomplished Sidney himself possessed to a more intense degree the mind and feelings which essentially mark what we call a gentleman. In his splendid and courtly scenes, of which a good example will be found in the conclusion of this tale, where the Knight of Snowdon discloses himself in his real character to Ellen, we observe this lofty and gallant tone of sentiment, as far removed from theatrical emphasis on the one hand as it is from triviality on the other, and not excluding a kind of graceful and princely playfulness on occasion, which makes his noble personages the ideal of knightly courtesy.

§ 5 Rokeby (1813) contains many beautiful descriptions, and draws and contrasts individual characters with force, as the ruffian buccaneer Risingham, Oswald, and Philip Mortham, but the epoch of the Civil Wars was one in which Scott obviously felt himself less at home than in his well-beloved feudal ages, and the feudal sentiment of feeling and treatment do not perhaps harmonise with that epoch. The noble Matilda is a study from Scott's first love, Miss Belches. In the sensitive Wilfrid is perhaps portrayed Scott's melancholy upon rejection, while in the buoyant Irishman Redmond, we see the healthful tendencies which saved Scott from Wilfrid's gloom.

The last of the greater poems, the Lord of the Isles (1815), went back to the fourteenth century, and indeed somewhat farther back than was altogether advantageous for the success of the poem, for the exploits of Robert Bruce have a sort of half-mythical remoteness and vagueness which almost defied even Scott's wonderful power of realising to make them palpable to the reader's belief. Nevertheless the voyage of the hero-king among the Isles, the scenes in the Castle of Artornish, the description of the savage and terrific desolation of the Western Highlands, show little diminution in picturesque power, and the subject gave the author the opportunity of terminating the action with one of those glorious battle-scenes in which he was unrivalled, and in which no modern poet, save Macaulay alone, and he was indeed an imitator of Scott, can be said even to have approached him. The Battle of Bannockburn reminds us of the hand that drew the field of Flodden, and Scott's ardent patriotism must have found pleasure in delineating the great victory of his country's independence, after having so gloriously described the fatal day when that independence was, for a time at least, destroyed.

Harold the Dauntless and the Bridal of Triermain must be regarded rather as half-serious, half-comic, poetical jeux d'esprit than as works on which the author wished to found his reputation. They are written in a less vigorous and muscular style than the poems I have been examining, the latter indeed was playfully intended to pass off upon the public as the production of Scott's friend Erskine. In Triermain (1813) we see a somewhat effeminate and theatrical treatment of a striking legend which figures in the cycle of the exploits of Arthur, and the confusion of time involved in the waking the lady from her enchanted sleep of ages is fatal to the coherency of the interest Harold (1815) strives to combine the spirit of the old Berserk sagas with Christian and Chivalric manners, and the union of the two elements is too discordant to be pleasing. The Vision of Don Roderick (1811), though based upon a striking and picturesque tradition, is principally a song of triumph over the recent defeat of the French arms in the Peninsula, but the moment he leaves the mediæval battle-field Scott seems to lose half his power in this poem, as in Waterloo, his combats are neither those of feudal knights nor of modern soldiers, and there is throughout a struggle painfully visible to be emphatic and picturesque. Indeed it may be said that almost all poems made to order, and written to celebrate contemporary events, have this forced and artificial air. Many of Scott's shorter ballads, Glenfinlas, the Eve of St John, as well as innumerable lyrics, playful or heroic, either standing alone or introduced as songs in his longer poems, are of incomparable beauty. I need only mention the intense warlike fury so gloriously embodied in the Pibroch of Donuil Dhu, the unsurpassable grace and gallantry of Young Lochinvar, which Lady Heron sings in Marmion, and the broad yet sly jollity of Donald Caird, a lyric not unworthy of Burns himself.

§ 6 If we apply to the long and splendid series of prose fictions generally known under the name of the Waverley Novels, the same rough analytical distribution as has been adopted in a former chapter for the purpose of giving a classification of Shakspeare's dramas, we shall obtain the following results. The novels are twenty-nine in number, of varied, though for the most part extraordinary degrees of excellence. They may be divided into the two main classes of Historical, or such as derive their principal interest and material from the delineation of some real persons or events, and those which are entirely or principally founded upon Private Life or Family Legend, and which are more remotely, if at all, connected with history. The first of these two great classes will naturally subdivide into subordinate categories, according to the epoch or country selected by the author, as Scottish, English, and Continental history. According to this rude, and merely approximative method of classification, we shall range seven works under the class of Scottish history, seven under English, also of various epochs, and three will belong to the Continental department, while the novels mainly assignable to the head of Private Life, sometimes, it is true, more or less connected, as in the cases of Rob Roy and Redgauntlet, with historical events, are twelve in number. The latter class are for the most part of purely Scottish scenery and character. I will draw up a sort of rough scheme or plan of the above arrangement, which will at least be found to assist the memory in recalling such a vast and varied cycle of works, and I will afterwards make a few rapid remarks upon these novels in the order of their composition

I HISTORY

- I SCOTTISH . Waverley The period of the Pretender's attempt in 1745
Legend of Montrose The Civil War in the seventeenth century Old Mortality The Rebellion of the Covenanters in the reign of Charles II
Monastery } The deposition and imprisonment Abbot. } of Mary Queen of Scots.
Fair Maid of Perth The reign of Robert III.
Castle Dangerous The time of the Black Douglas.
- II ENGLISH . Ivanhoe The return of Richard Cœur de Lion from the Holy Land Kenilworth The reign of Elizabeth
Fortunes of Nigel Reign of James I
Peveril of the Peak Reign of Charles II , period of the pretended Catholic plot -
Detrothed The wars of the Welsh Marches
Talisman The third Crusade Richard Cœur de Lion
Woodstock The Civil War and Commonwealth
- III CONTINENTAL Quentin Durward Louis XI and Charles the Bold 1468
Anne of Geierstein The epoch of the battle of Nanoy 1476-7
Count Robert of Paris The Crusades at Byzantium

II PRIVATE LIFE AND MIXED.

Guy Mannering
Antiquary
Black Dwarf
Rob Roy
Heart of Midlothian
Bride of Lammermoor.
Pirate
St Ronan's Well.
Redgauntlet
Surgeon's Daughter
Two Drovers.
Highland Widow,

§ 7 In this unequalled series of fictions the author's power of bringing near and making palpable to us the remote and historical, whether of persons, places, or events, is equally wonderful with the skill and certainty with which he clothes with solidity, so to say, the conceptions of his own imagination. In this respect his genius has something in common with that of Shakspeare, as shown in the historical dramas and the two great creators have also in common this peculiarity, that their most secondary and subordinate characters stand out from the canvas with the same relief and vigour as the more prominent dramatis personæ. Scott was generally careless in the construction of his plots. He wrote with great rapidity, and aimed rather at picturesque effect than at logical coherency of intrigue, and his powerful imagination carried him away so vehemently, that the delight he must have felt in developing the humours and adventures of one of those inimitable persons he had invented—often by no means a chief protagonist in his action—sometimes left him no space for the elaboration of an intrigue which he in some cases had thought out beforehand. An example of this will be found, among a multitude of others, in the case of Dugald Dalgetty, or Balho Nicol Jarvie. His style, though always easy and animated, is far from being careful or elaborate, and a curious amount of Scotticisms will be met with in almost every chapter. Description, whether of scenery, incident, or personal appearance, is very abundant in his works, and though this is sometimes carried so far as to become tedious to foreign readers, few of his countrymen, whether North or South Britons, will be found to complain of his luxuriance in this respect, for it has filled his pages with bright and vivid pictures that no lapse of time can efface from the reader's memory.

In Waverley (1814) this mixture of the historical with the familiar is carried out with perfect success, and the union of the stirring and romantic element with the most familiar humour gives to the story the largeness and the variety of life itself. The character of Baron Bradwardine and the description of his household is easily and yet powerfully contrasted with the Highland scenes, and they again flow naturally into the main action of the romantic campaign of Charles Edward. The innumerable personal adventures and scenes through which the hero passes, both in Scotland and England, have that combination of lively interest and fresh out-of-door humour which is so delightful in Fielding, and it is to the eternal honour of Scott that in spite of the immense variety of incidents and personages with which he brings us in contact, he is entirely free from every trace of that coarseness which too often stains the writings of the author of Tom Jones. Much of this superior tone of delicacy is doubtless to be attributed to the improvement in public taste which had taken place between the middle of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century; but we must not forget that Scott, while successfully escaping, in conformity with the spirit of his age, from the coarseness of tone which marked a former epoch, is equally free from the prevailing error of his own, a morbid and sickly sentimentalism, which often veiled real immorality and more dangerous corruption under the guise of superior delicacy. His sentiments are invariably pure, manly, and elevated, and the spirit of the true gentleman is seen as clearly in his deep sympathy with the virtues of the poor and humble, as in the knightly fervour with which he paints the loftier feelings of the more educated classes.

Guy Mannering (1815) is one of the finest of those romances the interest of which is derived from the incidents of private life. The character of Meg Merrilies is truly ideal, without the least overstepping the boundary of nature and probability, and the fellow-feeling of the great artist with the general sentiments of his race is visible in the redeeming qualities with which he invests even his most abandoned and flagitious personages, as Dirk Hatteraick the smuggler, and even Glossin himself. The power of picturesque delineation was never more powerfully shown than in the multitude of descriptions in this powerful tale, and the mixture of the serious and humorous, the romantic and familiar, makes it one of the most truly characteristic of Scott. Demmie Sampson is a creation worthy of the greatest humorist that ever wrote.

The Antiquary (1815) is another admirable novel of Scottish life. The character of Monkbarns, though certainly drawn from a real person, is an example of the most consummate art in idealising matter-of-fact. It bears the same relation, for instance, to one of Galt's carefully elaborated transcripts of Scottish character, that a portrait by Reynolds does to a photograph. The scene of the danger and escape of Sir Arthur Wardour and his daughter, when nearly overwhelmed by the tide, is one of the most highly-wrought yet natural in fiction, and the reader who will carefully examine this passage will be surprised at the impressive effect produced by the simplest means. The dinner at the cenobitium of Monkbarns, and the scene of the seizure of the castle by Sir Arthur's creditors, are intensely humorous and intensely real at the same time, and the funeral of the young fisherman and the death of the conscience-haunted old crone are among the simplest and most powerful effects of fiction.

Rob Roy (1817) among the novels occupies a somewhat similar place to that of the Lady of the Lake among the poems. In this tale Scott brings into contact the picturesque life of the Highlands, and the manners of the North of England and the burgess-life of Glasgow The hero, the Robin Hood of Scotland, is a most impressive delineation, and the skill with which the humours of Baillie Jarvie are interwoven with the stirring and tragic scenes of mountaineer life exhibit Scott's extraordinary powers when following out a story which interested him, not only as an artist but as an antiquarian in Scottish national legend. The attack on the English detachment in the defile, and the tremendous vengeance of Helen Macgregor on the cowardly spy Morris, is one of the most powerfully conceived scenes.

§ 8 Several of the novels of Scott appeared connected together in different series, and, by an expedient often adopted to give an air of authenticity to fictitious compositions, their authorship is attributed to an imaginary writer. Thus the Black Dwarf and Old Mortality form the First Series of the Tales of My Landlord, the manuscript of which is supposed to have been left with a country innkeeper by Peter Pattieson, a village schoolmaster, the fictitious author, the Second Series containing the Heart of Midlothian, and the Third the two tales of the Bride of Lammermoor and the Legend of Montrose. The fiction of Peter Pattieson is not one of the happiest, though it has given the author the opportunity for charming descriptive passages in the introductory part. The Black Dwarf (1816) contains some good pictures of Border life and scenery, and the first appearance of the wild and terrific personage who gives a title to the tale is striking in the highest degree—not the less so when we know that the details are borrowed from a real outcast and misanthrope, but the entrance, in the last scene, of the dwarf in his real character of Sir Edward Mauley, to forbid the marriage, is singularly cold and ineffective. The Timon-like recluse of Mucklestone Muir is a far more impressive personage, and as long as he is kept in the mysterious half-light of obscurity he fills the reader with terror and curiosity. The Border mossrooper, Willie of the Westburnfist, is a sketch of vigour.

Old Mortality (1816) is the vastest, completest, and most vivid picture of an historical epoch that Scott has produced. The contrast between the gallant yet persecuting Cavaliers and the gloomy fanatical Covenanters is very finely and dramatically maintained. The two skilfully opposed personages of Claverhouse and Burley exhibit the author's unrivalled power of seizing and reproducing past ages. His knowledge, both in detail and in its general character, of the epoch which he painted, was immense, and in the vast variety of subordinate characters which crowd his canvas, the wild preachers, Serjeant Bothwell, Major Morton, the old lady of Tillietudlem, we see a truly Shakspearian richness of humour and invention. The scene in the hut after the defeat of the Covenanters, when they are preparing to put to death young Morton, is one of the highest efforts of breathless dramatic interest Scott is accused of allowing his strong Tory and Episcopalian prejudices to colour his portraiture of the two parties, and of painting Claverhouse in too favourable, and the persecuted whigs in too gloomy a tone, but we must not forget the never-failing air of general truth which pervades his pictures, nor the fact that while he certainly does full justice to the stern patriotism and fervent though mistaken piety of the victims, the qualities of the dominant party were in themselves more picturesque and engaging than those of their opponents. The portrait of a sombre Puritan may indeed be admirable as a picture, but the eye will infallibly rest with more complacency on a knight or courtier by Velasquez.

In the Heart of Midlothian (1818) the interest is chiefly of a domestic kind, and concentrated on the sufferings of an humble peasant family for though the Porteous riot, with which the tale opens, is to a certain degree historical, and is related with Scott's unfailing animation and vividness, the reader's feelings are principally enlisted in favour of the heroism of Jeanie Deans and the fate of her unhappy sister. That heroism, as is well known, was no invention, but a real transcript from the annals of humble life but the weary pilgrimage of Jeanie, though founded upon the self-devotion of a real Helen Walker, is none the less powerfully narrated, and no less powerfully seizes on our sympathies. Her adventures on her journey to London, and in particular the scene with Madgo Wildfire, are of a high order of fiction—at once real and intense.

The Bride of Lammermoor (1819) is the most tragic in its tone of Scott's earlier romances, which are generally characterised, like all his writings, by a gay, hopeful, and cheering tone of thought. The incidents on which it is founded were drawn from the annals of an ancient Scottish family. This story is perhaps one of the most impressive of them all there reigns throughout, from the first page to the last painful catastrophe, a sort of atmosphere of sorrow and foreboding, that weighs upon the mind like the breathless pause that presages the hurricane. The action has been compared to that of the Greek tragedy. Fate, cruel and irresistible destiny, overshadows the whole horizon, and the innocent are hurried onward to their doom by the uncontrolled force of a pitiless fatality. The personage of the Master of Ravenswood is in a high degree impressive in its melancholy grandeur, and terror and pity are powerfully combined in the concluding scenes. The death of the hero, though described with extreme simplicity, is pathetic in the extreme, and the finding of the plume of his lost master by the faithful Calob, "who dried it and placed it in his bosom," is a touch of intense and natural pathos.

The Legend of Montrose (1819) is admirable for the inexhaustible humour of Dugald Dalgetty, whose selfishness, pedantry, and military quaintness render him one of the most amusing personages in fiction. This was a character after Scott's own heart, and being profoundly true not only to general nature but to particular individuality, we can easily understand the delight with which the author must have traced out its oddities and held it up in every light and attitude.

§ 9 Ivanhoe (1819) was the first romance in which Scott undertook the delineation of a remote historical epoch. That which he selected was the eventful period when the process of fusion was going on which ultimately united the Norman oppressors and the Saxon serfs into one nationality. The whole tale is a dazzling succession of feudal pictures—the outlaw life of the green wood, the Norman donjon, the lists, the tournament, and the stake, pass before our eyes with a splendour and animation that are truly magical, and make us forget the occasional anachronisms and errors of costume. Robin Hood, under the name of Locksley, is most felicitously introduced, and the chivalric Lion-heart is powerfully contrasted with the meanness and tyranny of John. It has always struck me as a strong proof of the inherent nobility of Scott's nature, that while faithfully representing all the base and odious features of this wretch's character, he still preserves the princely character, and makes John, though a coward, an ingrate, and a tyrant, retain the external manners of his Royal blood. The personality of Rebecca is one of the most beautiful and ideal in fiction, Scott is said to have considered it as his finest female character, and the heroism is never made incompatible either with probability, or with what may be called historical verisimilitude. The drinking scene between the Black Knight and the jolly Hermit is full of humour and rollicking gaiety, and the whole description of the Passage of Arms at Ashby is like an illuminated MS. of the Middle Ages. The scene of the execution of the Jewess carries the reader's interest up to the highest point.

The stories of the Monastery and the Abbot (1820) form an uninterrupted series of adventures. The life and manners of the times are painted with surprising force and variety, and the character of Mary Stuart predominates throughout the whole picture in all the grace and attractiveness of its charms and its misfortunes. The chivalrous and noble nature of Scott shines out brilliantly in every page of these stories, and we hardly blame him for the somewhat misplaced and melodramatic introduction in the former romance of the supernatural interposition of the White Lady of Avenel. The scenes of Mary's captivity at Lochleven, and her escape, are intensely interesting, and the characters of the two brothers Glendinning the Knight and the Priest, are very picturesquely contrasted.

Kenilworth (1821) paints, with great vigour, the age of Elizabeth. The misfortunes of Amy Robsart ultimately culminate in a catastrophe almost too painful. but the characters of the Laon-Queen and her court stand out as in the historical dramas of Shakspeare. Perhaps there are few scenes more picturesque and telling than the forced reconciliation of Leicester and Sussex in the Queen's presence and her behaviour, both there and on all the occasions when she appears, is consonant not only with abstract female nature, but is exquisitely appropriate to the particular nature of that great Princess. The episode of Wayland Smith is a melancholy example of the indiscriminate greediness with which a novelist is apt to press everything into his service. the transformation of the grand and mythical Dædalus of Scandinavian mythology into the cheat and quacksalver of the sixteenth century is extremely unfortunate. but it is more than compensated for by the touching episode of old Sir Walter Robsart's despair at the elopement of his daughter.

In the tale of the Pirate (1821) Scott gives us the fruits of a pleasure expedition which he had taken to the Northern Archipelago. the wild, simple, half-Scandinavian manners of that region furnished him with fresh and unhackneyed dramatis personæ, which he placed amid scenery then almost unknown, and possessing a powerful interest. The two sisters, Minna and Brenda, are among the most graceful and highly finished of his female portraits, and Norna of the Fitful Head is a creation of the same order as Meg Merrilies, though certainly inferior on the whole. The description of the wreck of the 'Revenge' is very powerfully written, and the festivities in the house of the glorious old Udaller are painted with unflagging verve. This novel offers two examples of injudicious harping upon one topic—a fault which Scott, like many other novelists, occasionally falls into. Claude Halero, with his eternal recollections of Dryden, is singularly out of place in the Orkneys, though not more so than Jack Bunce, with his flighty manners and quotations from rhyming tragedies, among the ruffian crew of the pirate. Goffie, however, is a little sketch of great merit.

§ 10 London in the reign of James I, the London of Shakspeare, was the scene of the novel of Nigel (1822). The character of the King is as fine and as complete as anything that Scott had hitherto done. The scenes in Alsatia, the drinking-bout at Duke Hildebrod's, and the murder of the old usurer in Whitefriars, are mimitably good. It is true that the junction between the two plots in this novel is not very artificial, and the catastrophe is both hurried and improbable, but these defects are more than counterbalanced by the astonishing force and brilliancy of particular scenes.

Peveril of the Peak (1823) is chiefly defective in the melodramatic and unsatisfactory parts played by Christian, the evil genius of the story, and the strange dumb dancing-girl who is made the instrument of his long-cherished revenge. These mysterious figures harmonise but ill with the gay and profligate court of Charles II and with the somewhat prosaic details of the Popish conspiracy and the intrigues of Buckingham. The old cavalier Peveril is well contrasted with the gloomy and brooding republican Major Bridgenorth, but Scott, in this novel, has retained too much of his naturally chivalrous and mediæval tone, which is discordant when recurring amid the trivialities and Frenchified debauchery of a period which was in all essentials the very reverse of chivalric. The antithetical and epigrammatic mode in which Buckingham is described, though admirable in Dryden's satire, is quite contrary to the spirit of narrative fiction. And the dwarf, Geoffrey Hudson, is an unnatural excrescence on the story.

The striking and picturesque scenes and manners of the time of Louis XI., and the opposition of the two strongly-contrasted personages of that perfidious tyrant and Charles the Bold of Burgundy, render Quentin Durward (1823) a fascinating story, in spite of the anachronisms and falsifications of historical truth, and many of the scenes, as the revelry of the Boar of Ardennes in the Bishop's palace at Liege, are executed with wonderful force and animation. The reception of the Burgundian declaration of war by Louis in the midst of his court, and the supper at which he receives Crevecœur, while the archer is secretly posted with his loaded musket behind the screen, are examples of Scott's peculiar power of delineation.

In St Ronan's Well (1823) the plot is of so gloomy, painful, and hopeless a character that the reader follows it with reluctance. The general cloud of sorrow and suffering is perhaps not darker in this novel than in the Bride of Lammermoor, but in the latter that sorrow is elevated by dignity and picturesque association, while in this almost all the persons are as odious as they are commonplace. The Earl of Etherington, the villain of the story, is less of a nobleman than of a swindler and a blackguard, and the hopeless persecution of Clara is never relieved by a single gleam of sunshine. Nevertheless the story contains, besides the twaddling and prosaic crowd which is assembled at the Spa, one of those characteristic and perfectly-drawn Scottish figures in which this great author had no rival. Meg Dods is more than enough to compensate for the coarse brutality of some of the characters, and the frivolity of the others. Scott's peculiar powers seem to have deserted him when he attempted to delineate the affectations and absurdities of contemporary fashionable or would-be fashionable society.

Redgauntlet (1824) is the only novel in which Scott has adopted the epistolary form of narration. The letters in which the narrative is couched express agreeably the strongly-opposed character of the two young friends, and in the portions supposed to be written by Alan Fairford, the young Edinburgh advocate, we find many charming recollections of the author's early life. The old Writer, his father, is, it is well known, a portrait of Scott's own father, and Alan's adventures, when wandering in search of his friend, bring him in contact with things and persons delineated with extraordinary force, old Summertrees, with his story of his escape, and above all Nanty Ewart, the smuggling captain, and his narrative of his own life, are masterpieces. I may also mention the admirable ghost-story related by the old fiddler, than which nothing was ever more impressive. Darsie Latimer, like most of Scott's heroes, is rather too much of the walking gentleman, little more than a mere tool in the hands of more powerful plotters.

§ 11 The two novels the Betrothed and the Talisman (1825) form the series entitled Tales of the Crusaders. In them the author returns to those feudal times of which he was so unrivalled a painter. The Betrothed is far inferior to its companion—perhaps the scene of the action—the Marches of the Welsh Border—and the conflict between the wild Celts and the Norman frontier garrison—was in itself less attractive both to reader and writer. True it is, that with the exception of some vigorous and stirring scenes, as for example the desperate sally and death of Raymond Berenger amid the swarms of the Celtic savages who are beleaguering his castle, this tale is read with less pleasure and returned to with less avidity than any except the latest productions of Scott's pen. The Talisman, on the contrary, is one of the most dazzling and attractive of them all—the heroic splendour of the scenery, personages, and adventures, the admirable contrast between Cœur de Lion and Saladin, and the magnificent contrast of the chivalry of Europe with the heroism and civilisation of the East—all this makes the Talisman a book equally delightful to the young and to the old. The introduction of familiar and even of comic details, with which Scott, like Shakespeare, knew how to relieve and set off his heroic pictures, renders this story peculiarly delightful. We seem to be brought near to the great and historic characters, and admitted as it were into their private life, we see that they are men like ourselves. The incidents in which the noble hound so picturesquely figures show how deep was Scott's sympathy with and knowledge of animal nature. There are few of his novels in which by some exquisite touch of description or some pathetic stroke of fidelity he does not interest us in the fate and character of dogs as profoundly as in the human persons. Fangs in Ivanhoe, Bevis in Woodstock, the Peppers and Mustards in Guy Mannering, even the pointer Juno who runs away with the Antiquary's buttered toast, every one of these animals has its distinctive physiognomy, and we cannot wonder that Scott himself was as fond of real dogs as he makes us interested in his imaginary canine personages.

The action of Woodstock (1826) is placed just after the defeat at Worcester and Cromwell and Charles II both appear in the action. The interest, however, is really concentrated upon the noble figure of the chivalrous old Royalist gentleman Sir Henry Lee. The lofty qualities of this cavalier patriarch are so well and so naturally tempered with weaknesses and foibles, that the character is truly living and real. Many of the subordinate scenes and characters, too, as Jocelyn the ranger, Wildrike, the plotting Dr Rochecliffe, even Parke and the old woman, are ever fresh and interesting. The happy death of the old knight, amid the full triumph of the Restoration, is a scene powerfully and pathetically conceived, and may bear a comparison with that almost sublime passage, the description of the death of Mrs Witherington in the Surgeon's Daughter. Cromwell and Charles have not been so successfully treated: the one has been unduly lowered, the other as unduly elevated, by the strong political partialities of the author.

§ 12 The Chronicles of the Canongate contain the short tales of the Highland Widow, the Two Devils, and the novels of the Surgeon's Daughter and the Fair Maid of Perth. By a fiction like that of Peter Pattison, the imaginary author of the Tales of My Landlord, these were supposed to be the production of Chrystal Croftingry, a retired Scottish gentleman, whose life had been full of agitation. The introductory portion, describing the life of this person, and the causes which led him to try his skill in authorship, is very agreeably written, and contains one most pathetic incident, but we are throughout in this part, as well as in the tales, a somewhat mechanically and desponding tone of thought, which may partly be ascribed to the approach of old age, but still more probably to the influence of Scott's personal calamities. The two first stories are comparatively insignificant, but the Surgeon's Daughter (1827) is in its incidents and characters so sombre and gloomy that the impression it leaves is far from agreeable. The hero, Richard Middleton, is a villain of such mean and ignoble calibre, and the innocent are throughout pursued by such hopeless and unmitigated misfortune, that the effect of the whole is unpleasant. The latter portion of the incidents takes place in India, in which country Scott does not appear at home: the descriptions read as if they had been got up out of books.

The Fair Maid of Perth (1828) is a half historical picture from an interesting period of the early Scottish annals. The great defect of the story is the hazardous and unsuccessful novelty of representing the hero Conachar—or rather one of the heroes, for perhaps the Smith is the real protagonist—is a coward, an expedient that has more of novelty than felicity to recommend it Novelists have indeed succeeded tolerably well with a plain, nay, even with an ugly heroine, but a cowardly hero—even though his poltroonery be represented as a sort of congenital disease or weakness—is what never did and never can be made interesting And this is the more unfortunate when we think of the period of the story, the nation, the age, and the position of Conachar the young chief of a Highland Clan, in the wildest and most warlike age of Scottish history The Smith is, however, one of Scott's happy characters, and the scene of the combat between the two clans is painted with something of the same fire that glows in Marmion and in the Lady of the Lake Henbane Dwining, the potticARRIER, though powerfully conceived, is a sort of anachronism in the story, and the assassination of the Duke of Rothsay, as a scene of horror, is not to be compared with the murder of old Trapbois in Nigel

Anne of Geierstein (1829) gave the opportunity of contrasting the wild nature and simple manners of the Swiss patriots with the feudal splendour of the Court of Burgundy The reception of the Shepherd ambassador by Charles in his cour plénière is a piece of magnificent painting, the execution of de Hagenbach and the rout of Nancy are also very powerfully given but we confess that the scene of the Vehm-tribunal, though carefully worked up, has something of an artificial and theatrical effect

In the two last novels written by this mighty creator, Count Robert of Paris and Castle Dangerous (1831), we see, with pity and respect, the last feeble runnings of this bright and abundant fountain, soon to be choked up for ever The scenes and descriptions have the air of being painfully worked up from books, the characters are conventional and without individuality, the dialogues are long and pointless, and nothing remains of the great master's manner but that free, honest, pure, and noble spirit of thought and feeling which never deserted him

In the delineation of character, as well as in the painting of external nature, Scott proceeds objectively his mind was a mirror that faithfully reflected the external surfaces of things He does not show the profound analysis which penetrates into the internal mechanism of the passions and anatomises the nature of man, nor does he communicate, like Richardson and Byron, his own personal colouring to the creations of his fancy, but he sets before you so brightly, so transparently, so vividly, all that is necessary to give a distinct idea, that his images remain indelibly in the memory

CHAPTER XXI

BYRON, MOORE, SHILLLEY, KILTS, CAMPBELL, LEIGH HUNT, AND WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR

- § 1 LORD BYRON His life and writings § 2 Childe Harold § 3 Romantic Tales The Giaour, Sige of Corinth, Corsair, &c § 4 Beppo and the Vision of Judgment The Island and other poems § 5 Dramatic works Manfred and Cain Marino Faliero The Two Iuscarl Sardanapalus Werner § 6 Don Juan § 7 THOMAS MOORE. His life and writings § 8 Translation of Anacreon, other poems Odes and Epistles Irish Melodies National Airs Sacred Songs § 9 Political lampoons the Judge Family in Paris § 10 Lalla Rookh and the Loves of the Angels § 11 Prose works the Pictureman, and Biographies of Sheridan, Byron, and Lord Edward Fitzgerald § 12 PIERCE BISHOP SHILLLEY His life § 13 Queen Mab Alastor Reverie of Islam Hellas Other poems Prometheus Unbound The Cenci § 14 Rosalind and Helen The Sensitive Plant § 15 JOHN KILTS His life and writings § 16 THOMAS CAMPBELL. His life and writings § 17 LEIGH HUNT His life and writings § 18 WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR His life and writings

§ 1 (THE immense influence exerted by Byron on the taste and sentiment of Europe has not yet passed away, and though far from being so supreme and despotic as it once was, is not likely to be ever effaced. He called himself, in Don Juan, "the grand Napoleon of the realms of rhyme," and there is some similarity between the suddenness and splendour of his literary career and the meteoric rise and domination of the first Napoleon. They were both, in their respective departments, the offspring of revolution, and both, after reigning with absolute power for some time, were deposed from their supremacy, though the reign of each will leave profound traces in the history of the nineteenth century.)

GEORGE GORDON NOEL BYRON (1788-1824), born in London, January, 1788, was the son of an unprincipled profligate and of a Scottish heiress of ancient and illustrious extraction, but of a temper so passionate and uncontrolled that it reached, in its capricious alternations of fondness and violence, very nearly to the limit of insanity. Her dowry had been dissipated by her worthless husband, and the lady, with her boy, was obliged to retire to Aberdeen, where they lived for several years in very straitened circumstances. The future poet inherited from his mother a susceptibility almost morbid, which her alternate fondling and abuse of him still further aggravated. His personal beauty was remarkable, but that fatality that seemed to poison in him all good gifts of fortune and nature, while giving him "a head that sculptors loved to model," afflicted him with a serious malformation in one of his feet, which was ever a source of pain and mortification to his vanity. He was about ten years old when the death of his grand-uncle, a strange, eccentric, and misanthropic recluse, made him successor to the baronial title of one of the most ancient aristocratic houses in England—a house which had figured in our history from the time of the Crusades, and had been for several generations notorious for the vices and even crimes of its representatives. With the title he inherited large though embarrassed estates, and the noble picturesque residence of Newstead Abbey near Nottingham. This sudden change in the boy's prospects of course relieved both mother and child from the pressure of almost sordid poverty, and he was sent first to Harrow School, and afterwards to Trinity College, Cambridge. At school he distinguished himself by his moody and passionate character, and by the romantic intensity of his youthful friendships. Precocious in everything, he had already felt with morbid violence the sentiment of love. At college he became notorious for the irregularities of his conduct, for his contempt for academical discipline, and for his friendship with several young men of splendid talents but sceptical principles. He was a greedy though desultory reader, and his imagination appears to have been especially attracted to Oriental history and travel.

It was while at Cambridge that Byron made his first literary attempt, in the publication of a small volume of fugitive poems, Hours of Idleness, by Lord Byron, a Minor (1807). This collection, though in no respect inferior to the youthful essays of ninety-nine out of every hundred young men, was seized upon and most severely criticised in the Edinburgh Review, a literary journal then just commencing that career of brilliant innovation which rendered it so formidable. The judgment of the reviewer as to the total want of value in the poems was perfectly just, but the unfairness consisted in so powerful a journal invidiously going out of its way to attack such a very humble production as a volume of feeble and pretentious commonplaces written by a young lord. The criticism, however, threw Byron into a frenzy of rage. He instantly set about taking revenge in the satire, English Bards and Scotch-Reviewers (1809), in which he involved in one storm of invective not only his enemies of the Edinburgh Review, but almost all the literary men of the day—Walter Scott, Moore, and many others, from whom he had received no provocation whatever. He soon became ashamed of his unreasoning and indiscriminate violence, tried, but vainly, to suppress the poem, and became indeed, in after life, the friend and sincere admirer of some of those whom he had lampooned in this burst of youthful retaliation. Though written in the classical, declamatory, and regular style of Gifford, himself an imitator of Pope, the English Bards shows a fervour and power of expression which enables us to see in it, dimly, the earnest of Byron's intense and fiery genius, which was afterwards to exhibit itself under such different literary forms

Byron now went abroad (1809-1811), and visiting countries then little frequented, and almost unknown to English society, he filled his mind with the picturesque life and scenery of Greece, Turkey, and the East, and accumulated those stores of character and description which he poured forth with such royal splendour in his poems. The first two cantos of Childe Harold (1812) took the public by storm, and carried the enthusiasm for Byron's poetry to a pitch of frenzy of which we have now no idea, and at once placed him at the summit of social and literary popularity. These were followed in rapid and splendid succession by those romantic tales, written somewhat upon the plan which Scott's poems had rendered so fashionable, the Giacour, Bride of Abydos, Corsair, Lara. As Scott had drawn his materials from feudal and Scottish life, Byron broke up new ground in describing the manners, scenery, and wild passions of the East and of Greece—a region as picturesque as that of his rival, as well known to him by experience, and as new and fresh to the public he addressed. Living in England in the full blaze of his dawning fame, the poet became the lion of the day. His life was passed in fashionable frivolities, and he drained, with feverish avidity, the intoxicating cup of fame. In 1815 he married Miss Milbanke, a lady of considerable expectations, but the union was an unhappy one, and domestic disagreements were embittered by improvidence and debt. In about a year Lady Byron, by the advice of her family, and of a very distinguished lawyer who was consulted on the subject, suddenly quitted her husband, and the reasons for taking this step will ever remain a mystery. The scandal of the separation deeply wounded the poet, who to the end of his life asserted that he never knew the real motive of the divorce, and the society of the fashionable world, passing with its usual caprice from exaggerated idolatry to exaggerated hostility, pursued its former darling with a furious howl of reprobation. He again left England (1816), and thenceforth his life was passed uninterruptedly on the Continent, in Switzerland, at Rome, Pisa, Ravenna, and Venice, and in Greece, where he solaced his embittered spirit with misanthropical attacks upon all that his countrymen held sacred, and, at least during the earlier years, sank deeper in sensuality. While in Switzerland in 1816 he produced the third canto of Childe Harold, and the Prisoner of Chillon, and began Manfred. Between 1816 and 1821 he was principally residing at Venice and Ravenna, and at this period he wrote Mazeppa, the first five cantos of Don Juan, and most of his tragedies, as Marino Faliero, Sardanapalus, the Two Foscari, and Cain, in some of which the influence of Shelley's literary manner and philosophical tenets is more or less traceable. Between the years 1821 and 1823, Byron lived at Pisa, Leghorn, and Genoa. The deep profligacy of his private life in Italy, which had undermined his constitution as well as degraded his genius, was in some measure redeemed by an illegitimate, though not ignoble connexion with the young Countess Guiccioli, a beautiful and accomplished girl, united by a marriage of family interest with a man old enough to be her grandfather. In 1823, Byron, who had deeply sympathised with revolutionary efforts in Italy, and was wearied with the companionship of Leigh Hunt and others who surrounded him, determined to devote his fortune and his influence in aid of the Greeks, then struggling for their independence. He arrived at Missolonghi at the beginning of 1824, and after giving striking indications of his practical talents, as well as of his ardour and self-sacrifice, he succumbed under the marsh fever of that unhealthy region, rendered still more deleterious by the excesses which had ruined his constitution. He died, amid the lamentations of the Greek patriots, whose benefactor he had been, and amid the universal sorrow of civilised Europe, on the 19th of April, 1824, at the early age of thirty-six.

§ 2 The plan of Childe Harold, though well adapted for the purpose of introducing descriptive and meditative passages, and carrying the reader through widely-distant scenes, is not very probable or ingenious. It is a series of gloomy but intensely poetical monologues, put into the mouth of a jaded and misanthropic voluptuary, who takes refuge from his disenchantment of pleasure in the contemplation of the lovely or historical scenes of travel. The first canto principally describes Portugal and Spain, and contains many powerful pictures of the great battles which rendered memorable the struggle between those oppressed nationalities, aided by England, against the colossal power of Napoleon. Thus we have the tremendous combat of Talavera, and scenes of Spanish life and manners, as the bull-fight. The second canto carries the wanderer to Greece, Albania, and the Ægean Archipelago, and here Byron gave the first earnest of his unequalled genius in reproducing the scenery and the wild life of those picturesque regions. In the third canto, which is perhaps the finest and intensest in feeling of them all, Switzerland, Belgium, and the Rhine, give splendid opportunities not only for pictures of nature of consummate beauty, but of incidental reflections on Napoleon, Voltaire, Rousseau, and the great men whose glory has thrown a new magic over those enchanting scenes. This canto also contains the magnificent description of the Battle of Waterloo, and bitter and melancholy but sublime musings on the vanity of military fame. In the fourth canto the reader is borne successively over the fairest and most touching scenes of Italy—Venice, Ferrara, Florence, Rome, and Ravenna—and not only the immortal dead, but the great monuments of painting and sculpture are described with an intensity of feeling that had never before been seen in poetry. The poem is written in the nine-lined or Spenserian stanza, and in the beginning of the first canto the poet makes an effort to give something of the quaint and archaic character of the Fuero Queene, by adopting old words, as Spenser had done before him, but he very speedily, and with good taste, throws off the useless and embarrassing restraint. In intensity of feeling, in richness and harmony of expression, and in an imposing tone of gloomy, sceptical, and misanthropic reflection, Childe Harold stands alone in our literature, and the freedom and vigour of the flow, both as regards the images and the language, make it one of the most impressive works in literature.

§ 3 The romantic tales of Byron are so numerous that it will be impossible to examine them in detail. They are all marked by singular peculiarities of thought and treatment, though they may differ in the kind and degree of their respective excellencies. The Giaour, the Siege of Corinth, Mazeppa, Parisina, the Prisoner of Chillon, and the Bride of Abydos, are written in the somewhat irregular and flowing octosyllabics which Scott brought into fashion, while the Corsair, Lara, and the Island are in the regular English rhymed heroic measure. It is difficult to decide which of these metrical forms Byron uses with greater vigour and effect. In the Giaour, Siege of Corinth, the Bride, and Corsair, the scene is laid in Greece or the Greek Archipelago, and the picturesque contrast between Christian and Mussulman, as well as the dramatic scenery, manners, and costume of those regions, are powerfully set before the reader. These poems have in general a fragmentary character—they are made up of imposing and intensely interesting moments of passion and action. Neither in these nor in any of his works does Byron show the least power of delineating variety of character. There are but two personages in all his poems—a man in whom unbridled passions have desolated the heart, and left it hard and impenetrable as the congealed lava-stream, or only capable of launching its concealed fires at moments of strong emotion, a man contemptuous of his kind, whom he rules by the very force of that contempt, sceptical and despairing, yet feeling the softer emotions with an intensity proportioned to the rarity with which he yields to them. The woman is the woman of the East—sensuous, devoted and loving, but loving with the unreasoning attachment of the lower animals. These elements of character, meagre and unnatural as they are, are however set before us with such consummate force and intensity, and are framed, so to say, in such brilliant and picturesque surroundings, that the reader, and particularly the young and inexperienced reader, invariably loses sight of their contradictions, and there is a time when all of us have thought the sombre, scowling, mysterious heroes of Byron the very ideal of all that is noble and admirable. Nothing can exceed the skill with which the most picturesque light and shade is thrown upon the features of these Rembrandt-like or rather Tintoretto-like sketches. In all these poems we meet with inimitable descriptions, tender, animated, or profound, which harmonise with the tone of the dramatis personæ: thus the famous comparison of enslaved Greece to a corpse in the Giaour, the night-scene and the battle scene in the Corsair and Lara, the eve of the storming of the city in the Siege of Corinth, and the fiery energy of the attack in the same poem, the exquisite opening lines in Parisina, besides a multitude of others, might be adduced to prove Byron's extraordinary genius in communicating to his pictures the individuality and the colouring of his own feelings and character—proceeding, in this respect, in a manner precisely opposed to Walter Scott, whose scenes are as it were reflected in a mirror, and take no colouring from the poet's own individuality. If Scott's picturesque faculty be like that of the pure surface of a lake, or the colourless plane of a mirror, that of Byron resembles those tinted glasses which convey to a landscape viewed through them the yellow gleam of a Cuyp, or the sombre gloom of a Zurbaran. Lara is undoubtedly the sequel of the Corsair, the returned Spanish noble of mysterious adventures is no other than Conrad of the preceding poem, and the disguised page is Gulnare. The Siege of Corinth is remarkable for the extraordinary variety and force of its descriptions—a variety greater than will generally be found in Byron's tales. Parisina derives its chief interest from the deep pathos with which the author has invested a painful and even repulsive story, and in the Prisoner of Chillon the hopeless tone of sorrow and uncomplaining suffering which runs through the whole gives it a strong hold upon the reader's feelings. Mazeppa, though founded upon the adventures of an historical person, is singularly and almost ludicrously at variance with the real character of the hero. The powerfully-written episode of the gallop of the wild steed, with the victim lashed on his back, makes the reader forget all incongruities.

§ 4. In Beppo and the Vision of Judgment Byron has ventured upon the gay, airy, and satirical. The former of these poems is a little episode of Venetian intrigue narrated in singularly easy verse, and exhibiting a minute knowledge of Italian manners and society. Written like Don Juan in eight-line stanza, it is exquisitely playful and sparkling. The Vision is a most severe attack upon Southey, in which Byron vigorously repels the accusations brought by his antagonist against the alleged immorality of his poems, and in brilliant eight-line stanza shows up with unmerciful bitterness the contrast between Southey's former extreme liberalism and his then extreme devotion to Court principles, mocking the very poor hexameter verse which Southey, as Poet Laureate, composed as a sort of apotheosis of George III. Though somewhat ferocious and truculent, this satire is brilliant, and contains many picturesque and even beautiful passages, and was certainly, under the circumstances of provocation, a fair and allowable attack. The Island, in four cantos, is a striking incident extracted from the narrative of the famous mutiny of the Beauty, when Captain Bligh and his officers were cast off by his rebellious crew in an open boat, and the mutineers, under the command of Christian, established themselves in half-savage life on Pitcairn's Island, where their descendants were recently living. Among the less commonly read of Byron's longer poems I may mention the Age of Bronze, a vehement satirical declamation, the Curse of Minerva, directed against the spoliation of the frieze of the Parthenon by Lord Elgin, in which the description of sunset, forming the opening of the poem, is inexpressibly beautiful, the Lament of Tasso, and the Prophecy of Dante, the latter written in the difficult terzarima, one of the earliest attempts of any English poet to employ that measure. The Dream is in some respects the most complete and touching of Byron's minor works. It is the narrative, in the form of a vision, of his early love-sorrow for Mary Chaworth. There is hardly, in the whole range of literature, so tender, so lofty, and so condensed a life-drama as that narrated in these verses. Picture after picture is softly shadowed forth, all pervaded by the same mournful glew, and "the doom of the two creatures" is set before us in all its hopeless misery.

§ 5 The dramatic works of Byron are in many respects the precise opposite of what might à priori have been expected from the peculiar character of his genius. In form they are cold, severe, lofty, partaking far more of the manner of Alfieri than of that of Shakspeare. Artful involution of intrigue they have not, but though singularly destitute of powerful passion they are full of intense sentiment. The finest of them is Manfred, which, however, is not so much a drama as a dramatic poem, in some degree resembling Faust, by which indeed it was suggested. It consists not of action represented in dialogue, but of a series of sublime soliloquies, in which the mysterious hero describes nature, and pours forth his despair and his self-pity. The scene with which it opens has a strong resemblance to the first monologue of Goethe's hero, and the invocation of the Witch of the Alps, the meditation of Manfred on the Jungfrau, the description of the ruins of the Coliseum, are singularly grand and touching as detached passages, but have no dramatic cohesion. In this work, as well as in Cain, we see the full expression of Byron's sceptical spirit, and the tone of half-melancholy, half-mocking misanthropy which colours so much of his writings, and which was in him partly sincere and partly put on for effect, for Byron was far from that profound conviction in his anti-religious doctrines which glows so fervently through every page written by his friend Shelley, who unquestionably exerted a very powerful influence upon Byron at one part of his career. The most exclusively historical pieces—Marino Faliero, the Two Foscari—are derived from Venetian annals, but neither in the one nor in the other has Byron clothed the events with that living and intense reality which the subjects would have received, I will not say from Shakspeare, but even from Rowe or Otway. There is in these dramas a complete failure in variety of character, and the interest is concentrated on the obstinate harping of the principal personages upon one topic—their own wrongs and humiliations. This is indeed at times impressive, and, aided by Byron's magnificent powers of expression, gives us noble occasional tirades, but it is essentially undramatic, for it is inconsistent with that play and mutual action and reaction of one character or passion upon another, in which dramatic interest essentially consists. In Sardanapalus the remoteness of the epoch chosen, and our total ignorance of the Assyrian life of those times, removes the piece into the region of fiction. But the character of Myrrha, though beautiful, is an anachronism and an impossibility, and the antithetic contrast between the effeminacy and sudden heroism in Sardanapalus belongs rather to the satire or to the moral disquisition than to tragedy. Werner, a piece of domestic interest, is bodily borrowed, as far as regards its incidents, and even much of its dialogue, from the German's Story in Miss Lee's Canterbury Tales. It still retains possession of the stage, because, like Sardanapalus, it gives a good opportunity for the display of stage decoration and declamation, but Byron's share in its composition extends little further than the cutting up of Miss Lee's prose into tolerably regular but often very indifferent lines.

§ 6 Don Juan is the longest, the most singular, and in some respects the most characteristic, of Byron's poems. It is, indeed, one of the most remarkable and significant productions of the age of revolution and scepticism which almost immediately preceded its appearance. It is written in octaves, or ottava rima, a verse borrowed from the Italians, and particularly from the half-serious half-comic writers who followed in the wake of Ariosto. The outline of the story is the old Spanish legend of Don Juan de Tenorio, upon which have been founded so many dramatic works, among the rest the Festin de Pierre of Molière and the Don Giovanni of Mozart. The fundamental idea of the atheist and voluptuary enabled Byron to carry his hero through various adventures, serious and comic, to exhibit his unrivalled power of description, and left him unfettered by any necessities of time and place. Byron's Don Juan is a young Spanish hidalgo, whose education is described with strong satiric power intermingled with frequent and bitter personal allusions to those against whom the author has a grudge. Being detected in a scandalous intrigue with a married woman, he is obliged to leave Spain. He embarks on board a ship which is wrecked in the Greek Archipelago, all hands perishing after incredible sufferings in an open boat, and is thrown exhausted and almost dying on one of the smaller Cyclades. Here he is cherished and sheltered by Haidee, a lovely Greek girl, the half-savage daughter of Lambro, the master of the isle, now absent on a piratical expedition. Haidee and Juan are married, and in the midst of the wedding festivities Lambro returns, Juan is overpowered, wounded, and put on board the pirate's vessel to be carried to Constantinople, and Haidee soon afterwards dies of grief and despair. Juan is exposed for sale in the slave-market at Stamboul, attracts the notice of the favourite Sultan, who buys him and introduces him in the disguise of an odalisque into the seraglio, but Juan refuses the love of Gulbeyaz, and afterwards escapes from Constantinople in company with Smith, an Englishman whom he has encountered in slavery. The hero is then made to arrive at the siege of Ismail by the Russian army under Souvaroff, the horrible details of the storming and capture of the city are borrowed from official and historical sources, and reproduced with the same fidelity as the pictures of the shipwreck from Admiral Byron's narrative of his own calamities. Juan distinguishes himself in the assault, and is selected to carry the bulletin of victory to the Empress Catherine. The Court of St Petersburg is then described, and Juan becomes the favourite and lover of the Northern Semiramis, but his health giving way he is sent on a diplomatic mission to England. Here the author gives us a very minute and sarcastic account of English aristocratic society, and in the midst of what promises to turn out an amusing though not over moral adventure, the narrative abruptly breaks off. Don Juan, in the imperfect state in which it was left, consists of sixteen cantos, and there is no reason why it should not have been indefinitely extended. It was the author's intention to bring his hero's adventures to a regular termination, but so desultory a series of incidents have no real coherency. The merit of this extraordinary poem is the richness of ideas, thoughts, and images, which form an absolute plethora of witty allusion and sarcastic reflection, and above all the constant passage from the loftiest and tenderest tone of poetry to the most familiar and mocking style. These transitions are incessant, and the artifice of such sudden change of sentiment which at first dazzles and enchants the reader, ultimately wears him. The tone of morality is throughout very low and selfish, even materialistic everything in turn is made the subject of a sneer, and the brilliant but desolating lightning of Byron's sarcasm blasts alike the weeds of hypocrisy and cant, and the flowers of faith and the holiest affections. This Mephistophiles-like tone is rendered more effective by perpetual contrast with the warmest outbursts of feeling and the most admirable descriptions of nature the air of superiority which is implied in the very nature of sarcasm renders Don Juan peculiarly dangerous, as it is peculiarly fascinating, to young readers. In spite of much superficial flippancy, this poem contains an immense mass of profound and melancholy satire, and in a very large number of serious passages Byron has shown a power, picturesqueness, and pathos which in other works may indeed be paralleled, but cannot be surpassed.

§ 7 THOMAS MOORE (1779-1852), the personal friend and biographer of Byron, was born in Dublin of humble but most respectable parents, through whose wise affection he received as good an education as a remarkable boyish ability seemed to call for. He was one of the first Catholics who took advantage of the Act which opened Trinity College to those who were not of the Established Church. During his college career he knew Robert Emmet, and under the influence of that powerful mind learned to sympathize with projects of revolution. What Moore calls "the frightful explosion" of 1798 changed his views as to open rebellion, but he remained an ardent opponent of religious and political ascendancy. Moore graduated in 1798, and early in 1799 went to London to study law in the Temple, and to publish his translation of the Odes of Anacreon, which was dedicated to the Prince Regent. Moore had qualities to make him the darling of gay society, a great talent for conversation, an agreeable voice, with musical skill enough to give enchanting effect to his tender or passionate or patriotic songs. But his dignity of character perhaps suffered from his weakness for the frivolous triumphs of fashionable circles. In 1803 he obtained an appointment in the Bermudas, through which he was led to visit these lovely islands, and to make a tour in America, whence some of the best of his early poems. He appointed a deputy in the Bermudas, and was absent from England only fourteen months. Years later, in 1819, news came to Moore at his home, Sloperston Cottage, in Wiltshire, that his deputy had fled, having embezzled a large sum of money. Moore resolved to pay this money with the earnings of his pen, and in order to be free to work, left England, where he was liable to arrest. The Government ultimately forgave Moore the debt, on his paying a fraction of the large sum embezzled. His exile lasted about three years (1819-1822), during which he lived chiefly in Paris.

The Odes and Epistles of 1806 include the group of poems which are reminiscent of the Bermudas and America. A severe criticism in the Edinburgh Review of the moral tone of parts of the volume caused Moore to send Jeffrey a challenge. The police stopped the duel, and Byron's mockery in English Bards and Scotch Reviewers drew upon him also a challenge from Moore, but their friends made peace. In 1811 Moore married Miss Bessie Dyke, of Kilkenny, a young actress. In private life Moore was good, affectionate, and true, and "to the day of his death his excellent and beautiful wife received from him the homage of a lover." The greater part of Moore's long life was devoted to the production of a rapid and wonderfully varied series of works, prose and verse, of which some had an immense and all a respectable success. They may be divided roughly into lyric poems, political squibs of great originality and excellence, narrative poems, of which the chief are Lalla Rookh, and The Loves of the Angels, a novel, The Epicurean, and three biographies, of Shelidan, of Byron, and of the unfortunate Irish patriot, Lord Edward Fitzgerald. As an Irishman and a Catholic, Moore was naturally a Whig "and something more," and the oppression of his country and his faith not only suggested the most touching and spirit-stirring of his patriotic lyrics, but the biting and yet pleasant sarcasm of his political pasquinades. He spent the latter part of his life in Sloperston Cottage, near Bowood, the residence of the Marquess of Lansdowne, who had cherished his friendship. Moore's last years were sorrowful, his five children had died young, and his mental powers failed.

§ 8 The poetical portion of Moore's writings consists chiefly of lyrics, whether serious or comic, the most celebrated among them being the Irish Melodies. The version of Anacreon, though tolerably faithful in the general rendering, is far too ornamental to give a correct idea of the manner of the Greek poet. Moore is not indeed more voluptuous than his original, but Anacreon clothes voluptuousness of sentiment in the most exquisite simplicity of expression. His muse is like the lovely nakedness of an undraped antique marble. Moore has adorned the statue with the dazzling but not always sterling decorations of antithesis and modern colouring.

The Irish Melodies, a collection of about 125 songs, were composed in order to furnish appropriate words to beautiful national airs, some of great antiquity, which had been degraded by becoming gradually associated with lines often vulgar and sometimes even indecent. The music was arranged by Sir John Stevenson, an Irish composer of merit, and Moore furnished the poetry, which, as regards popularity, occupied in England and Ireland a somewhat similar position with that of Béranger in France.

Patriotism, love, and conviviality form the subject-matter of these charming lyrics the past glories and sufferings, and the future greatness of Ireland are indeed frequently allegorised in many which appear devoted to love as the praises of wine and women in the songs of Hafiz are interpreted by orthodox Mahomedan critics to signify, esoterically, the raptures of religious mysticism. The versification of these songs has never been surpassed for melody and neatness indeed, from simple declamation of them, it is easy to guess at the airs to which they are to be sung. The language is always clear, appropriate, and concise, and sometimes reaches majesty, vigour, or tenderness. The pathetic effect is seldom missed, except when the author is led away to introduce one of those conceits or witty turns, which, by their very epigrammatic cleverness, are destructive of lofty or tender emotion. Though Moore is destitute of the intense feeling of Burns, or of that exquisite sensibility to popular feeling which makes Béranger the darling of the middle and lower classes of France, yet he appeals, as they do, to the universal sentiments of his countrymen, and his popularity is proportionally great. The Irish Melodies appeared in a succession-of fasciculi between 1807 and 1834. On a somewhat similar plan Moore composed about seventy songs intended to be accompanied by tunes peculiar to various countries. These he called National Airs, and they exhibit the same exquisite sensibility to the musical character of the different airs, and the same neatness of expression, as the Irish Melodies, but naturally are inferior to them in intensity of patriotic feeling. A small collection of Sacred Songs affords examples both of the merits and defects of Moore's lyrical genius, though the latter are perhaps more prominent as destructive occasionally of the lofty religious tone which the subject required. None of these collections is without many examples of consummate felicity, both in the conception and treatment of song-composition, and they all exhibit a high polish, an almost fastidious finish of style, which sometimes interferes with their effect by giving a sort of artificial and drawing-room refinement, yet certainly makes them models of perfection in their peculiar manner.

§ 9 As a Liberal, an Irishman, and a Catholic, Moore naturally felt intense hostility to those retrograde, bigoted, and tyrannical principles which so long governed the policy of England towards his country, and for many years he kept up a constant fire of brilliant and witty lampoons. These were directed against the Tory party in general, and were showered with peculiar vivacity and stinging effect upon the Regent, afterwards George IV., Lord Eldon, Castlereagh, and all who were opposed to the granting of any relaxation to the Irish Catholics. Moore's political squibs form an era in the history of this class of composition. Instead of the coarse and malignant invective which generally marked, before this time, these party lampoons, Moore introduced a tone of good society, elegance, playfulness, and ingenuity. His Odes on Cash, Corn, and Catholics, his Fables for the Holy Alliance, his Two-penny Post-Bag, show an inexhaustible invention of quaint and ingenious ideas, and the power of bringing the most apparently remote allusions to bear upon the person or thing selected for attack. The sharp and highly-polished shafts of Moore's satire must have inflicted exquisitely painful wounds upon the self-love of his victims, but they were wounds which rendered complaint impossible and retaliation difficult. Some of the most celebrated of these brilliant pasquinades were combined into a sort of story, as for example the Fudge Family in Paris, purporting to be a series of letters written from France at the period of the Restoration of the Bourbons. The authors of the correspondence are Mr Fudge, a creature of Lord Castlereagh and a kind of political spy, his son Bob, a dandy and epicure, and his daughter Biddy, a frivolous, romance-reading Miss. The letters of the father give a bitterly ironical picture of the baseness and servility of the triumphant Royalist party, those of the son are a delicious mixture of cookery and dress, and the daughter, in high-flying romantic jargon, describes her adventures with a distinguished-looking stranger with whom she falls in love, thinking that he is the King of Prussia, then incognito at Paris, and who afterwards turns out, to her horror, to be a linen-draper's shopman. Nothing can be more animated, brilliant, and humorous than the description of the motley life and the giddy whirl of amusement in Paris at that memorable moment, and the whole is seasoned with such a multitude of personal and political allusions, that the Fudge Family will probably ever retain its popularity, as both a social and political sketch of a most interesting moment in modern European history.

§ 10 The longer and more ambitious poems of Moore are Lalla Rookh and the Loves of the Angels, the former being much the best. The plan of Lalla Rookh is original and happy, it consists of a little prose love-tale describing the journey of a beautiful Oriental princess from Delhi to Bucharia, where she is to meet her betrothed husband, the King of the latter country. Brilliance of fancy and immense stores of Eastern reading are lavished on the description of this gorgeous progress, and the details of scenery, manners, and ceremonial are artfully relieved by a pleasant epigrammatic humour displayed in the character of the princess's pedantic chamberlain, Fadladeen. For Lalla Rookh's amusement, when stopping for her night's repose, a young Bucharian poet, Feramorz, is introduced, who chants to his national guitar four separate poems of a narrative character. The princess becomes gradually enamoured of the interesting young bard, and her growing melancholy continues till her arrival at her future home, where, in her betrothed husband, who comes to meet her in royal pomp, she recognises the musician. The prose portion of the work is gracefully written, the style is sparkling with Oriental gems, and perfumed with Oriental musk and roses and the brilliancy and voluptuous languor, which in another composition might be regarded as florid, only add to the Oriental effect. The four poems to which the story forms a setting are the Veiled Prophet, the Fire-Worshippers, Paradise and the Peri, and the Light of the Harem, all of an Eastern character, and the former two in some degree historical. The longest and most ambitious is the first, which is written in the heroic couplet, while the others are composed in those irregular animated octosyllables which Walter Scott and Byron had brought into fashion. The Veiled Prophet is a story of love, fanaticism, and vengeance, founded on the career of an impostor who made his appearance in Khorassan, and after leading astray numberless dupes by a pretended miraculous mission to overthrow Mahomedanism, was at last defeated. He is, in short, a kind of Mussulman Antichrist. The betrayal of the heroine by his diabolical arts, and the voluptuous temptations by which he induces a young Circassian chieftain to join his standard, the recognition of the lovers, and the tragical death of the deceiver and his victims form the plot. Its defects are chiefly in uniform tone of agonised and intense feeling which becomes monotonous and strained, and the want of reality in the characters, the demoniac wickedness of Mokanna being contrasted with the superhuman exaltation of love and sorrow in the lovers. Nor did Moore possess full mastery over the grave and masculine heroic versification, and, therefore, despite the richness of the imagery and descriptions, the poet's genius is more favourably exhibited in the beautiful songs and lyrics which are interspersed, as in the scene where Azim is introduced to a foretaste of the joys of Paradise. This portion of the poem is borrowed from the half-fabulous accounts of the initiation of the celebrated sect of the Assassins. The Fire-Worshippers, also a love story, is bound up with the cruel persecutions of the Turks of the Guebres, but under the disguise of tyrannical orthodoxy opposed to patriotic defenders of their country and their faith Moore undoubtedly intended to typify the resistance of the Irish Catholics to their English and Protestant oppressors. The love-adventures of Hafed the Guebro chief, and Fatima, the daughter of the Mussulman tyrant, are not very original, but some of the descriptions are animated and striking, in spite of a rather over-strained and too emphatic tone. Paradise and the Peri is a very graceful apologue, and the scenes in which the exiled fairy seeks the gift which is to secure her readmission to Heaven are picturesque. She successively offers as her passport the last drop of blood shed by a patriot, the dying sigh of a self-devoted lover, but these are pronounced insufficient, at last she presents the tear of a repentant sinner, which is received Fanciful and tender to the highest degree, the whole story has a compactness and completeness which render it very charming. The Light of the Harem is a little love-episode between "the magnificent son of Akbar" and his beautiful favourite Nourmahal. A coldness between the lovers is terminated by a mysterious and lovely enchantress, who evokes the Spirit of Music to furnish Nourmahal with a magic wreath of flowers. This gives to the voice of its wearer such a superhuman power that when she presents herself disguised, to sing before her imperial lover at the Feast of Roses, all his former passion revives. The description of the fair flower-sorceress Namouna, the invocation, and above all the exquisitely varied and highly finished songs afford striking examples of the graceful and musical, if somewhat fantastic and artificial, genius of Moore.

The Loves of the Angels is manifestly inferior to Lalla Rookh, not only in subject, but in treatment. The fundamental idea is based upon that famous and much misunderstood passage of Genesis, where it is said that in the primal ages "the sons of God" became enamoured of "the daughters of men." Moore introduces three angels, who by yielding to an earthly love have forfeited the privileges of their celestial nature, and who relate in turn the story of their passion and their punishment. Independently of the improbability, the incidents themselves are so little varied that the effect is tiresome. This poem was written during Moore's retirement to Paris, and though it treats the same subject as Byron's dramatic Mystery, Heaven and Earth, was entirely uninfluenced by that poem, and absolutely unlike it.

§ 11 The chief prose works of Moore are the three biographies of Sheridan, Byron, and Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and the Equi-cuman, the last intended originally to appear as a poem, but re-written in prose. It is a narrative of the early ages of Christianity, and describes the conversion, under the influence of love, of a young Athenian philosopher, who travels into Egypt, and is initiated into the mysterious worship of Isis. The descriptions are sometimes animated and picturesque, but there is languor and vagueness in the characters and in the conduct of the story. Moore's life of Byron is particularly valuable from consisting, as far as possible, of extracts from Byron's own journals and correspondence, so that the subject of the biography is delineated in his own words, Moore furnishing little more than the arrangement and the connecting matter. It is delightful to see the cordial and appreciating way in which Moore speaks of the genius and the character of his glorious contemporary.

§ 12 The career of Shelley resembles in certain points that of Byron. Each died young, each was unfortunate in an early training not good for the fostering of self-control and reverence, while the early manhood of each fell in the evil times of the Regency and the Holy Alliance, both found in Italy an asylum when their unhappy domestic relations roused the hostility of English society, and, most important of all, each, though in widely different modes, was a poet expressing the feelings which had given life to the great French Revolution, a steadfast preacher of revolt against tyranny and fraud in high places. PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY (1792-1822), of an ancient country family, the eldest son of Mr Timothy Sholley, and grandson of Sir Bysshe Shelley, was born at Field Place, near Horsham, in Sussex, August 4, 1792. He exhibited from early childhood an almost morbid sensibility, and a strong inclination towards sceptical and anti-social speculation, which gradually ripened into atheism. At Eton his sensitive mind was shocked by the sight of boyish tyranny, and he went to Oxford full of abhorrence for the cruelty and bigotry which he fancied pervaded all the relations of civilised life. An eager and desultory student, he rapidly filled his mind with the sceptical arguments against Christianity, and convinced that the concealment of his opinions was unworthy of the dignity of a philosopher, he published a tract in which he boldly avowed atheistic principles. Refusing to avow or disavow the tract, he was expelled from the University, and this scandal, together with a marriage (1811) with a beautiful girl, inferior in rank, caused him to be forbidden his father's house. This runaway match was at first happy, and the young enthusiast resided, in great poverty, at various places in England, Ireland, and in Wales, ardently devoting himself to metaphysical study and to the composition of his first wild and immature poems. He separated in 1814 from his wife, who in 1816 terminated her existence by suicide, and contracted during his wife's lifetime a new connexion with the daughter of Godwin. In 1815, when his father became baronet, the poet received a larger allowance, and was thenceforth less hampered by pecuniary difficulties. In 1814 he made a tour in France and Switzerland. The following year was spent chiefly in London and at Bishops-cote, in the Thames valley. In May, 1816 he went abroad, in Switzerland he became acquainted with Byron, and the ardour of his character and the splendour of his genius undoubtedly exerted a powerful influence on his mighty contemporary. Indeed the brilliancy of Shelley's eloquence, and the boldness of his doctrines, appear to have exercised an extraordinary fascination on all who were brought within its circle. Shelley returned in September, 1816, and after three months at Bath, took up his abode at Marlow, on the Thames. There he lived until February, 1818. His abhorrence of what he looked upon as the social tyranny of law and custom was carried to a still higher pitch by a decision of the Court of Chancery, depriving the poet of the guardianship of his children. This has been stigmatised by Shelley's admirers as an act of odious bigotry, but it should be recollected that his wife's father would naturally refuse to surrender his grandchildren to a man who had been guilty of a great and cruel wrong against his family, and who proclaimed the intention of educating the children in irreligious opinions. In March, 1818, Shelley left England because of his health, and travelled direct to Italy, where he kept up a companionship with Byron, still continuing to pour forth his strange and enchanting poetry in indefatigable profusion. He visited in succession many of the lovely cities of Italy. His death was early and tragic. Sailing had always been his passion, and returning in a small yacht from Leghorn, in company with a friend and a single boatman, his vessel was caught in a squall and went down with all on board in the Gulf of Spezzia, July 8, 1822. Thus perished this great poet, not yet aged thirty. His body was cast up on the coast some days after, and burned after the manner of the ancients by Byron and Leigh Hunt. His ashes were interred in the beautiful Protestant cemetery near the tomb of Caius Cestius at Rome.

§ 13 Shelley was all his life a dreamer, a visionary. His mind was filled with glorious but unreal phantoms of the possible perfectibility of mankind. So ardent was his sympathy with his kind, and so intense his abhorrence of the corruption and suffering he saw around him, that the very intensity of that sympathy clouded his reason, and he fell into the common error of all enthusiasts, of supposing, that, if the present organisation of society were swept away, a millennium must ensue. From Godwin he learned to trace the degradation of mankind to the institutions of religion, of government, and of marriage, and not to the excesses which these institutions are intended, however imperfectly, to restrain. He was undoubtedly gifted with genius of a very high order, an immense richness and fertility of imagination, an intense fire and energy in the reproduction of what he conceived, and a command over all the resources of metrical harmony such as no English poet has surpassed. He began to write almost from his childhood, and his first attempts were wild tales in prose, of little value. His poetical career commences with Queen Mab, a wild-phantasmagoria of beautiful description and fervent declamation, partially written in that irregular unrhymed versification of which Southey's Thalaba is an example, partially in regular blank verse. The poem is an exalted and impassioned survey of the splendour of the material universe, and the darkness and cruelty of the moral universe, terminating with lofty prophecy of a Golden Age. The notes appended to Queen Mab exhibit the full audacity of Shelley's scepticism. His arguments, however, are little else but repetitions of the sneers of Voltaire, and the objections, many of them entirely sophistical, of preceding antagonists of Christianity.

But the first conclusive evidence that in Shelley a great poet had risen was Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude, in which he depicts the sufferings of such a character as his own, a being of the warmest sympathies, and of the loftiest aspirations, driven into solitude and despair by the ingratitude of his kind, who are incapable of understanding and sympathising with his aims. The descriptions in this poem are imitably beautiful. Woodland and river scenery are depicted with a wealth of tropic luxuriance that places Shelley in the foremost rank among the pictorial poets. And the voyage of Alastor into his forest retreat is a passage which it would be difficult to parallel. This poem is written in blank verse, and was published early in 1816.

The Revolt of Islam, written at Marlow in 1817, is a work which treats, with greater power and art, the subjects of Queen Mab—passionate invectives against kinglycraft, priestcraft, religion, and marriage, alternating with airy and exquisite pictures of scenes and beings of superhuman and unearthly splendour. Hellas, a beautiful lyrical drama, written in 1821, inspired by the Greek struggle for liberty, shows an insight, a wise liberality, contrasting wonderfully with the narrow fanaticism of the Revolt of Islam. Shelley grew wiser and stronger with every new year of life.

Julian and Maddalo, a Conversation, an admirable poem in the heroic couplet, is a memorial of evening rides on the Lido in the August of 1818, when Shelley visited Byron at Venice. Under the name of Count Maddalo is presented the nobler aspect of Byron's personality, which showed in the society of the high-minded Shelley, who calls himself Julian. The poem is partly autobiographical, but the interpretation of the madman's soliloquy overheard by the poet friends is obscure, doubtless because of our ignorance of some details of Shelley's life. The Lines written among the Euganean Hills (1818) are the result of some autumn days spent in excursions among the lovely Euganean Hills, which overlook the wide Lombard Plain. The poem opens with the characteristic thought

Many a green Isle needs must be
In the deep wide sea of misery

Such "a green isle" in Shelley's life has been his experience "mid the mountains Euganean." An ideal day of contemplation of the prospect, of the towers of Venice, of "many-domed Padua proud," of the "olive-sandalled Apennine," the white Alps, and all the varying phenomena of air and sky and wide silent fertile plain terminates with hope of some eternal place of happiness and peace foreshadowed by the present. The poem is written in seven-syllable rhyming trochaics. Epipsychidion (1821) is of all Shelley's poems the most difficult to grasp in its full meaning. It is an exposition of his theory of ideal Love between man and woman. He was passionately moved by the beauty and wrongs of Emilia Viviani, a girl kept by arbitrary parental authority in convent seclusion until a husband of her father's choosing should be found for her. As Shelley wrote he forgot the girl Emilia, and the true subject of the poem is the perfect Lady of poetic vision, the Spirit of Love herself. The beauty of the poetry is marvellous, most of all the long passage beginning —

It is an isle under Ionian skies,
Beautiful as a wreck of Paradise.

Two of the greatest works of Shelley are dramatic in form — the Prometheus Unbound and The Cenci. The former, however, is rather a lyric in dialogue than a drama, while the latter is a regular tragedy. The Prometheus, written chiefly in 1819, under the bright blue sky of spring in the divine climate of Rome, is of the highest beauty and sublimity. The fundamental idea is based upon the gigantic drama of Æschylus, of which it is intended to be the complement, but Shelley has combined with the primeval and tremendous mythology of the Greek poet a multitude of persons and actions embodying the Titanic resistance of his philosophical creed to the abominations—as he regarded them—springing from Christianity and the present organisation of society. The most incongruous personages and systems are mingled, Paganism and Christianity, the myths of Olympus and the theology of the Bible, the systems and the beliefs of different ages and countries, are brought into bewildering contact. This piece breathes throughout that union of fierce hostility to social systems with intense love for humanity in the abstract which forms so singular an anomaly in the writings of Shelley. Many of the descriptive passages are sublime, and noble bursts of lyric harmony alternate with the loveliest personifications and the fiercest invective. The Cenci is a regular tragedy on the severe and sculptural plan of Alfieri. The subject is one of the most frightful of those domestic crimes in which the black annals of mediæval Italy are prolific. It is founded on the famous history of Beatrice di Cenci, driven by the diabolical wickedness of her father to parricide, for which she suffered death at Rome, but the character of the old Count is one of such monstrous and hideous depravity, that the story is quite unsuited to the stage. But no English tragedy since the time of Shakspeare shows so splendid an union of imaginative beauty with power. It was written in 1819, like Prometheus Unbound.

§ 14 The narrative poem of Rosalind and Helen is an elaborate pleading against the institution of marriage. The poet contrasts two lives, one in which the indissolubility of the marriage tie is arbitrarily made out to be productive of misery, while in the other a connection not sanctioned by law and custom is shown in a most attractive light. But the parallel has the disadvantage of proving nothing at all, for it would have been easy to have inverted the two cases and common experience shows that though married life may be unhappy in particular instances, the general practical tendency of the conjugal bond is unquestionably to promote happiness. In Adonais Shelley has given us a beautiful and touching lament on the early death of Keats, whose short career gave such a noble foretaste of a poetical genius that would have made him one of the greatest writers of his age. It is of the pastoral character, and is in some measure a revival of the beautiful Idyll of Moschus on the death of Bion, and reminds the reader of the elegy on Sidney by Spenser, and the immortal Lycidas of Milton. One of the most imaginative and at the same time one of the obscurest of Shelley's poems is the Sensitive Plant, which combines the qualities of mystery and fancifulness to the highest degree, perpetually stimulating the reader with a desire to penetrate the meaning symbolised in the luxuriant description of the Garden and the Plant, and charming him with the richest imagery and description. The versification of this poem is extraordinary for its harmony and variety, and the reader is incessantly tantalised with the hope of unveiling the secret and abstract meaning which the poet has locked up, as the embryo is involved in the foldings of the petals of a flower. Shelley's lyrics are of inexpressible beauty, as the Ode to a Skylark, which breathes the very rapture of the bird's soaring song, the wild but picturesque imagery of the Cloud, the Ode to the West Wind, and very many others. As Shakspeare is the greatest English dramatist, so probably Shelley is the greatest lyric poet of England. "In the last years of his life," observes Dr. Garnett, "his lyrics are more and more characterised by simplicity, style and melody no longer divide attention with the feeling, the felicity of the diction is almost concealed by its appropriateness." Let this thought of development in Shelley qualify all observations on the difficulty of his style.

Shelley is one of the great letter writers of English literature

Letter writing was not a deliberate pursuit with him as with Pope, Walpole, Gray and Cowper, his great predecessors in the field. He wrote as prompted either by some impulse to communicate new knowledge and delight, or by some throbbing of sympathetic affection and friendship. With his ardent nature these motives recurred so frequently that the letters written during his short life form a considerable mass. When once Shelley had passed that strange period of turbid effervescence which began to subside about the time when Queen Mab was written, his letters began to possess much intrinsic interest and charm, and those subsequent to 1816 are among the noblest examples of a poet's prose. Many very beautiful letters describe his first impressions of the loveliness of Italy, others give valuable estimates of contemporaries, of Lord Byron especially, and all are of the deepest interest as a revelation of the pure soul and lofty intellect of the writer.

Shelley's writings in prose, besides his letters and the two valueless romances of his youth, are miscellaneous in character, pamphlets and essays on politics, morals, religion, literature and social questions, reviews of books, journals, translations from Plato. Much of this is of permanent value, apart from the inevitable interest which belongs to all connected with so great a name. The Defence of Poetry (1821) is the greatest of his prose writings, profound in thought, of a very noble English style. It contains that celebrated definition "Poetry is the record of the best and happiest moments of the happiest and best minds."

§ 15 JOHN KEATS (1795-1821) was born in Moorfields, London, and was apprenticed to a surgeon when just fifteen. During his apprenticeship he devoted most of his time to poetry, and in 1817 he published a volume of juvenile poems. This was followed in 1818 by his long poem Endymion, which was severely censured by the 'Quarterly Review,' an attack which has been somewhat erroneously described as the cause of his death. It is probable that it gave a rude shock to Keats's highly sensitive nature, and to a physical condition much weakened by the attention which he had bestowed upon a dying brother. But he had a constitutional tendency to consumption, which would most likely have developed itself under any circumstances. He went for the recovery of his health to Rome, where he died on the 23rd of February, 1821. In the previous year he published another volume containing Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St Agnes, several beautiful Odes, and the great Hyperion, A Fragment.

This great poet, who died when but a few months more than twenty-five, is often censured for faults which he was continually amending. The fantastical and far-fetched in simile, the affectation of strangeness in diction, partially caught from his friend Leigh Hunt, obtrusive in the volume of 1817, beautiful as it is, are modified in Endymion, 1818, while in the noble collection of 1820 all characteristics of style or diction are, for the most part, subordinate to the poet's will and necessity to speak the essential word. The profusion of beautiful imagery and description, the easy harmonious movement of his lines, are reminders of the fact that Spenser, "the poets' poet," was his first great master. In his last volume may be discovered the influence of the restraint, the perfect art, of which Milton is the supreme example in English verse. "The poet who wrote the great Odes, and the later sonnets, and Lamia, and Isabella and St Agnes' Eve, and much of Hyperion, had the command of one of the finest and most individual styles in the whole range of English poetry. Spenser, Chaucer, Chapman, Milton, Leigh Hunt, and many more, had contributed, each something, to the colour and depth and brightness of the stream. But all these tributaries had been in turn assimilated, their virtue extracted, and their beauty caught" to form the perfect artist of the Ode to Autumn, or the "Last Sonnet." Keats deserves high praise for one very peculiar and original merit: he has treated the classical mythology in a way absolutely new, representing the Pagan deities not as mere abstractions of art, nor as mere creatures of popular belief, but giving them passions and affections like our own, highly purified and idealised, however, and in exquisite accordance with the lovely scenery of ancient Greece and Italy, and with the golden atmosphere of primeval existence. This treatment of a subject, which ordinary readers would consider hopelessly worn and threadbare, is certainly not Homeric, nor is it Miltonic, nor is it in the manner of any of the great poets who have employed the mythological imagery of antiquity, but it is productive of very exquisite pleasure, and must, therefore, be in accordance with true principles of art. In Hyperion, in the Ode to Pan (which appears in Endymion), in the verses on a Grecian Urn, we find a strain of beautiful classic imagery, combined with a perception of natural loveliness so luxuriant, so rich, so delicate, that the rosy dawn of Greek poetry seems combined with all that is most tenderly pensive in the calm sunset twilight of romance.

Isabella is a beautiful sad story of love and cruel treachery and madness. It is written in the eight-line stanza. The subject is taken from Boccaccio, but Keats has given it a Northern setting, both in landscape and sentiment. Hyperion is a noble fragment, in majestic blank verse, of an epic on the warfare between the Titanic and Olympian dynasties of the gods. St Agnes' Eve, in the Spenserian stanza, is a marvellously lovely narrative poem, telling of old days of romance in a perfect harmony of style with subject. Lamia, written in the heroic couplet, tells the story of the serpent-lady, who loves a youth of Corinth and who cherishes him in the enchanted palace which she has built for him, until the cold scrutiny of the philosopher compels her to resume her serpent form. Probably the most widely known of the poems of Keats is the Ode to a Nightingale. The song of the bird heard in a Hampstead garden has power to waft his imagination to far-away forests of romance, to "perilous seas and faery-lands forlorn."

Keats's letters are important not only for their intrinsic merit, but because by them we learn to know the wise, resolute, manly nature of the young poet, who died too early to show the force of his moral being in his verse. The letters of Keats's period of health are characterized by humour, wit, good sense, knowledge of the world and the human heart, and in those written during the sad time of disease and hopeless passion at the end of his life his sweet and noble nature, his love of friends and of all that is pure and good, shine through the mist of dejection. The prose of the letters is remarkably strong and good.

§ 16 THOMAS CAMPBELL (1777-1844), who was born on the 27th of July, 1777, at Glasgow, was educated at the University in that city, where he distinguished himself by his translations from the Greek poets. In 1799, when he was only in his twenty-second year, he published his Pleasures of Hope, which was received with a burst of enthusiasm as hearty as afterwards welcomed the Lay of the Last Minstrel and Childe Harold. Shortly afterwards he travelled abroad, where the warlike scenes he witnessed and the battle-fields he visited suggested some noble lyrics. To the seventh edition of the Pleasures of Hope, published in 1802, was added Ye Mariners of England, while Lochiel's Warning and the magnificent verses on Hohenlinden, were published together shortly afterwards. In the year 1803 he settled in London, married, and commenced in earnest the pursuit of literature as a profession. His works were written chiefly for the booksellers, and, with the exception of his Gertrude of Wyoming, which appeared in 1809, do not require any notice in a history of literature. In 1843 he retired to Boulogne, where he died in the following year. His body was brought over to England and interred in Westminster Abbey.

To his lyrics, which are among the finest in any language, Campbell will owe his lasting fame. In Campbell, as in the general state of literary feeling reflected in his works, a complete and vast change had taken place. In the fluctuation of popular taste, in the setting of that current, which, flowing from the old classicism, has carried us insensibly but irresistibly first through Romanticism, and has now brought us to a species of metaphysical quietism, there have been many temporary changes of direction, nay, some apparent stoppages. Despite the effort and impulsion of the Byronian poetry—the poetry of passion—there were writers who not only retained many characteristics of the former school that had to appearance been exploded, but even something of the old tone of sentiment, modified, of course, by the æsthetic principles which were afterwards to be completely embodied in such a cycle of great works as constitutes a school of literature. Campbell is one of the connecting links between the two systems so opposite and apparently so incompatible, and in comparing his first work with his last we find a perfect image of the gradual transition from the one style of writing to the other.

§ 17 Of poets contemporary with Byron, Shelley, and Keats, outliving by many years the latest of these, must be mentioned the names of Leigh Hunt and Walter Savage Landor.

JAMES HENRY LEIGH HUNT (1784–1859) was the son of a West Indian, who, resident in the United States, had remained a firm loyalist, and after the Declaration of Independence found it advisable to come over to this country. The poet was born at Southgate, Middlesex, and received his education at Christ's Hospital, which he left “in the same rank, at the same age, and for the same reasons, as Lamb.” He stammered, and therefore “Grecian I could not be.” In 1805 he began contributing theatrical criticisms to his brother's paper The News, and in 1808 the brothers became editors of the Examiner. A conviction for libel on the Prince Regent detained him in prison for two years, the happiest portion of his life. He was free from the worry and care which never afterwards forsook him. Soon after he left prison, he published the Story of Rimini, an Italian tale in verse (1816), which contains some exquisite poetry, and influenced the style of Keats. In October, 1819, he started the Indicator, a weekly paper, in imitation of the Spectator, and in 1822 he went to Italy, to assist Lord Byron and Shelley in their projected paper called the Liberal. Shelley died soon after Hunt's arrival in Italy, and though Hunt was kindly received by Byron, and lived for a time in his house, there was no congeniality between them. The Liberal was discontinued, and they parted on bad terms. On his return to England, Hunt published an account of Lord Byron and some of his Contemporaries, which was universally condemned as both ungenerous and unjust. He continued to write for periodicals, and published various poems from time to time, of which one of the most celebrated was Captain Sword and Captain Pen. He died in 1859, at the age of 75, having enjoyed during the latter years of his life a pension of 200*l*. a year from the Crown.

Leigh Hunt's poetry is graceful, sprightly, and full of fancy. Though not possessing much soul and emotion, it has true life and genius, while here and there his verse is lit up with wit, or glows with tenderness and grace. His prose writings consist of essays, collected under the title of The Indicator and the Companion, Sir Ralph Esher, a novel, The Old Court Suburb, his lives of Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Farquhar, prefixed to his edition of their dramatic writings, and many other charming essays, reviews, and miscellanies.

§ 18 WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR (1775-1864) was born on the 30th of January, 1775. His father was a gentleman of good family and wealthy circumstances residing in Warwickshire. The son entered Rugby at an early age, and thence proceeded to Trinity College, Oxford. Like many others who have taken important literary positions, he left the University without a degree, and though intended at first for the army, and afterwards for the bar, he declined both professions, and threw himself into literature, with the assistance of a liberal allowance from his father. In 1795 his first poems appeared, followed by Gebir, a noble narrative in stately blank verse, in 1798, and in 1802 and 1803 by more poems, including a translation of Gebir into Latin verse. Landor had facility in classical composition, and the power of transporting himself into the times and sentiments of Greece and Rome. This is still more clearly seen in the Idyllia Heroica (1815 and 1820), and the reproduction of Greek thought in The Hellenics is one of the most successful attempts of its kind. At his father's death (1805) the poet found himself in possession of an extensive estate, but longing for a life of greater freedom and less monotony than that of an English country-gentleman, he sold his personal property (1814), and went on the continent, residing in Italy until 1835, when he quarrelled with his wife and returned to England. The republican spirit which led him to take part as a volunteer in the Spanish rising of 1808 continued to burn fiercely to the last. He even went so far as to defend tyrannicide, and boldly offered a pension to the widow of any one who would murder a despot. Between 1820 and 1830 he was engaged upon his greatest work, Imaginary Conversations of Literary Men and Statesmen. Besides a great number of lovely lyrical poems, the chief works of Landor as yet unmentioned are, in prose, Pericles and Aspasia, the Pentameron, and the Citation of William Shakespeare, in verse, Count Julian, the Heroic Idylls, and the Hellenics. He resided for about twenty years at Bath, but in 1858, six years before his death, a libel on a lady, for which he was condemned to pay heavy damages, drove him again from his country, and he retired to end his life at Florence, and there in serene old age "the Nestor of English poets," one of the last literary links with the age of the French Republic, passed quietly away. He died on the 17th of September, 1864, an exile from his country, misunderstood from the very individuality of his genius by the majority of his countrymen, but highly appreciated by those who could rightly estimate the works he has left behind him.

It has been well said of the author of Imaginary Conversations that no writer presents "as remarkable an instance of the strength and weakness of the human understanding." Landor was a man of refined tastes and cultured mind. A gentleman by birth, every line of his writings gives proofs of the learned and polished intellect. But unhappily his great powers were marred by the heedlessness and rashness of his disposition, strong passions, and an unrestrained will. There is no regard for the thoughts and feelings of others. He therefore is too fond of paradox and unfounded assertion. His opinion must be received, because it is his, he runs against every one else, and believes what no one else believes, and scouts those ideas which have received universal assent. Thus Napoleon Buonaparte was a man of no genius, Alfieri the greatest man that Europe has seen, Pitt was a poor creature, and Fox a charlatan. It was this unhappy inconsistency, paradox, and wilfulness, which prevented his writings obtaining the position which was their due. His style is nervous and graceful.

The Imaginary Conversations is one of the great monumental works of English Literature. If we consider the vast sweep of scholarship which the Conversations exhibit, the enormous variety of their topics, discussed with such masterly force and ease, the great throng of men and women, statesmen, soldiers, philosophers, poets, queens, who live and move in their pages, the grace and beauty of their delineation of human character and of external nature, and their faultlessly statuesque English prose, we shall feel that after all there is hardly an exaggeration of truth in the magnificent arrogance of Landor's words, "What I write is not written on slate, and no finger, not of Time himself, who dips it in the cloud of years, can efface it." He foresaw his unpopularity but was not disconcerted. "I shall dine late, but the dining-room will be well-lighted, the guests few and select." There is a spirit like that of Milton in such words.

CHAPTER XXII.

WORDSWORTH, COLERIDGE, AND SOUTHEY

- § 1 WILLIAM WORDSWORTH his life and works § 2 Criticism of his poetry
 § 3 SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE his life § 4 His literary character and poems.
 § 5 His prose works and conversation § 6 ROBERT SOUTHEY his life
 § 7 His poems Joar of Arc. Madoc Thalaba Kichina Roderick § 8 His prose works

§ 1 WILLIAM WORDSWORTH (1770-1850), the founder of the so-called Lake School of poetry, was born at Cockermouth, in Cumberland, April 7, 1770. In his ninth year he was sent to a school at Hawkshead, in the most picturesque district of Lancashire, where the scholars, instead of living under the same roof with a master, were boarded among the villagers. They were at liberty to roam over the surrounding country by day and by night, and Wordsworth largely availed himself of this privilege. The relish for the beauties of creation, to which he mainly owes his place among poets, was early manifested and rapidly developed. In his fourteenth year his father died, and the care of the orphans devolved on their uncles. The poet was sent to St John's College, Cambridge, in 1787, where he spent his time chiefly in the study of the English poets, and in the ordinary amusements of the University. After taking his degree in 1791, he went over to France, where he eagerly embraced the ideas of the wildest champions of liberty in that country. Wordsworth's eye, much more practised to scan landscapes than men, nowhere penetrated beneath the surface, and he concluded that a king and his courtiers were the only Frenchmen by whom power could be abused. His political sentiments, however, became gradually modified, till in later life they settled down into steady Conservatism in Church and State. To vindicate his talents, which his Cambridge career had brought into question, he, in 1793, produced to the world—hurriedly, he says, though reluctantly—two little poems, An Evening Walk and Descriptive Sketches. An Evening Walk, written 1787-9, described the scenery of the English Lakes. It is a close record of poetical observations. The metre and language are in the school of Pope, but they are the work of a promising scholar, and not of a master. The Descriptive Sketches had been penned at Orleans and Blois, in 1791 and 1792. The execution is of the same school as the Evening Walk, but the language is simpler and so far superior,

In 1791 Wordsworth commenced, and in 1793-4 completed, the story of Salisbury Plain, or Guilt and Sorrow, which did not appear entire till 1842, but of which he published an extract in 1798, under the title of The Female Vagrant. In regard to time it is separated from the Descriptive Sketches by a span, but in respect of merit they are parted by a gulf. He had ceased to write in the train of Pope, and composed in the stanza of his later favourite Spenser. A poem of tragic human interest, the larger part of it is due to melancholy broodings on the French Revolution, during two days of wandering on Salisbury Plain, in 1793. From Raisley Calvert, in 1795, the poet received a legacy of 900*l*, which enabled him to indulge the great wish of his heart—to live with his sister Dorothy, and to devote himself entirely to poetry. The autumn of 1795 found them settled in a house at Racedown, in Dorsetshire. It is a remarkable feature of his history that, during all the time he was a hot-headed intractable rover, he had lived a life of Spartan virtue. His Hawkshead training had inured him to cottage board and lodging, and the temptations of London and Paris had failed to allure him to extravagance or vice. His temperance and economy enabled him to derive more benefit from the above-mentioned small bequest than would have accrued to poets in general from five times the sum.

Wordsworth now entered upon his poetical profession by paraphrasing several of the satires of Juvenal, and applying them to the abuses which he conceived to reign in high places. These, however, he never published. His second experiment was the tragedy of The Borderers, which was rejected by Covent Garden, and not printed until 1842. In June, 1797, when this tragedy was on the verge of completion, its first critic arrived at Racedown. Coleridge formed a close friendship with Wordsworth and his sister, who in July, 1797, moved to Alfoxden, near the Quantock Hills, in Devon. To furnish funds for a small excursion the two friends planned their Lyrical Ballads, the first piece in which was Coleridge's Ancient Mariner (1798), while most of the remaining poems were by Wordsworth. This little volume "may be justly described as marking an epoch in our literature." Coleridge and the Wordsworths spent the winter 1798-9 in Germany, but not together.

On their return to England in 1799 Wordsworth and his sister settled at Grasmere, from whence they afterwards went to Allan Bank, and finally in 1813 to Rydal Mount. It was from residence in this district that Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, De Quincey, and Wilson received the name Lake School, a name not truly warranted by any community of theory and practice among these writers. The period following Wordsworth's settlement at Grasmere was fertile in good poetry, and he was, moreover, earnestly engaged on the celebrated Preface on poetic style and diction for the new edition of Lyrical Ballads. In 1799 he commenced The Prelude, which was not published in full till after his death. This metrical autobiography preserves many facts and opinions which might otherwise have gone unrecorded, while it is rich in poetic and philosophic beauty. In 1800 he published an enlarged edition of the Ballads. A second volume was added to the original collection, and the supplement materially increased the riches of English lyric and idyllic poetry.

The year 1802 was eventful to Wordsworth. He had received a considerable accession of fortune, from money due to his father at the time of his death, which the children had not recovered till 1801. The poet's share enabled him to marry a lady to whom he had been long attached, Mary Hutchinson, his sister's friend. In 1807 he gave to the world two new volumes of Poems which contained the Song at the Feast of Brougham Castle, and many more of his greatest poems. Here appeared his first sonnets, and Intimations of Immortality, Duty, Peele Castle, Resolution and Independence, and The Happy Warrior. Wordsworth's indignation rose at the grasping tyranny of Napoleon, and in 1809 he put forth a pamphlet against the Convention of Cintra. The sentiments were spirit-stirring, but his protest passed unheeded.

The Excursion appeared in 1814. This is a fragment of a projected great moral epic, discussing and solving the mightiest questions concerning God, nature, and man, our moral constitution, our duties, and our hopes. Its dramatic interest is exceedingly small, its structure is very artificial, and the characters, though themselves lifelike, converse improbably. That an old Scottish pedler, a country clergyman, and a disappointed visionary, should reason so continuously and so sublimely on the destinies of man, is in itself a great want of verisimilitude, and the purely speculative nature of their interminable arguments, are not relieved from their monotony even by the abundant and beautiful descriptions and the pathetic episodes so thickly interspersed. It is Wordsworth, too, who is speaking always and alone, there is no variety of language, none of the shock and vivacity of intellectual wrestling, but, on the other hand, so sublime are the subjects on which they reason, so lofty and seraphic is their tone, and so deep a glow of humanity is perceptible throughout, that no readers, but such as seek in poetry mere food for the curiosity and imagination, can study this grand composition without ever-increasing reverence and delight.

"Of Providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate,"

In 1815 appeared The White Doe of Rylstone, the only narrative poem of much length which Wordsworth ever wrote. The incidents are of a mournful kind, turning chiefly on the complete ruin of a north-country family in the "Rising of the North" in 1569 but the atmosphere of mystical and supernatural influences in which the personages move, the superhuman purity and unearthliness of the characters, and above all the part played in the action by the White Doe, which gives name to the work,—all these things contribute to communicate to this beautiful poem a fantastic, unreal air. Peter Bell was published in 1819, and was received with a shout of ridicule. Wordsworth had neglected no precaution to provoke the sneers of the thoughtless. He stated in the dedication that the work had been completed twenty years, and that he had continued correcting it in the interval to render it worthy of a permanent place in our national literature. An announcement so well calculated to awaken the highest expectation was followed by a prologue more puerile than anything which ever proceeded from a man with a fiftieth part of his powers. The work is meant to be serious, and has many lovely passages, but there was much farcical absurdity of detail removed or modified in later editions. This poem was followed by The Waggoner, an easy narrative in verse. Wordsworth's whole returns from his literary labours up to 1819 had not amounted to 140*l*, but through the influence of Lord Lonsdale, he had been appointed in 1813 distributor of stamps for the County of Westmoreland, which brought him about 500*l* a year, and it was between 1830 and 1840 that the flood which floated him into favour rose to its height. Scott and Byron had in succession entranced the world. They had now withdrawn, and no third king arose to demand homage. It was in the lull which ensued that the less thrilling notes of the Lake bard obtained a hearing. It was during this time that he published his Ecclesiastical Sonnets and Yarrow revisited, and in 1842 he brought forth a complete collection of his poems. His fame was now firmly established. On the death of Southey, in 1843 he was made Post-Laureate. He died on April 23, 1850, when he had just completed his eightieth year.

§ 2 The poetry of Wordsworth has passed through two phases of criticism, in the first of which his defects were chiefly noted, and in the second his merits. Already we have arrived at the third era, when the majority of readers are just to both. An acute critic, to whom we have been much indebted in the preceding sketch of the poet's life and works, gives the fairest estimate that has appeared of Wordsworth's poetry—"It is constantly asserted that he effected a reform in the language of poetry, that he found the public bigoted to a vicious and flowery diction, which seemed to mean a great deal and really meant nothing, and that he led them back to sense and simplicity. The claim appears to us to be a fairerful assumption, refuted by the facts of literary history. Feebler poetasters were no doubt read when Wordsworth began to write than would now command an audience, however small, but they had no real hold upon the public, and Cowper was the only popular bard of the day. His masculine and unadorned English was relished in every cultivated circle in the land, and Wordsworth was the child and not the father of a reaction, which, after all, has been greatly exaggerated. Goldsmith was the most celebrated of Cowper's immediate predecessors, and it will not be pretended that The Deserted Village and The Traveller are among the specimens of inane phrasology. Burns had died before Wordsworth had attracted notice. The wonderful Peasant's performances were admired by none more than by Wordsworth himself: were they not already far more popular than the Lake-poet's have ever been—or ever will be? and were they, in any respect or degree, tinged with the absurdities of the Hayley school? When we come forward we find that the men of the generation were Scott, Byron, Moore, Campbell, Crabbe, and one or two others. Wordsworth himself was little read in comparison, and if he had anything to do with weaning the public from their vitiated predilections, it must have been through his influence on these more popular poets, whose works represented the reigning taste of the time. But nothing is more certain than that not a single one of them had formed his style upon that of the Lyrical Ballads or The Excursion. Whatever influence Wordsworth may have exercised on poetic style, be it great or small, was by deviating in practice from the principles of composition for which he contended. Both his theory, and the poems which illustrate it, continue to this hour to be all but universally condemned. He resolved to write as the lower orders talked, and though where the poor are the speaker it would be in accordance with strict dramatic propriety, the system would not be tolerated in serious poetry. Wordsworth's rule did not stop at the wording of dialogues. He maintained that the colloquial language of rustics was the most philosophical and enduring which the dictionary affords, and the fittest for verse of every description. Any one who mixes with the common people can decide for himself whether their conversation is wont to exhibit more propriety of language than the sayings of a Johnson or the speeches of a Burke. If it were really the case, it would follow that literary cultivation is an evil, and that we ought to learn English of our ploughboys, and not of our Shakespeares and Miltons. But there can be no risk in asserting that the vocabulary of rustics is rude and meagre, and their discourse negligent, diffuse, and weak. The vulgarisms, which are the most racy, vigorous, and characteristic part of their speech, Wordsworth admitted must be dropped, and either he must have substituted equivalent expressions, when the language ceases to be that of the poor, or he must have put up with a stock of words which, after all these deductions, would have been scarcely more copious than that of a South-Sea savage. When his finest verse is brought to the test of his principle, they agree no better than light and darkness. Here is his way of describing the effects of the pealing organ in King's College Chapel, with its 'self-poised roof, scooped into ten thousand cells'—

' But from the arms of silence—list! O list!—
The music bursteth into second life,
The notes luxuriate, every stone is blessed
By sound, or ghost of sound, in mazy strife!

"This is to write like a splendid poet, but it is not to write as rustics talk. A second canon laid down by Wordsworth was, that poetic diction is, or ought to be, in all respects the same with the language of prose, and as prose has a wide range, and numbers among its triumphs such luxuriant eloquence as that of Jeremy Taylor, the principle, if just, would be no less available for the advocates of ornamental verse than for the defence of the homely style of the Lyrical Ballads. But the proposition is certainly too broadly stated, and, though the argument holds good for the adversary, because the phraseology which is not too rich for prose can never be considered too tawdry for poetry, yet it will not warrant the conclusions of Wordsworth, that poetry should never rise above prose, or disdain to descend to its lowest level."*

§ 3 SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE (1772-1834) was born at Ottery St Mary, in Devonshire, October 21, 1772. He was left an orphan at an early age, and was educated at Christ's Hospital, whence he proceeded to Jesus College, Cambridge. In his second year at the University he enlisted in the 15th Dragoons, under the assumed name of Comberbach. He wearied of the life in two months, and communicated with his friends, by whom his discharge was effected. Coleridge left Cambridge finally in December, 1794, without taking a degree. After this he had a scheme for emigrating to the banks of the Susquehanna in North America, and there founding a model republic, with a community of goods, from which all selfishness was to be banished. He found in Southey and some other young men, as ardent and inexperienced as himself, warm sympathy, but the "Pantisocracy," as Coleridge called it, could not be carried into effect from want of funds. Coleridge then turned his attention to literature. He had been introduced to Joseph Cottle, a bookseller at Bristol, who gave him thirty guineas for a small volume of poems, which were published in 1796. He had previously written the first act of the Fall of Robespierre, of which Southey composed the second and third acts (published in 1794) In 1795 he married Miss Sarah Fricker of Bristol, a sister of Southey's wife At this time he contributed verses to one of the London papers During one whole year (July, 1797, to June, 1798) he lived in Wordsworth's neighbourhood, and his share in the celebrated Lyrical Ballads, published in 1798, has been already mentioned At this period his tragedy, Remorse, originally called Osorio, was written In 1798 Coleridge visited Germany, where he studied the literature After his return he took up his abode in the Lake District, where Wordsworth now lived He subsequently spent some time in Malta, where he was secretary to Sir Alexander Ball in 1804 and 1805 In 1812 he quitted the Lakes, leaving his wife and children largely dependent upon Southey,—a striking illustration of his well-known indifference to personal and pecuniary obligations He then took up his residence in London, finding a home in 1816 in the house of Mr Gillman at Highgate, where he died, July 25, 1834

* Quarterly Review, vol. xcii. p. 233 seq.

§ 4 The literary character of Coleridge resembles some vast but unfinished palace, all is gigantic, beautiful, and rich, but nothing is complete, nothing compact He was all his days, from his youth to his death, labouring, meditating, projecting, and yet all that he has left us bears a painful character of imperfection His mind was eminently dreamy, tinged with that incapacity for acting which forms the characteristic of the German intellect, his genius was multiform, many-sided, and for this reason, perhaps, could not at once seize upon the right point of view No man, probably, ever existed who thought more, and more intensely, than Coleridge, few ever possessed a vaster treasury of learning and knowledge, and yet how little has he given us, or rather how few of his works are in any way worthy of the undoubted majesty of his genius! Materials, indeed, he has left us in enormous quantity—a store of thoughts and principles, particularly in the department of æsthetic science—golden masses of reason, either painfully sifted from the rubbish of obscure and forgotten authors, or dug up from the rich depths of his own mind, but these are still in the state of raw materials, or only partially worked

He began life as a Unitarian and republican, his intellectual powers were chiefly formed in the transcendental schools of Germany, but he ultimately became from conviction a most sincere adherent to the doctrines of the Anglican church, and an enthusiastic defender of our monarchical constitution It is by the rare beauty of a select number among many poems that this exquisite artist in metrical harmonics holds his lofty place In the great Odes, France, Dejection, The Departing Year, in the Hymn before Sunrise in the Valley of Chamouni, nobly imaginative musing and passion are married to immortal verse In his translation of Schiller's

Wallenstein Coleridge was most successful. With almost all readers it will for ever have the charm of an original work. Indeed, many beautiful parts of the translation are exclusively the property of the English poet, who used a manuscript copy of the German text before its publication by the author. Although he has not scrupled in some instances to open out the hint of the original, and even to graft new thoughts upon it, his translation is, in the best and highest sense of that term, preeminently faithful. That Coleridge had no power of true dramatic creation is strongly proved by his tragedy of The Remorse, in which, in spite of very striking features of character (as in Ordonio), and a multitude of incidents of the most violent kind, he has not produced a drama which either excites curiosity or moves any strong degree of pity. What is most beautiful in the work is all pure description, and in no sense advances the action or exhibits human passions. It is strange, perhaps, but yet by no means unintelligible, that a man who was so unsuccessful in creating emotions of a theatrical kind should have been a most consummate critic of the dramatic productions of others. Till he wrote, deep and universal as had been the admiring love—almost the adoration—of the English for Shakspeare, there still remained, in their judgment, something of that de haut en bas tone which characterises all the criticisms anterior to Coleridge's Lectures on Shakspeare. Coleridge first showed that the creator of Hamlet and Othello was not only the greatest genius, but also the most consummate artist, that ever existed. Nothing can give us a higher opinion of the nobility of Coleridge's mind than the fact that he was the first to make some approach to the discovery of those laws which, expressly or intuitively, governed the evolutions of the Shaksperian drama—that he possessed a soul vast enough, deep enough, multiform enough, to give us some faint idea of the dimensions, the length, and breadth, and depth, of that huge sea of truth and beauty.

Of the poems by which Coleridge is best known, both in England and abroad, the most splendid and complete is The Ancient Mariner, a wild, mystical, phantasmagoric narrative, most picturesquely related in the old English ballad measure, and in language to which an air of antiquity is skilfully given in admirable harmony with the spectral character of the events. The whole poem is a splendid dream, filling the ear with the strange and floating melodies of sleep, and the eye with a shifting, vaporous succession of fantastic images, gloomy or radiant.

The poem of Christabel, and the fragment called Kubla Khan, are of the same mystic, unreal character. Indeed, Coleridge asserted that the latter was actually composed in a dream—an affirmation which may well be believed, for it is a thousand times more unintelligible than the general run of dreams. It is a dream, perhaps but it is an opium dream—"agri somnium"—without so much as that faint coherency which even a dream must have to give pleasure in a picture or in a poem. Like everything that Coleridge ever wrote, the versification is exquisite. His language puts on every form, it expresses every sound, he almost writes to the eye and to the ear. The lovely narrative poem, Christabel, begun in 1797, and continued in 1800, was, to the enormous loss of English Poetry, never finished. It was first published in 1816, but had been read aloud to many hearers previously. In point of completeness, exquisite harmony of feeling, and unsurpassable grace of imagery and language, Coleridge has left nothing superior to the charming little poem entitled Love.

§ 5 Coleridge takes rank also as a psychologist, moralist, and general philosopher. The Friend, the Lay Sermons, the Aids to Reflection, and the Church and State, are works which have exercised a great influence upon the intellectual character of his generation. But his chief reputation through life was founded less upon his writings than upon his conversation, or rather what may be called his conversational oratory, which must have resembled those disquisitions of the Greek philosophers, of which the dialogues of Plato give some idea. It is in his innumerable fragments, in his rich but desultory remains (published posthumously under the title of Literary Remains), in casual remarks scribbled like Sibylline leaves, often on the margin of borrowed books, and in imperfectly-reported conversations, that we must look for proofs of Coleridge's immense but incompletely recorded powers. From a careful study of these we shall conceive a high admiration of his genius, and a deep regret at the fragmentary and desultory manifestations of his powers. We shall also appreciate the vastness and multiform character of a mind to which nothing was too difficult, or too obscure, a noble tone of moral dignity "softened into beauty" by the largest sympathy, and, above all, an admirable catholicity of taste, which could unerringly pitch upon what was beautiful and true, and find its pabulum in all schools, all writers, perceiving, as it were intuitively, the value and the charm of the most unpromising books and systems.

§ 6 ROBERT SOUTHEY (1774-1843) was born on August 12, 1774, at Bristol, where his father carried on the business of a draper, but most of his early childhood was spent with his mother's family. While living with his aunt, Miss Tyler, he made the acquaintance of every actor of merit who came to Bristol or Bath, and he became fixed in his aunt's persuasion that there was only one thing grander than being a great tragic actor—and that was to be a great author of tragedies. He was sent to Westminster at the age of fourteen, but he had had no proper classical training previously, and the defect was never repaired. After spending four years at Westminster he was expelled for writing an article against flogging in public schools, which appeared in the Flagellant, a periodical commenced by Southey and his friend and schoolfellow, Grosvenor Bedford. The following year he went to Oxford, and was entered at Balliol. At the University he made one or two fitful efforts to read Tacitus and Homer, but speedily relinquished the attempt. His hope of being able to assist his family chiefly depended upon his taking Orders, but his religious opinions prevented him from entering the Church. He lingered at Oxford, undecided what to do, until Coleridge appeared with his scheme of "Pantisocracy," already related. Quitting Oxford, Southey attempted to raise by authorship funds for the American scheme, and in 1794 published at Bath, in conjunction with Robert Lovell, a small volume of poems, which brought neither fame nor profit. His chief reliance, however, was on his epic poem Joan of Arc, which had been composed in six weeks in 1793. He had the good fortune to meet with a bookseller as inexperienced and as ardent as himself. This was Joseph Cottle of Bristol, the patron of Coleridge, who offered fifty guineas for the copyright. The work required much correction, and in the mean time, in order to defray the immediate expenses of subsistence, Southey gave lectures on History at Bristol. At this time he was often unable to pay for a dinner, and in 1795 he was compelled by want to return to his mother's house. In November of the same year Southey accompanied his uncle to Lisbon. On the morning of his departure he secretly united himself to Edith Frickor, a young lady to whom he had for some time been engaged, thus frustrating one portion of his uncle's intentions in taking him out, which had been to break off an apparently hopeless engagement. After an absence of six months Southey returned, and immediately commenced that life of patient literary toil from which he never swerved again while health and intellect remained. He had from the outset an allowance of 160*l*. a year, from his friend Mr Wynn, till he had obtained for him a pension of equal value from the Government. Yet, with his talents and industry, he was constantly on the verge of poverty, and not even his philosophy and hopefulness were always proof against the difficulties of his position. In 1803 he took up his residence at Greta Hall, near Keswick, in Cumberland, where he continued to reside for the remainder of his life. From being a sceptic and a republican, he became a firm believer in Christianity, and a staunch supporter of the English Church and Constitution, and many of his works, and essays in the Quarterly Review, were written in defence of the doctrines and discipline of the Church. In 1813 he was appointed poet-laureate, and in 1835 received a pension of 300*l*. a year from the Government.

of Sir Robert Peel During the last four years of his life, he had sunk into a state of hopeless imbecility. He died March 21st, 1843.

§ 7 Southey's literary activity was prodigious The list of his writings, published under his own name, amounts to one hundred and nine volumes In addition to these he contributed to the Annual Review fifty-two articles, to the Foreign Quarterly three, to the Quarterly ninety-four The composition of these works was a small part of the labour they involved they are all, even to his poems, books of research, which obliged him to turn over numerous volumes for the production of one

Joan of Arc, the earliest of his long poems, after considerable revision was published in 1795 It was received with favour by most of the critical journals on account of the republican doctrines which it espoused The critics praised the poetry for the sake of the principles, and the public, who rejected the principles, accepted the verdict Madoc, which was completed in 1799, was not given to the world till 1805 Upon this poem he was contented to rest his fame. It is founded on one of the most absurd legends connected with the early history of America Madoc is a Welsh prince of the twelfth century, who is represented as making the discovery of the Western world, and his contests with the Mexicans, and ultimate conversion of that people from their cruel idolatry, form the main action of the poem, which, like Joan of Arc, is written in blank verse The poet thus had at his disposal the rich store of picturesque scenery, manners, and wonderful adventure to be found in the Spanish narratives of the exploits of Columbus, Pizarro, Cortez, and the Conquistadors But the victories which are so wonderful, when related as gained over the Mexicans by the comparatively well-armed Spaniards of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, are perfectly incredible when attributed to a band of savages little superior in civilisation and the art of war to the people they invaded Though the poem is crowded with scenes of more than possible splendour—of more than human cruelty, courage, and superstition—the effect is singularly languid, and the exaggeration of prowess and suffering produces the same effect upon the mind as the extravagance of fiction in the two Oriental poems which we shall next notice

Thalaba was published in 1801, and the Curse of Kehama in 1810 Both these poems are, in their subjects, wild, extravagant, unearthly, full of supernatural machinery, but of a kind as difficult to manage with effect as at first sight splendid and attractive Thalaba is a tale of Arabian enchantment, full of magicians, dragons, hippogriffs, and monsters In Kehama the poet has selected for his groundwork the still more unmanageable mythology of the Hindoos—a vast, incoherent and clumsy structure of superstition, more hopelessly unsuited to the purposes of poetry than even the Fetishism of the savages of Africa The poems are written in an irregular and wandering species of verse—the Thalaba altogether without rhyme In his verso (as in his prose) Southey “aimed at the simplicity of undefiled English”, and he strove to inform with moral purpose the strange Oriental material There are many passages of gorgeous description, and many proofs of powerful fancy and imagination, but the persons and adventures are so supernatural, so completely out of the circle of human sympathies, both in their triumphs and sufferings, and they are so scrupulously divested of all the passions and circumstances of humanity, that these gorgeous and ambitious works produce on us the impression of a splendid but unsubstantial nightmare they are the vast disjointed visions of fever and delirium In Thalaba we have a series of adventures, encountered by an Arabian hero who fights with demons and enchanters, and finally overthrows the dominion of the powers of evil in the Dom-daniel caverns “under the roots of the ocean” It is more extravagant than anything in the ‘Thousand and One Nights’ indeed it is nothing but a quintessence of all the puerile and monstrous fictions of Arabian fancy In the Oriental legends these extravagances are pardonable, and even characteristic, for in them we take into account the childish and wonder-loving character of the audience to which such fantastic inventions were addressed, and we remember that they are scattered, in the books of the East, over a much greater surface, so to speak, whereas here we have them all consolidated into one mass of incoherent monstrosity We find, however, exquisite glimpses afforded us in Thalaba of the common and domestic life of the East These poems, like everything of Southey’s, exhibit an incredible amount of multifarious learning, but it is learning generally rather curious than valuable, and is not always vivified by a truly genial, harmonising power of originality

In the volume of Metrical Tales, which appeared in the interval between the publication of these poems, as in general in his minor poems, Southey exhibits a degree of vigour and originality of thought for which we look in vain in his longer works Some of his legends, versified from the Spanish and Portuguese (languages in which Southey was a proficient), or from the obscurer stores of the Latin chronicles of the Middle Ages, or the monkish legends of the saints, are very vigorous and characteristically written The author’s spirit was strongly legendary, and he has caught the true accent, not of heroic and chivalric tradition, but of the religious enthusiasm of monastic times Some of his minor original poems have great tenderness and simple dignity of thought, and the diction is always simple and noble. It is a great error to suppose that any common agreement justifying the name Lake School is to be found either in the theory or practice of Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey as to the use of language

Kehama was followed, at an interval of four years, by Roderick, the Last of the Goths, a poem in blank verse, and of a much more modest and credible character than its predecessors. The subject is the punishment and repentance of the last Gothic King of Spain, whose vices, oppressions, and in particular an insult offered to the virtue of Florinda, daughter of Count Julian, incited that noble to betray his country to the Moors. The general insurrection of the Spaniards against their Moslem oppressors, the exploits of the illustrious Pelayo, and the reappearance of Roderick at the great battle which put an end to the infidel dominion, form the materials of the action. The King, in the disguise of a hermit, figures in most of the scenes, and his agonising repentance for his past crimes, and humble trust in the mercy of God, are the key-note or prevailing tone of the work. Though free from the injudicious employment of supernatural machinery, and though containing some descriptions of undeniable merit, and several scenes of powerful tenderness and pathos, there is the same want of reality and human interest which characterise his other poems.

The tone of Southey's poems in general is too uniformly ecstatic and agonising. His personages, like his scenes, have something unreal, phantomlike, dreamy—they are often beautiful, but it is the beauty not of the earth, or even of the clouds, but of the mirage and the Fata Morgana. His robe of inspiration sits gracefully and majestically upon him, but it is too voluminous in its folds, and too heavy in its gorgeous texture, for the motion of real existence. He is never "succinct for speed," and his flowing drapery obstructs and embarrasses his steps. He has power, but not force: his genius is rather passive than active.

On being appointed poet-laureate, Southey paid his tribute of Court adulation with an eagerness and regularity which showed how complete was his conversion from the political faith of his youthful days. A convert is generally a fanatic, and Southey's laureate odes exhibit a fierce, passionate, controversial hatred of his former liberal opinions which gives interest even to the ambitious monotony, the convulsive mediocrity, of his official lyrics. In one of them, the Vision of Judgment, he has essayed to revive the hexameter in English verse. This experiment, tried in so many languages, and with such indifferent success, had been attempted by Gabriel Harvey in the reign of Elizabeth, and the universal ridicule which hailed Southey's attempt was excited quite as much by the absurdity of the metre as by the extravagant flattery of the poem itself. The deification, or rather beatification, of George III., drew from Byron some of the severest strokes of his irresistible ridicule, and gave him the opportunity of severely revenging upon Southey some of the attacks of the laureate upon his principles and poetry

§ 8 Southey's prose works are very numerous and valuable on account of their learning, but the little Life of Nelson, written to furnish young seamen with a simple narrative of the exploits of England's greatest naval hero, has perhaps never been equalled for the perfection of its style. In his other works—the principal of which are The Book of the Church, The Lives of the British Admirals, The Life of Wesley, a History of Brazil, and of the Peninsular War—we find the same admirable art of clear, vigorous English, and no less that strong prejudice, violent political and literary partiality, and a tone of haughty, acrimonious, arrogant self-confidence, which so much detract from his many excellent qualities as a writer and as a man, his sincerity, his learning, his conscientiousness, and his natural benevolence of character. His very best prose work is The Doctor, of it he says himself that it contains something of Tristram Shandy, something of Rabelais, more of Montaigne, and a little of old Burton. “Nowhere else,” writes Professor Dowden, “can one find so much of his varied erudition, his genial spirits, his meditative wisdom”

ADDENDUM

The great statesman, GEORGE CANNING (1770–1827) claims a place in English literature on account of his contributions to the famous Antijacobin Review. His Loves of the Triangles, a parody on Darwin's Loves of the Plants, the Needy Knife-Grinder, the Inscription on Mrs Brownrigg, a mocking imitation of Southey's on the Regicide, Henry Marten, and his “Sincerity of Göttingen”

are exceedingly amusing, and will long possess admirers. It is from the first that the oft-quoted lines are taken—

“So down thy hill, romantic Ashborne, glides
The Derby Dilly carrying three inside.

Canning's powers in more serious poetry are attested by the noble and affecting lines on the death of his son in 1820, as well as in his Ulm and Trafalgar, &c.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

OTHER POETS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

SAMUEL ROGERS (1763-1855) was born at Newington Green, a suburb of London. After a careful private education he was placed, while yet a lad, in his father's banking house to learn the business, in which he afterwards became a nominal partner. In the enjoyment of large wealth and ample leisure he devoted himself to literature and to the cultivation of the society of men distinguished in politics, literature, and art. His chief works are the Pleasures of Memory published in 1792, Human Life in 1810, and Italy, in 1822. His poetry is highly finished, but not characterised by much power or imagination.

REV. WILLIAM LISLE BOWLES (1762-1850) was born at King's Sutton on the borders of Northamptonshire. He was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Oxford. In 1805 he obtained the valuable living of Bremhill, in Wiltshire. He occupies an important place in the history of English literature from the great influence which his poetry appears to have exercised over the productions of Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Southey. His Sonnets, his Missionary of the Andes and his Village Verse Book, are among the best of his works.

REV. CHARLES WOLFE (1791-1823) was born in Ireland. He is chiefly known as the author of the celebrated lines on the death of Sir John Moore, published in 1817. His literary compositions were collected and published in 1825.

BERNARD BARTON (1781-1849) was a member of the Society of Friends, and the amount of attention which he attracted is perhaps mainly owing to the then unusual phenomenon which he presented of a Quaker poet—the title indeed, by which he came to be commonly known. He published a volume of Musical Effusions in 1812, Napoleon and other Poems, 1822, Poetic Igits, 1824, Devotional Verses, 1826. Numerous other pieces appeared separately and in magazines.

JAMES MONTCOXYERY (1771-1854) educated by the Moravians at Fulneck, near Leeds, wrote many poems while yet a boy, but first attracted public attention by The Wanderer in Switzerland, published in 1806, which, though not exhibiting much power, is written in very melodious verse. His subsequent poems were The West Indies (1809), The World before the Flood (1812), Greenland (1810), and The Pelican Island and other Poems (1827).

JAMES SMITH (1775-1839), known best in connexion with his brother Horace, wrote clever parodies and criticisms in the Picnic, the London Review, and the Monthly Mirror. In the last appeared those imitations from his own and brother's hand, which were published in 1813 as The Rejected Addresses, one of the most successful and popular works that has ever appeared. James wrote the imitations of Wordsworth, Colburn, Southey, Coleridge, and Crabbe; Herace, those of Scott, Moore, Monk Lewis, Fitzgerald and Dr. Johnson.

James did little more in the way of literature, except an occasional piece in some of the monthlies. Lady Blessington said, "If James Smith had not been a wealthy man, he would have been a great man." He died on Christmas Eve, 1839, in his 65th year.

HONORABLE SMITH (1779-1849) was a more voluminous writer than his brother. He was the author of several novels and verses. Brambletye House, 1826, was in imitation of Scott's historical novels. Besides this he wrote Tor Hill, Walter Colyton, The Moneyed Man, The Merchant, and several others. His best performance is the Address to the Mummy, some parts of which exhibit the finest sensibility and an exquisite poetic taste.

FELICIA DOROTHEA HEMANS (1793-1835), whose maiden name was Browne, was a native of Liverpool and spent the early part of her life in North Wales, not far from Abergeloe. She was not more than 16 years of age when her first work was published. In 1812 appeared the Domestic Affections and other poems, and in the same year Miss Browne was married to Captain Hemans. She was fortunate in her competition for prizes, gaining that for the best poem on Wallace in 1819, and two years afterwards she won a prize for a poem on Dartmoor. Her dramatic attempt, the Leapers of Palermo, 1823, was not successful. Other works quickly followed: The Forest Sanctuary 1826, Records of Women, 1828, Lays Lyric, &c., Songs of the Affections 1830. Mrs. Hemans for the latter portion of her life resided at Dublin with her brother.

and whilst there published in 1834 her Hymns for Childhood, and Scenes and Hymns of Life, with a few sonnets entitled Thoughts during Sickness. Mrs Hemans's writings are extensively read. Her subjects are those which find a ready admission to the hearts of all classes. The style is graceful, but presenting, as Scott said, "too many flowers for the fruit." There is little intellectual or emotional force about her poetry and the majority of it will soon be forgotten. A few of the smaller pieces will perhaps remain as English gems, such as The Graves of a Household and the Homes of England.

REV WILLIAM HERBERT (1778-1847) at first a lawyer, then Member of Parliament, finally entered the Church and died Dean of Manchester. He is the author of several translations from the Norse, Italian, Spanish and Portuguese — the original poems, Helya, 1815 and Attila, 1838 — besides tales, sermons, and scientific treatises.

THOMAS HAYES BAYLY (1797-1839) a celebrated song writer. The best known are The Soldier's Tear, She wore a Wreath of Roses, I'd be a Butterfly. Oh, no, we never mention her, and We met—'twas in a crowd.

FRANCIS WRANGHAM (1769-1843), Archdeacon of Chester, was author of translations from the classical poets, and other poetic and prose writings.

HENRY FRANCIS CARY (1772-1844), published in 1804 a translation of Dante's Inferno, and ten years later a translation of the Divina Commedia, in blank verse &c.

WILLIAM STEWART ROSE (1775-1843) was also celebrated as a translator. His chief works were Amadis de Gaul, 1803, and the well known translation of the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, published in 1831.

WILLIAM TAYLOR (1785-1838), of Norwich, translated some of the works of Goethe, Schiller, and Lessing and gave a great impulse to the study of German literature in England.

JAMES GRAHAM (1765-1811), a native of Glasgow, at first a barrister, then entered the English Church, where he became a well known preacher. In 1801 he published Mary Queen of Scotland, a dramatic poem. This was followed by the Sabbath, Sabbath Walks, and other poems of a religious character. Graham is not an easy, graceful poet, and though his verse is full of tender and devout feeling, it has little vigour or imagination. He has been compared to Cowper, but wants that poet's humour, force, and depth of poetic passion.

WILLIAM SOTHEBY (1757-1833), born in London and educated at Harrow, was for some time in the army, but retired about 1780 and devoted himself to literature. He was a man of great learning, and translated some classical works with much elegance and skill. His chief works were, Poetical Description of Wales, 1789, Translation of Virgil's Georgics, 1800, Constance de Castille, 1810, written after the style of Scott's romantic poems, translations of The Iliad, 1831, and The Odyssey, 1832. His translation from Wieland's Oberon has received great commendation.

JOHN HOOKHAM-FRERE (1769-1846), a friend of Caunting whom he assisted in The Anti-Jacobin Review, was Chargé d'Affaires in Spain with General Moore, and afterwards Resident at Malta, where he died, aged 77. He was the author of the once celebrated satiric poem, published in 1817, entitled Prospectus and Specimen of an intended National Work by William and Robert Whistlecraft, &c. It was written in ottava rima, and was a clever burlesque of romantic writings with here and there a touch of real poetry. It was the model on which Byron wrote his Beppo. He was also the author of the War Song of Brunnenburg published by Ellis as a fourteenth century production, but really written by the author when at school at Eton during the great discussion on the Rowley poems by Chatterton. Frere also made an admirable translation into English verse of the Acharyans, Knights, Birds and Frogs of Aristophanes, which was printed at Malta.

DR REGINALD HEBER (1783-1828) was born at Malpas, Cheshire, educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, and successively Vicar of Hodnet and Bishop of Calcutta. He died at Trichinopoly April 3, 1826. He was author of the Bampton Lectures, 1816, Life of Jeremy Taylor, 1822, miscellaneous prose writings, and many poems, chiefly religious, of great beauty and feeling.

ROBERT POLLOK (1799-1827) the author of a long poem in blank verse, called the Course of Time a work of real value. A few passages have quite a Miltonic ring. The poem is a sketch of the life and end of man. The sentiments are Calvinistic. The tone and colouring are often too sombre. Sometimes the style becomes rather inflated. Robert Pollok was a native of Muirhouse, Renfrewshire, studied at Glasgow, and became a minister in the United Secession Church. He also wrote Tales of the Covenanters in prose.

ROBERT BLOOMFIELD (1766-1823), the son of a tailor at Honington, near Bury St. Edmund's worked as a shoemaker in London, where he composed his poetry, which was rejected by London booksellers, but published at Bury, at the expense of Capel Loft Esq. He was patronised by the Duke of Grafton, and obtained a situation in the Seal Office. He died on the 19th of August, 1823, at Sheffield, Bedfordshire. The chief poems are The Farmer's Boy (1798) Rural Tales (1810), Wild Flowers, &c. His style is descriptive. The rhythm is correct, and the language choice, but the gentle flow seldom bursts into the rush of passion. He never sinks, and never soars.

IGL. LEYDES (1775-1811), a native of Scotland wrote a few poems and miscellaneous prose articles in the Edinburgh Magazine, entered the Church (1798) but afterwards became a surgeon in the East India Company's service (1802). In India he devoted himself to the study of the Oriental languages. He accompanied Lord Minto in the expedition against Java, where he died in 1811. His Poetical Remains were published in 1819, by Rev James Morton. Sir Walter Scott has spoken in high terms of his poetry.

THOMAS NOOY TALFOURD (1705-1854) was born at Reading, rose to distinction at the bar, and was made a Judge in 1849. He died on the bench whilst addressing the Grand Jury at Stafford in 1854. He wrote the tragedies of Ion, The Athenian Captive, The Massacre of Cleonoe, and The Cælian, and in prose, Vacation Rambles (1851) Life of Charles Lamb, and an Essay on the Greek Drama. He is best known by the tragedy of Ion, perhaps one of the most striking additions to tragic literature in modern times.

WINTHROP MACKWORTH PRATT (1802-1839), son of Mr Serjeant Pratt entered the House of Commons, and became Secretary of the Board of Control. His early life and writings gave promise of future eminence. While at Eton he started The Floman and was one of the chief contributors to Knights Quarterly Magazine. His poems, which have been recently published in a collected form, are some of the most remarkable which have appeared in modern times.

HARTLEY COLERIDGE (1796-1849) and SARA COLERIDGE (1803-1852) were the children of the great Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and themselves well known in the world of letters. The brother was author of Poems, Essays Views of the Northern Worthies, and other miscellaneous works. His poems were published, with a Memoir of his life, in 1851. The sister married in 1829 her cousin Henry Nelson Coleridge. The dissertations which she appended to many of her father's works, published after his death, are remarkable both for power of thought and of expression.

Mrs SOUTHEY (CAROLINE ANNE BOWLES) (1787-1854) was born at Lymlington, Hants. Her early life was spent in retirement and literary pursuits. Several poems were published by her of much taste and sentiment. She was married to Southey on the 5th June, 1839. She completed the poem Robin Hood, commenced by Southey. Her best known piece is the little lyric called The Pauper's Deathbed.

BRENZFR ELLIOTT (1781-1840) the son of an ironfounder of Maccabrough, Yorkshire, worked himself at his father's business. In 1823 he published some poems, but is best known for the Corn Law Rhymes, which appeared between 1830-36. His affection and advocacy of the working classes endeared his name to them, whilst his genius and pure poetic fervour though sometimes leading him beyond the limits of good taste, claimed the recognition of Southey, Bulwer, Wilson and Thomas Carlyle.

ROBERT MONTGOMERY (1808-1855), a popular preacher at Percy Chapel, Charlotte Street, Bedford Square. His poems passed through numerous editions, but they are stilted and unnatural in expression. Their religious subjects and the clever puffing which they received, contributed to their success. The chief of them were the Omnipresence of the Deity, Salut Luther, Messiah and Oxford. He is perhaps best known by the scathing criticism which he received in the celebrated essay by Macaulay.

FITZIA ELIZABETH LANDON (1802-1838) best known by her initials F. F. L., under which her poems appeared in various periodicals, which have been collected and published separately. She was the daughter of an army agent, born at Chelsea, and married in 1838 Mr Maclean, governor of the Gold Coast Colony West Africa, where she died October 15, 1839.

Her GEORGE CROLY (1780-1863) a native of Dublin, and rector of St Stephen's, Walbrook, London. His style was gorgeous and his imagination fertile. He was the author of several works in poetry and prose. Paris in 1815, Angel of the World (1820) Pride shall have a Fall, Catharine, The Modern Orlando (1846) are his chief poems. In fiction he produced Salathiel.

Tales of the Great St Bernard and Marston the first of which is a romance of great power and eloquence

Mrs. MAUR TROHE (1773-1810) a native of Wicklow County, Ireland the authoress of Psyche, a poem founded on the story of Cupid and Psyche in Apuleius, and exhibiting much imagination and graceful fancy

JAMES SHERIDAN KNOWLES (1794-1862), one of the principal modern tragic writers, was born at Cork in 1794. He went on the stage, and there distinguished himself as an actor and writer of plays. He afterwards retired from the stage and occupied himself with teaching elocution, and some times preaching in the chapels of the Christian body to which he belonged Caius Gracchus was performed in 1815, and was followed by Virginius one of the most popular dramas that has appeared in recent times upon the English stage The Hunchback and William Tell are perhaps his two best works. Two novels were written by him, George Jorell and Henry Fortescue. His plots are natural, and the characters well sustained.

JAMES HOGG (1770-1835), known better as the "Ettrick-Shepherd," a native of Ettrick Vale Selkirkshire. His school was the mountain side where he kept the cattle and sheep. His education was scanty, but a quick and retentive memory great natural gifts, and a fine appreciation of the wondrous scenes around him called up the slumbering muse, and in 1801 he published a small volume of songs. The Mountain Bard followed in 1807. Soon afterwards he left his occupation and resided at Edinburgh, supporting himself entirely by his pen. The Queen's Wake (1813) brought him into very favourable notice. It was followed by Madoc of the Moor, Winter Evening Tales &c. Hogg's chief delight was in legendary tales and folk lore. Fancy rather than the description of life and manners is the prevailing character of the poet's writings. A modern critic says "He wanted art to construct a fable, and taste to give due effect to his imagery and conceptions. But there are few poets who impress us so much with the idea of direct inspiration and that poetry is indeed an art 'unteachable and untaught.'"

MORE MODERN POETS.

The poets of the latter part of the nineteenth century have been very numerous, but there are only four who stand out in any prominence worthy of comparison with that illustrious band which adorned the early years of the century. These are ALFRED TENNYSON, ROBERT BROWNING, Mrs. BROWNING, and THOMAS HOOD. The two former are excluded from the scope of this work. The other two must not be passed by without a short notice.

THOMAS HOOD (1799-1845) has unfortunately been regarded only as a humorist, and as the English reader would occupy from him nothing but wit and humor, the most valuable of his writings are in danger of being forgotten. He was born on the 23rd of May, 1799, and in 1821 he became sub-editor of the London Magazine, where his poem on Hope appeared. He was associated with the brilliant circle who then contributed to the Magazine, among whom were Lamb, Hazlitt, the Smiths, De Quincey and Reynolds. The latter of these was united with Hood in the publication of the Odes and Addresses, which appeared anonymously and were ascribed by Coleridge to Lamb. These were followed by Whims and Oddities. Hood became at once a popular writer, but in the midst of his success a firm failed which involved him in its losses. The poet, disdaining to seek the aid of bankruptcy, emulated the example of Scott, and determined by the economy of a life in Germany to pay off the debt which he had thus involuntarily contracted. In 1835 the family took up their residence in Coblenz from thence removed to Ostend (1837) and returned to London in 1840. He subsequently became editor of the New Monthly in 1841, and held it until 1843 when the first number of his own Magozino was issued. A pension was obtained for him, with reversion to his wife and daughter, in 1844, and he died upon the 3rd of May in the following year.

Hood stands very high among the poets of the second order. He was not a creative genius. He has given little indication of the highest imaginative faculty, but his fancy was most delicate and full of graceful play. His appreciation of the beauties of nature was very vivid, and some of his descriptions are models of their class. His most distinctive mark was the thorough humanity of his thoughts and expressions. His poems are amongst the most valuable contributions to English literature of sympathy with, and insight into, human life.

and character. Every reader is struck by the sadness and melancholy always present in his works. The author of the Comic Annuals can scarcely be conceived of as writing such a poem as the Bridge of Sighs. Yet it is true that humour is generally united with sadness. It has been well said by Hood himself, that

"There's not a spring attuned to mirth,
But has its chord in melancholy."

Hood was without a doubt the greatest humorist and wit of his age. He possessed in a most remarkable degree the power of perceiving the ridiculous and the odd. Words seemed to break up into the most queer and droll syllables. His wit was caustic and yet it bore with itself its remedy. It was never coarse. An impurity even in suggestion cannot be found in Hood's pages. With the humour was associated a most tender pathos. The Death-bed is one of the most affecting little poems in our language, and is equalled only by one of his ballads entitled Love & Feign. The deep melancholy that colours "I remember" is carried almost too far. The last verse of that little poem seems to contain the sorrows of a whole life. Amongst his larger works, the Plea of the Midsummer Murders and Hero and Leander are the most talented and elaborate. The descriptive pieces in both are full of the most careful observation of nature, and most musical expression of her beauties. The best known of his poems are The Bridge of Sighs, Fugere Atram and the Song of the Shirt.

ELIZABETH BARNETT BROWNING (d. 1861) wife of Robert Browning, himself an eminent poet, was a native of London and contributed in very early life to some of the leading periodicals. Her first acknowledged work was Prometheus Bound a translation from the great Greek dramatist 1833. In 1844 her poems were published in two volumes. After her marriage with Robert Browning her falling health compelled them to reside in Italy and they took up their residence first in Pisa, and afterwards in Florence. Here she sympathized warmly with the cause of her adopted and suffering nation. Her poem of Casa Guidi Windows appeared in 1851, where the Italian revolutions of 1848 and 1849 kindled her indignation at foreign oppression, and her longings for Italian liberty. Her greatest poem, Aurora Leigh appeared in 1856, her Poems before Congress and Later Poems were published, the former shortly before, the latter shortly after her death which took place at the Casa Guidi Florence, June 29th, 1861.

Mrs. Browning stands very high in the rank of English poets. The creative or imaginative faculty she possessed in the highest degree. Her Satan in the Drama of Exile is one of the finest creations in the whole range of our literature. So intense however, was the subjective in this poetess, that all her writings are tinged by herself. We can see the woman of deep emotion of high toned thought of devout spirit with soul strong enough to have filled the body of a Joan of Arc, slung in her darkened chamber, reading "almost every book worth reading in almost every language mingling with a few friends the smallness of which circle prevented a loss of emotional force by too great expanse, her heart going forth in sympathy with the wretched and down trodden and at last finding a man and poet worthy of her last affection, and then gathering up her strength she seems to fling her own soul into her verse now with all the passion which gleams through "Aurora Leigh," and now in the tenderer sonnets so full of pathos and love. It is not to be wondered at therefore that some of her writing has been called spasmodic. Mrs. Browning has not the calm unflinching flow of thought and feeling which we find in her only modern superior the Laureate. But the woman rises to heights on which the man has never stood and finds depths which he has never fathomed. Her style is therefore often rugged, unfinished, and at times utterly without rhythm. Some portions of Aurora Leigh might be written as prose as well as poetry.

The sadness which pervades all the writings of Mrs. Browning is what might be well expected from such a life as hers. Her ill health the sudden loss of her younger brother the long-continued confinement in that chamber where no sun beam ever cheered, must all have deepened the sorrow in which she ever dwelt. Her verse is therefore but rarely sportive. She deals sometimes in satire but satire is always sad. Her own idea of the poet's work seems to bear this view. "Poetry has been as serious a thing to me as life itself, and life has been a very serious thing. I never mistook pleasure for the final cause of poetry, nor leisure for the hour of the poet." From such a view of poetry and life, we cannot wonder at the moral purpose, the soul which is found in all her writing.

CHAPTER XXIII

THE MODERN NOVELISTS

- § 1 Classification of Romances and Novels § 2 I Romances HORACE WALPOLE. § 3 MRS RADCLIFFE. § 4 LEWIS, MATURIN, and MRS. SHILLER § 5 JAMES. § 6 II Novels of real life and society MISS BURNEY § 7 MRS CHARLOTTE SMITH, MRS INCHBALD, and MRS OPIE. § 8 GODWIN § 9 WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKFRAY His life and writings § 10 Criticism of his works § 11 MISS EDGEMORTH § 12 Local Novels GALT, PROFESSOR WILSON, LADY MORGAN, &c. § 13 Fashionable Novels LISTER, WARD, and LADY BLISSINGTON § 14 MISS AUSTEN THEODORI HOOK MRS TROLLOPE. MISS MITCHELL § 15 III Oriental Novels BLACKFORD, HOPE, and MORIER. § 16 IV Naval and Military Novels—§ 17 CHARLES DICKENS § 18 LORD LYTTON § 19 GEORGE ELIOT § 20 LORD BEACONSFIELD § 21 ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

§ 1 THE department of English literature which has been cultivated during the latter half of the last and the commencement of the present century with the greatest assiduity and success is undoubtedly that of prose fiction—the romance and the novel

This branch of our subject is so extensive, and it embraces such a multitude of works and names, that the only feasible method of treating it so as to give an idea of its immense riches and fertility will be to classify the authors and their productions into a few great general species and though there are some names which may appear to belong to several of these subdivisions, our plan will be found, we trust, to secure clearness and aid the memory The divisions which we propose are as follows I Romances properly so called, &c works of narrative fiction, embodying periods of ancient or middle-age history, the adventures of which are generally of a picturesque and romantic character, and the personages (whether taken from history, or invented so as to accord with the time and character of the action) of a lofty and imposing kind II The vast class of pictures of society, whether invented or not These are generally novels, &c tales of private life, though some, as those of Godwin, may be highly imaginative, and even tragic This class contains a great treasury of what may be called pictures of local manners, as of Scottish and Irish life III Oriental novels—a branch almost peculiar to English fiction, and originating partly in the acquaintance with the East derived by Great Britain from her gigantic Oriental empire, and partly from the Englishman's restless, unappeasable passion for travelling IV Naval and military novels giving pictures of striking adventure, and containing great name of this class, ANN RADCLIFFE (1764-1823), whose numerous romances exhibit a surprising power (perhaps never equalled) over the emotions of fear and undefined mysterious suspense. Her two greatest works are, The Romance of the Forest, and The Mysteries of Udolpho. The scenery of her predilection is that of Italy and the south of France, and though she does not place the reader among the fierce and picturesque life of the Middle Ages, she has, perhaps, rather gained than lost by choosing the ruined castles of the Pyrenees and Apennines for the theatre, and the dark passions of profligate Italian counts for the principal moving power, of her wonderful fictions. The substance of them all is pretty nearly the same, and the author's total incapacity to paint individual character only makes us the more admire the power by which she interests us through the never-failing medium of suspense. Mystery is the whole spell. Nothing can be poorer and more conventional than the personages: they are not human beings, nor even the types of classes, they have no more individuality than the pieces of a chess-board, they are merely counters, but the skill with which the author juggles with them gives them a kind of awful necromantic interest. The characters are mere abstract algebraical expressions, but they are made the exponents of such terrible and intense fear, suffering, and suspense, that we sympathise with their fate as if they were real. Her repertory is very limited: a persecuted sentimental young lady, a wicked and mysterious count, a haggard monk, a tattling but faithful waiting-maid,—such is the poor human element out of which these wonderful structures are created. Balzac, in one of his tales, speaks with great admiration of an artist who, by a few touches of his pencil, could give to a most commonplace scene an air of overpowering horror, and throw over the most ordinary and prosaic objects a spectral air of crime and blood. Through a half-opened door you see a bed with the clothes confusedly heaped, as in some death-struggle, over an undefined object which fauey whispers must be a bleeding corpse, on the floor you see a slipper, an upset candle-stick, and a knife, perhaps, and these hints tell the story of blood more significantly and more powerfully than the most tremendous detail, because the imagination of man is more powerful than art itself —

“Over all there hung a cloud of fear,
A sense of mystery the spirit daunted,
And said, as plain as whisper to the ear,
The place is haunted.”

The great defect of Ann Radcliffe's fictions is not their tediousness of description, nor even the somewhat mawkish sentimentality with which they may be reproached, nor the feebly-elegant versos which the heroines are represented as writing on all occasions (indeed all these things indirectly conduce to the effect by contrast and preparation), but the unfortunate principle she had imposed upon herself, of clearing up at the end of the story all the circumstances that appeared supernatural—of carrying us, as it were behind the scenes at the end of the play, and showing us the dirty ropes and trap-doors, the daubed canvas, the Bengal fire, by which these wonderful impressions had been produced. If we had supped after the play with the "blood bolter'd Banquo," or the "majesty of buried Denmark," we should not probably be able to feel a due amount of terror the next time we saw them on the stage, but in Mrs. Radcliffe, where the feeling of terror is the principal thing aimed at, this discovery of the mechanism deprives us of all future interest in the story, for, after all, pure fear—sensual, not moral, fear—is by no means a legitimate object of high art.

§ 4. A class of writing apparently so easy, and likely to produce so powerful and universal an effect—an effect even more powerful on the least critical minds—was, of course, followed by a crowd of writers. Most of these have descended to oblivion and a deserved neglect. We may, however, say a few words upon Lewis, Mathew, and Mrs. Shelley. MATTHEW GREGORY LEWIS (1775-1818), a good-natured effeminate man of fashion, the friend of Byron, and one of the early literary advisers of Scott, was the first to introduce into England a taste for the infant German literature of that day, with its spectral ballads and diablerie of all kinds. He was a man of lively and childlike imagination, and besides his metrical translations of the ballads of Burger, and others of the same class, he published in his twentieth year a prose romance called The Monk, full of horrible crimes and diabolic agency. It contains several passages of considerable power, particularly the episode of The Blue Nun, in which the wandering Jew—that godsend for all writers, good, bad, and indifferent, of the "intense" or demonic school—is introduced with picturesque effect, but the book owes its continued popularity (though, we are happy to say, only among half-educated young men and ecstatic milliners) chiefly to the licentious warmth of many of its scenes. CHARLES ROBERT MATHURIN (d. 1821) was an Irish clergyman of great promise and still greater vanity, who carried the intellectual merits and defects of his countrymen to an extreme little short of caricature. His imagination was vivid, and he possessed a kind of extravagant and convulsive eloquence, but his works are full of the most outrageous absurdities. He perpetually mistakes monstrosity for power, and lasciviousness for warmth. His life was short and unhappy. He wrote several romances, the chief of which is Melmoth, a farrago of impossible and inconceivable adventures, without plan or coherence, in which the Devil (who is represented as an Irish gentleman of good family in the eighteenth century) is the chief agent. He was likewise the author of a tragedy named Bertram, which was acted with success at Drury Lane in 1816

Mrs. SHELLEY (1798-1851), the wife of the poet, and the daughter of W. Godwin, wrote in Italy, in 1816, the powerful tale of Frankenstein, in which a young student of physiology succeeds in constructing, out of the horrid remnants of the churchyard and dissecting-room, a kind of monster, to which he afterwards gives, apparently by the agency of galvanism, a kind of spectral and convulsive life. This existence, rendered insupportable to the monster by his vain cravings after human sympathy, and by his consciousness of his own deformity, is employed in inflicting (in some cases involuntarily) the most dreadful retribution on the guilty philosopher, and some of the chief appearances of the monster, particularly the moment when he begins to move for the first time, and, towards the end of the book, among the eternal snows of the arctic circle, are managed with a striking and breathless effect, that makes us for a moment forget the childish improbability and melodramatic extravagance of the tale

§ 5 To this subdivision belong the works of that most easy and prolific writer, G. P. R. JAMES (1801-1862)—the most industrious, if not always most successful, imitator of Scott, in revival of chivalric and Middle-Age scenes. The number of James's works is immense, but they bear among themselves a family likeness so strong, and even oppressive, that it is impossible to consider this author otherwise than as an ingenious imitator and copyist—first of Scott, and secondly of himself. The spirit of repetition is, indeed, carried so far, that it is possible to guess beforehand, and with perfect certainty, the principal contents, and even the chief persons, of one of James's historical novels. His heroes and heroines, whose features are almost always gracefully and elegantly sketched in, have more of the English than continental character. We are sure to have a nondescript grotesque as a secondary personage—a half-crazy jester, ever hovering between the hairbrained villain and the faithful retainer. We may count upon abundance of woodland scenery (often described with singular delicacy and tenderness of language) and moonlight rendezvous of robbers and conspirators. But whereas Scott has all these things, it must be remembered how much more he has beside. He looks through all things "with a learned spirit." James stops short here, unless we notice his innumerable pictures of battles, tournaments, hunting-scenes, and old castles, where we find much more of the forced and artificial accuracy of the antiquary, than of the poet's all-embracing, all-imagining eye. James is particularly versed in the history of France, and some of his most successful novels have reference to that country, among which we may mention Richelieu. His great deficiency is want of real, direct, powerful human passion, and consequently of life and movement in his intrigues. There is thrown over his fictions a general air of good-natured, frank, and well-bred refinement, which, however laudable, cannot fail to be found rather tiresome and monotonous.

§ 6 II. Our second subdivision—the Novels of real life and society—is so extensive that we can but throw a rapid glance on its principal productions. To do this consistently with clearness, we must begin rather far back, with the novels of Miss Burney. FRANCES BURNEY (1752-1840) was the daughter of Dr. Burney, author of the History of Music. While yet residing at her father's house, she composed, in her stolen moments of leisure, the novel of Evelina, published in 1778, and is related not to have communicated to her father the secret of her having written it, until the astonishing success of the fiction rendered her avowal triumphant and almost necessary. Evelina was followed in 1782 by Cecilia, a novel of the same character. In 1786 Miss Burney received an appointment in the household of Queen Charlotte, where she remained till her marriage in 1793 with Count d'Arblay, a French refugee officer. She published, after her marriage, a novel entitled Camilla, and her name has more recently come before the public by her Diary and Letters, which appeared in 1842, after her death. The chief defect of her novels is vulgarity of feeling, not that falsely-called vulgarity which describes with congenial animation low scenes and humble personages, but the affectation of delicacy and refinement. The heroines are perpetually trembling at the thought of impropriety, and exhibit a nervous, restless dread of appearing indelicate, that absolutely renders them the very essence of vulgarity. All the difficulties and misfortunes in these plots arise from the want, on the part of the principal personages, of a little candour and straightforwardness, and would be set right by a few words of simple explanation. In this respect the authoress drew from herself, for her Diary exhibits her as existing in a perpetual fever of vanity and petty expedients, and in her gross affectation of more than feminine modesty and bashfulness—literary as well as personal—we see the painful, incessant flutter of her “darling sin”—“the pride that apes humility.” Women are endowed by nature with a peculiar delicacy of tact and sensibility, and being excluded, by the existing laws of society, from taking an active part in the rougher struggles of life, they acquire much more than the other sex a singular penetration in judging of character from slight and external peculiarities. In acquiring this power they are manifestly aided by their really subordinate, though apparently supreme, position in society, by the seductions to which they are exposed, and by the tone of artificial deference in which they are always addressed—men who appear to each other in comparatively natural colours never approach women (particularly unmarried women) but with a mask of chivalry and politeness on their faces, and women, in their turn, soon learn to divine the real character under all these smooth disguisements.

The prevailing literary form or type of the present age is undoubtedly the novel—the narrative picture of manners, just as the epic is the natural literary form of the heroic or traditional period. And the above remarks will, we think, sufficiently explain the phenomenon of so many women now appearing in France, Germany, and England, as novel-writers. Our society is highly artificial: the broad distinctions and demarcations which anciently separated one class of men and one profession from another have been polished away, or filled up by increasing refinement and the extension of personal liberty: the artisan and the courtier, the lawyer and the divine, are no longer distinguished either by professional costume, or by any of those outward and visible signs which formerly stamped their manners and language, and furnished the old comic writer with strongly-marked characters ready made to his hand. We must now go deeper: the coat is the same everywhere, consequently, we must strip the man—nay, we must anatomise him—to show how he differs from his neighbours. To do this well, fineness of penetration is, above all, necessary—a quality which women possess in a higher degree than men.

§ 7 Miss Burney was followed by a number of writers, chiefly women, among whom the names of Mrs Charlotte Smith, Mrs Inchbald, and Mrs Opie are prominent. Their fictions, like those of Miss Edgeworth in more recent times, have a high and never-failing moral aim, and these ladies have exhibited a power over the feelings, and an intensity of pathos, not much inferior to Richardson's in Clarissa Harlowe. But their works are very unequal, and the pathos of which we speak is not diffused, but concentrated into particular moments of the action, and is also obtained at the expense of great preparation and involution of circumstances, so that to compare their genius to that of Richardson, on the strength of a few powerful pictures of intense moral pathos, would be a gross injustice to the admirable and consummate artist in whose works the pathos inimitable as it is, forms but one item in a long list of his excellencies.

MRS. CHARLOTTE SMITH'S (1749-1806) novels, though now forgotten, are praised by Sir Walter Scott, who included her in his British Novelists. Her best novel is the Old English Manor House, published in 1793. She also wrote several pathetic poems. Mrs ELIZABETH INCHBALD'S (1753-1821) Simple Story (1791) and Nature and Art (1796) obtained much celebrity in their time. She also wrote several popular plays. Mrs AMELIA-OPIE (1769-1853) was the widow of the celebrated printer, and her first novel, The Father and Daughter, published in 1801, may still be read with interest

§ 5 At the head of the second division of our fictions is undoubtedly WILLIAM GODWIN (1756-1836), a man of truly powerful and original genius, who devoted his whole life to the propagation of certain social and political theories—visionary, indeed, and totally impracticable, but marked with the impress of benevolence and philanthropy. With these ideas Godwin's mind was perfectly saturated and possessed, and this intensity of conviction, this ardent propagandism, not only gives to his writings a peculiar character of earnestness and thought—earnestness, the rarest and most impressive of literary qualities—but may be considered to have made him, in spite of all the tendencies of his intellectual character—a novelist. Godwin was born in 1756, and appears to have sucked with his mother's milk those principles of resistance to authority and attachment to free opinions in church and state which had been handed down from one sturdy Dissenter to another from the days of the civil war and the republic. He was in reality one of those hard-headed enthusiasts—at once wild visionaries and severe logicians—who abounded in the age of Marvell, Milton, and Harrington, and his true epoch would have been the first period of Cromwell's public life. His own career, extending down to his death in 1836, was incessantly occupied with literary activity. He produced an immenso number of works, some immortal for the genius and originality they display, and all for an intensity and gravity of thought, for reading and erudition. The first work which brought him into notice was the Inquiry concerning Political Justice (1793), a Utopian theory of morals and government, by which virtue and benevolence were to be the primum mobile of all human actions, and a philosophical republic—that favourite dream of visionaries—was to take place of all our imperfect modes of polity. Animated during his whole life by these opinions, he has embodied them under a variety of forms, among the rest in his immortal romances. The first and finest of these is Caleb Williams (1794). Its chief didactic aim is to show the misery and injustice arising from our present imperfect constitution of society, and the oppression of our imperfect laws, both written and unwritten—the jus scriptum of the statute-book, and the jus non scriptum of social feeling and public opinion. Caleb Williams is an intelligent peasant-lad, taken into the service of Falkland, the true hero, an incarnation of honour, intellect, benevolence, and a passionate love of fame. This model of all the chivalrous and elevated qualities has previously, under the provocation of the cruellest, most persevering, and tyrannic insult, in a moment of ungovernable passion, committed a murder his fanatic love of reputation urges him to conceal this crime, and, in order to do this more effectually he allows an innocent man to be executed, and his family ruined. Williams obtains, by an accident, a clue to the guilt of Falkland, when the latter, extorting from him an oath that he will keep his secret, communicates to his dependant the whole story of his double crime, of his remorse and misery. The youth, finding his life insupportable from the perpetual suspicion to which he is exposed, and the restless surveillance of his master, escapes, and is pursued through the greater part of the tale by the unrelenting persecution of Falkland, who, after having committed one crime under unsupportable provocation, and a second to conceal the first, is now led, by his frantic and unnatural devotion to fame, to annihilate, in Williams, the evidence of his guilt. The adventures of the unfortunate fugitive, his dreadful vicissitudes of poverty and distress, the steady, bloodhound, unrelaxing pursuit, the escapes and disguises of the victim, like the agonised turnings and doublings of the hunted hare—all this is depicted with an incessant and never-surpassed power of breathless interest. At last Caleb is formally accused by Falkland of robbery, and naturally discloses before the tribunal the dreadful secret which had caused his long persecution, and Falkland dies of shame and a broken heart. The interest of this wonderful tale is indescribable, the various scenes are set before us with something of the minute reality, the dry, grave simplicity of Defoe. But in Godwin, the faculty of the picturesque, so prominent in the mind of Defoe, is almost absent, everything seems to be thought out, elaborated by an effort of the will. Defoe seems simply to describe things as they really were, and we feel it impossible to conceive that they were otherwise, Godwin describes them (and with a wondrous power of coherency) as we feel they would be in such and such circumstances. His descriptions and characters are masterly pieces of construction, or, like mathematical problems, they are deduced step by step, infallibly, from certain data. This author possesses no humour, no powers of description, at least of nature—none of that magic which communicates to inanimate objects the light and glow of sentiment—very little pathos—but, on the other hand, few have possessed a more penetrating eye for that recondite causation which links together motive and action, a more watchful and determined consistency in tracing the manifestations of such characters as he has once conceived, or a more prevailing spirit of self-persuasion as to the reality of what he relates. The romance of Caleb Williams is indeed ideal, but it is an ideal totally destitute of all the trappings and ornaments of the ideal—it is like some grand picture painted in dead-colour.

In 1799 appeared St Leon, in 1804, Fleetwood, in 1817, Mande- vile, and in 1830, shortly before his death, Cloudeley. These four works are romances in the same manner as Caleb Williams, but there is perceptible in them a gradual diminution in vigour and originality—we do not mean of positive, but of relative originality. St Leon is, however, a powerful conception, executed in parts with a gloomy energy peculiar to this author. The story is of a man who has acquired possession of the great arcanum—the secret of boundless wealth and immortal life, and the drift of the book is to give a terrible picture of the misery which would result from the possession of such an immortality and such riches, when deprived (as such a being must be) of the sympathies of human affection, and the joys and woes of human nature. This novel contains several powerfully-delineated scenes, generally of a gloomy tone, and a female character, Marguerite, of singular beauty and interest.

§ 9 Of more modern novelists WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY (1811-1863) is unquestionably one of the greatest. He was born at Calcutta in 1811, and was educated at the Charterhouse, to which he makes loving reference in his Vanity Fair and The Newcomes under the name of “Grey Friars.” He afterwards went to Cambridge, which he left without taking his degree. His great desire at this time was to become an artist, and with a considerable fortune he started for the continent, where he studied for four or five years in France, Italy, and Germany. But though a master of the pencil, Thackeray was not destined to become a great artist. By his life abroad, mingling with different societies, catching the features of this and that city and its people, he was however laying in stores of knowledge of the highest value for his after life. At Weimar he was one “of at least a score of young English lads” who were there “for study, or sport, or society.” He was introduced to Goethe, and no small pride he felt when some of his sketches were examined by the old poet. On returning to London Thackeray continued his art studies, but the loss of his fortune compelled him to throw himself with all his powers into the field of literature. He entered himself at the Middle Temple, and in 1848 was called to the bar, but he never followed the profession of the law. He was first known by his articles in Eraser, to which he contributed under the names of Michael Angelo Titmarsh and George Fitzboodle, Esq. Tales, criticism, and poetry appeared in great profusion. They have a dash, a brilliancy, and fun, which were in after times toned down, and which in the present day are rarely seen in the magazines. As Titmarsh he published The Paris Sketch-Book (1840), The Second Funeral of Napoleon, The Chronicle of the Drum (1841), and The Irish Sketch-Book (1843). These works were illustrated by the author’s pencil. The chief of his contributions to Eraser as Fitzboodle was the tale of Barry Lyndon, The Adventures of an Irish

Fortune Hunter This was full of humour and incident, but the reading public was not yet expecting a great future from this unknown writer In 1841 Punch was commenced, and Thackeray became at once one of its most diligent supporters The Snob Papers and Jeames's Diary appeared from "The Fat Contributor," besides many other pieces in prose and verse M A Titmarsh in 1846 gave to the world The Notes of a Journey from Cornhill to Grand Cairo, and a Christmas book followed in the next year These works had brought Thackeray into more notice, but he was still regarded as nothing but a clever magazine writer The sly humour, the wise philosophy, the earnest morality, had not yet been recognised The Hoggarty Diamond obtained from John Stirling a prophecy of future fame, but he was not far from forty before his name became illustrious In 1846 and the two following years appeared Vanity Fair, by many supposed to be the best of his works—certainly the most original The novel was not complete before its author took his place among the great writers of English fiction It seized all circles with astonishment The author of satirical sketches and mirthful poems had shown himself to be a consummate satirist, and a great novelist

Mr Thackeray's fame was now complete. He had only to write and his writings were at once read A Christmas volume was published in 1848, Our-Street, and was followed in 1849 by Dr Bircn and his Young Friends His next great work was also in course of publication In 1849 and 1850 Pendennis appeared, inferior in plot, but quite equal to Vanity Fair in humour, character, and incident Another Christmas story appeared in 1851, The Kickleburys on the Rhine, which brought down the indignation of the Times in the oft-repeated charge of cynicism, to which Mr Titmarsh replied in the clever little proface to the second edition, An Essay on Thunder and Small Beer In 1851 the lectures on The English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century were delivered at Willis's Rooms, where the best men of London society crowded to hear some of the most interesting, brilliant, and yet profound criticism on the greatest prose writers of our nation These were repeated with similar success in Scotland and America, and in the latter country, in 1855-56, he delivered, on a second visit, his course on The Georges, which were received with the greatest enthusiasm on his return to England In 1852 Thackeray wrote his Esmond, in our estimation his most perfect work of art The Newcomes followed in 1855, perhaps the most popular of Thackeray's works The heartiness and earnestness of the author are not so much concealed as in his other novels Whilst the charges of severity against him were unfounded, he seemed to have profited by them, and this work evinces more of the tenderness which marked his generous nature

In 1857 Thackeray made his first and only attempt to enter public life. He stood for Oxford, but was defeated by Mr Cardwell by a majority of 67. He returned with more vigour than ever to literature, and before the end of that year commenced The Virginians, which was a sort of sequel to Esmond. There was still the master hand visible, but it was too much of a repetition of his older stories. On the establishment of the Cornhill Magazine in 1860, Thackeray became editor, and whilst connected with it he contributed his later stories, The Adventures of Philip, Lovell the Widower, and a little monthly sketch de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis, though oftener de nihilo, called the Roundabout Papers. He died suddenly in the house which he had built at Kensington on Dec. 23, 1863.

§ 10 In presenting some sketch of the works of this great novelist we must exclude from our notice his smaller and earlier writings. Of them as a whole it may be said that they are full of humour and irony, the moral purpose of the writer not so clearly evident, but yet present in them all. Social foibles, individual weaknesses, the lesser sins of society, are all shown up and treated with quiet satire. Most of his smaller writings are collected in the four volumes of Miscellanies published in 1857. Here appears the poetry of Thackeray. It has been well said, "Thackeray was not essentially poetic," that is, he did not look at everything through the medium of the poetic faculty, his thoughts and imaginings were not always governed by a poetic law. He concealed what was poetic in his nature. He is half ashamed of the sentiment which must have expression. The characters he loves best are the characters where emotion and affection hold their sway, and he cannot keep telling you so as he writes, but he does it with a sort of bashful reticence. He was thoroughly English in the structure of his mind. He could have wept as well as a native of Southern Europe, and sometimes the eye is moist, but the old Gothic spirit despises a man in tears; and so he stands proudly up in self-reliance and a generous manliness. The poetry of his nature was something he ever kept in the recess of his soul. It gave a tenderness to his rebuke, it shed a beauty on his conceptions, and as his countenance was lit with an expression of almost womanly tenderness, so his writing is pervaded with a gentle and loving pathos. But he was able to express himself in a poetic form with much beauty and grace. What finer little poem can be mentioned than his Bouillabaisse? and how grand are some of the strains in his poem on the opening of the Great Exhibition of 1851! One of his best humorous poems was that on the Battle of Limerick, and we scarcely know which most to admire, the inimitable catching of the spirit and tones of Irish agitators, or the quiet humour, which laughs at the folly of the people, and yet in which laughter they themselves could scarcely help joining.

Surely the charge against him of cynicism was unfounded. His humour is almost as trenchant as Jerrold's, while it causes as little pain as that of Sydney Smith.

Vanity Fair, the first of Thackeray's chief works, is called a "Novel without a Hero." It is possessed, however, of two heroines—Rebecca Sharp, the impersonation of intellect without heart, and Amelia Sedley, who has heart without intellect. "Becky Sharp" is without doubt the ablest creation of modern fiction. The selfish, prudent, brave little woman, who without friend or helper wins her way, claims the reader's interest, and very artistic is the set-off which the silly, yet most loveable Amelia, presents to the character of Rebecca. As a whole the book is full of quiet sarcasm and severe rebuke. It is replete with humour and morality, and rivets attention to the end by the vivid reality of all the persons and scenes. This work alone might bear out the charge of cynicism against Thackeray, but a careful reading will perceive the kindly heart that is beating under the bitterest sentence and the most caustic irony.

Pendennis was the immediate successor of Vanity Fair and is the life of a Tom Jones of the present age. Literary life presents scope for description, and is well used in the history of Pen, who is a hero of no very great worth. His somewhat silly love adventures and introduction to fashionable life through Major Pendennis form the groundwork of the story. The Major is a most truthful picture of a modern tiff-hunter. He and his patrons afford room for the satire and the wisdom, the scorn and the counsel with which the book abounds. As Vanity Fair gives us Thackeray's knowledge of life in the present day, so Esmond exhibits his intimate acquaintance with the society of the reigns of the later Stuarts and earlier Georges. Like Vanity Fair, it is without plot, and gives in an autobiographical form the life of Colonel Henry Esmond. The style of some hundred and fifty years ago is reproduced with marvellous fidelity. The Lady Beatrice is really another Becky Sharp, not equal to the modern woman of the world in tact and power, she is superior in beauty, grace, and other womanly perfections. The story of Esmond is probably the best of Thackeray's writings. Though Esmond is too much of the Sir Charles Grandison type, he is a noble character, and the delicacy of delineation under the guise of autobiography is one of the most sustained dramatic efforts in the whole range of English fiction. The fall of Trix is a mistake, for it is both unnatural and unneeded. Lady Castlewood has all the gentleness of Amelia, with much more intellect. We love her so much that we can almost forgive the author marrying her to Esmond.

Of the other works of Thackeray a passing mention must suffice. The Virginians is the history of the grandsons of Esmond, and though not published till 1857, we mention it next as related to Ismond in history. It consists of a series of well-described scenes and incidents in the reign of George II. In 1853 was ended the most popular and best liked of Thackeray's novels, The Newcomes. "The leading theme or moral of the story is the misery occasioned by forced and ill-assorted marriages." The noble courtesy, the Christian gentlemanliness of Colonel Newcome, is perhaps a complete reflection of the author himself. Ethel Newcome is Thackeray's favourite female character. The minor personages are most life-like, while over the whole there is a clear exhibition of the real kindness of heart which Thackeray possessed. Philip and Lovel the Widower appeared in the Cornhill, and here too was published the fragment left by him at his death. These are reproductions of the old stories. The chief characteristics of his later writings are increased mellowness of tone, maturity of thought, and more expressed kindness and generosity of sentiment.

The two courses of lectures On the English Humourists and The four Georges, are models of style and criticism. The latter is a clever sketch of the home and court life of the first Hanoverians. The lectures are full of thoughts sternly abhorrent of the falsity and rottenness which these courts presented, while admiration for the goodness and kindness of the third George almost makes the lecturer forget his weaknesses. As in his novels so in his history, Thackeray always elevates the heart above the head, the emotions above the intellect. The Humourists is a more valuable work, containing some of the most complete criticism on those writers which is to be found in our language. The principle on which some of the writers, such as Pope, have been included, has been questioned. The treatment of Sterne is too severe, while before Swift it has been well said that "Thackeray seemed to quail," and the sketch of the Dean of St Patrick is perhaps the feeblest. That of Addison must receive the first place. None could better estimate the essayist than Thackeray. The wit, the man of literary fashion, the kindly gentleman of the reign of Anne could not be better described and judged than by the wit, the essayist, and novelist of the reign of Victoria. In both there was the same graceful humour and gentle piety.

§ 11. At the head of the very large class of female novelists who have adorned the more recent literature of England, we must place MARIA EDGEWORTH (about 1765-1849). This place she deserves, not only for the immense number, variety, and originality of her works of fiction, but also, and perhaps in a superior degree, for their admirable good sense and utility. Her power of delineating character, and particularly Irish character, renders, however, her tales exceedingly attractive, and by a complete series of stories, graduated so as to interest and describe almost every age from early childhood - to maturity, and adapted to the moral requirements of various classes in society, she has certainly rendered immense services to the cause of prudence and practical virtue. Her long and useful life was chiefly passed in Ireland, and many of her earlier works were produced in partnership with her father, Richard Lovell Edgeworth, a man of eccentric character and great intellectual activity, who devoted himself to experiments in education and social ameliorations. The most valuable series of Miss Edgeworth's educational stories were the charming tales entitled Frank, Harry and Lucy, Rosamond, and others, combined under the general heading of Early Lessons. These are written in the simplest style and language, and are intelligible and intensely interesting even to very young readers, while the knowledge of character they display, the naturalness of their incidents, and the sound practical principles they inculcate, make them delightful even to the adult reader. In the Parents' Assistant the same qualities are applied to the moral and intellectual improvement of a more advanced age, and the common errors, weaknesses, and prejudices of boys and girls are combated in a series of stories which in the good sense and observation they display, are as admirable as in their artistic construction. Some of these—as, for example, Simple Susan—are little masterpieces of style and execution. Miss Edgeworth constantly opposes not only the meaner vices and errors, but that tendency to enthusiasm which in the young is so often, though generous in its origin, the source of much misfortune and disappointment, and she strenuously inculcates the happiness and the duty of industry, moderation, and contentment. Her writings for the young form a striking contrast with those of almost all the other authors who have undertaken the same difficult task. They generally, as Berquin for example, fall into the gross error of representing virtue as uniformly triumphant, and vice as uniformly punished—a false picture of life which the experience of the youngest reader shows to be fallacious—while at the same time they adopt a didactic and preaching tone, from which, whether young or old, we instinctively revolt. The tales of the Parents' Assistant are completed by the excellent three collections respectively called Moral Tales, Popular Tales, and Fashionable Tales, in which the errors and temptations of middle and aristocratic life are most ably exhibited. Some of these, as the stories of Ennui, Leonora, Belinda, &c approach, in extent and importance, to regular novels, though they all have some specific moral aim. But perhaps the most truly original of Miss Edgeworth's stories is the inimitable Castle Rackrent, giving the biographies, equally humorous and pathetic, of a series of Irish landlords. The follies and vices which have caused no small proportion of the social miseries that have afflicted Ireland are here shown up with a truly dramatic effect. In the novels of Patronage and the Absentee, other social errors, either peculiar to that country or common to it with others, are powerfully delineated. Almost all these works show a delicate appreciation of the merits and the weaknesses of the Irish character, and especially of the Irish peasantry, and Miss Edgeworth has in some sense done for her humbler countrymen what Scott did with such loving genius for the Scottish people. In her writings we see the Irish peasant as he is, and it is impossible to conceive a greater contrast than that of her animated sketches and the conventional Irishman of the stage or of fiction. The services rendered by Maria Edgeworth to the cause of common sense are incalculable, and the singular absence of enthusiasm in her writings, whether religious, political, or social, only makes us more wonder at the force, vivacity, and consistency with which she has drawn a large and varied gallery of characters.

§ 12 Miss Edgeworth's never-failing success in the delineation of Irish-character will warrant us in placing her at the head of a class of novelists almost peculiar to English literature, and which ought to form a subdivision in this part of our subject—we mean writers whose works are devoted to the delineation of local manners and character. Thus there are many excellent writers of fiction who have devoted themselves to the painting of the peculiar manners, oddities, and domestic life of Scotland and Ireland exclusively. JOHN GALT (1779-1839), in a long series of novels, has confined himself to the minute delineation—as rich, as original, and as careful as the workmanship of Douw, Miens, or Temiers—of the interior life of the Scottish peasantry and provincial tradespeople. The Annals of the Parish, the supposed journal of a quaint, simple-minded Presbyterian pastor, give us a singularly amusing insight into the microscopic details of Scottish life in the lower classes. Galt's primary characteristic is a dry, subdued, quaint humour—a quality very perceptible in the lower orders of Scotland, and which in his works, as in the national character of his countrymen, is often accompanied by a very profound and true sense of the pathetic. The more romantic and tragical side of the national idiosyncrasy has been exquisitely portrayed in the touching tales of PROFESSOR JOHN WILSON (1785-1854), also celebrated as a poet and the author of Noctes Ambrosianæ, of whom we shall speak more fully in the subsequent chapter. In his Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life, published in 1822, and in The Trials of Margaret Lyndsay, which appeared in 1823, he exhibits a deep feeling for the virtues and trials of humble life. In this department of local manners the Irish have peculiarly distinguished themselves, as might indeed be expected, when we remember the intense vivacity of the Hibernian character, and the abundance of materials for the novelist afforded by the incessant social, religious, and political discord which for three centuries has never ceased to convulse that country. A long list of names presents itself to our notice, of which it is only possible to mention—LADY MORGAN (about 1786-1859), JOHN BANIM (d. 1842), CROFTON CROKER (1798-1854), and WILLIAM CARLETON. All these persons have devoted themselves, with more or less success, to the depicting the humours or the passions, the bright or dark, the light and shadow, of Irish life. Some—as, for example, Banim—have attached themselves more exclusively to the tragic, or rather melodramatic, scenes of Irish society, generally in the peasant class, and though it is impossible not to appreciate in their works a very marked degree of power, picturesqueness, imagination, and eloquence, yet these high qualities are often eclipsed by an exaggerated and ferocious energy which defeats its own object, and renders the work ridiculous instead of sublime. In the Irish character there is no repose, and where there is no repose there can be no contrast—the only element of strong impressions. Other authors, again, as Crofton Croker, have attached themselves more particularly, and with more effect, to the merely romantic and imaginative features of the national legends and superstitions, and the latter has produced a little collection of fairy tales worthy to be placed beside the delicious Haus und Kindermärchen of the brothers Grimm.

§ 13 Of those who have devoted themselves to the delineation of purely English manners in all ranks of society the number is so immense that it would be as useless as tedious to give even a catalogue of their names and works. We shall content ourselves with selecting a few of the most prominent, or rather such as appear typical, and as consequently will give, in each instance, the general idea of the class at whose head we place them, and first, of the writers of what are called “fashionable novels”—i.e. such as pretend to depict the manners, habits, and sentiments of aristocratic life. There is no country in the world, assuredly, in which the middle and lower classes possess so much personal liberty, and consequently so much enlightenment and independence, as England, but at the same time there is hardly any nation in which, generally speaking, there is such a tendency in each class to admire and ape the manners of the class immediately above it. Our present business is with the literary effect of this peculiar admiration of aristocracy. Its tendency has been to flood our literature with a preposterous amount of trashy writings, proposing to give a faithful reflection of the manners and habits of high life. Frequently composed, and as a mere speculation, by persons totally unacquainted with the scenes they essayed to describe, and relying for their interest either on grotesque exaggerations of what they supposed to exist in those favoured regions—the Empyrean of fashion—or on coarse scandal and misrepresentation, these egregious books were either signpost caricatures of what the authors had never seen, or were clumsy réchauffés of forgotten scandal, without wit, sense, probability, or nature. The more extravagant, however, were these pictures, and the less they resembled the ordinary life of the reader, the more eagerly were they admired, and it is not to be wondered at that the time should come when persons, either themselves members of aristocratic society, or men capable of forming true ideas on the subject, should have taken in hand to give something like a true picture of the life of these envied circles. Among the best of these fashionable novels are those of T. H. LISTER (d. 1842), R. PLUMER WARD (d. 1846), and LADY-BLESSINGTON (1790-1849). The novels of Ward are distinguished by the author's attempt to unite with an interesting story a good deal of elevated philosophical and literary speculation, so that many of his works—as, for instance, Tremaine, De Vere, De Clifford, &c.—are something which is neither a good narrative nor a collection of good essays. Either the philosophy impedes the narrative, or the narrative destroys the interest and coherency of the philosophy. But the writings of Ward, as well as of Lister, whose Granby may be read with pleasure, are valuable for the simple and unaffected tone of their language, for the moral truth and elevation of their sentiment, and for the charm that can only be expressed by that most untranslatable of English words—"gentlemanliness."

§ 14 Descending the social scale, we come to a very large and characteristic department of works—the department which undoubtedly possesses not only the greatest degree of value for the English reader, but will have the most powerful attraction for foreign students of our literature. This is that class of fictions which depicts the manners of the middle and lower classes, and here again we shall encounter a singular amount of female names. The first in point of time, and the first in point of merit, in this class, is MISS AUSTEN (1775-1817), whose novels may be considered as models of perfection in a new and very difficult species of writing. She depends for her effect upon no surprising adventures, upon no artfully-involved plot, upon no scenes deeply pathetic or extravagantly humorous. She paints a society which, though virtuous, intelligent, and enviable above all others, presents the fewest salient points of interest and singularity to the novelist. We mean the society of English country-gentlemen. Whoever desires to know the interior life of that vast and admirable body the rural gentry of England—a body which absolutely exists in no other country on earth, and to which the nation owes many of its most valuable characteristics—must read Miss Austen's novels, Sense and Sensibility, Pride and Prejudice, Mansfield Park, and Emma. In these works the reader will find very little variety and no picturesqueness of persons, little to inspire strong emotion, nothing to excite wonder or laughter, but he will find admirable good sense, exquisite discrimination, and an unrivalled power of easy and natural dialogue. MISS FERRIER (d 1854) has also written a number of novels, generally depicting, with great vivacity and truth, the oddities and affectations of semi-vulgar life, but her works are far inferior, as artistic productions, to the elegant sketches of Miss Austen.

Of the purely comic manner of fiction there are few better examples than the novels of THEODORE HOOK (1788-1842). He is greatest in the description of London life, and particularly in the rich drollery with which he paints the vulgar efforts of suburban gentility to ape the manners of the great. There is not one of his numerous novels and shorter tales in which some scene could not be cited carrying this kind of drollery almost to the brink of farce. Many of his works—as Sayings and Doings—consist of short tales, each destined to develop the folly or evil consequences of some particular inconsistency or affectation: thus the work just cited consists of a set of detached stories, each written on the text, as it were, of some common well-known proverb, and though the narratives are of very slight construction, and do not contain very profound views of character, they none of them are devoid of some incredibly droll caricatures of manners. What, for example, can be more irresistible than the Bloomsbury evening party in Maxwell, or the dinner at Mr Abberley's in The Man of Many Friends? Hook's more exclusively serious novels are generally considered as inferior to those in which there is a mixture of the ludicrous, and for one of the last works produced by this clever writer before his death, he selected a subject admirably adapted to the peculiar strength of his talent. This was Jack Brag, a most spirited embodiment of the arts employed by a vulgar pretender to creep into aristocratic society, and the ultimate discomfiture of the absurd hero. Hook was a man of great but superficial powers, one of the most amusing conversationists of the day, an inimitable relater of anecdotes, a singer, and an improvisatore, but he was himself afflicted with the same passion for the society of the great as he has so wittily caricatured in Mr Brag, and his life was passed in incessant but desultory literary labour as a novelist and journalist, in frequent disappointments, in debt, and in the empty applauses of the circle he amused. He died in 1842, leaving a large number of works, all of them exhibiting strong proofs of humour, but mostly deprived of permanent value by the haste perceptible in their execution. The best of them are, perhaps, Gilbert Gurney, and its continuation, Gurney Married.

Very similar to Theodore Hook in the subject and treatment of her novels, and not unlike him in the general tone of her talent, is MRS TROLLOPE, whose happiest efforts are the exhibition of the gross arts and impudent stratagems employed by the pre-tenders to fashion Mrs Trollope's chief defect is coarseness and violence of contrast she does not know where to stop, and is too apt to render her characters not ridiculous only, but odious, in which she offends against the primary laws of comic writing Moreover, she neglects light and shade in her pictures her personages are either mere embodiments of all that is contemptible, or cold abstractions of every thing refined and excellent Her best work is, perhaps, The Widow Barnaby, in which she has reached the ideal of a character of gross, full-blown, palpable, complete pretension and vulgar assurance The widow, with her coarse handsome face, and her imperturbable, unconquerable self-possession, is a truly rich comic conception Mrs Trollope's plots are exceedingly slight and ill-constructed, but her narrative is lively, and she particularly excels in her characters of goodnatured, shrewd old maids

It would be a great injustice were we not to devote a few words of admiration to the charming sketches of Miss Mitford (1769-1855), a lady who has described the village life and scenery of England with the grace and delicacy of Goldsmith himself Our Village is one of the most delightful books in the language it is full of those home scenes which form the most exquisite peculiarity, not only of the external nature, but also of the social life of the country In nothing is our nation so happily distinguished from all others as in the enlightenment, the true refinement, the virtue, and the dignity of her middle and lower classes, and in no position are those classes so worthy of admiration as in the quiet, tranquil existence of the country She describes with the truth and fidelity of Crabbe and Cowper, but without the moral gloom of the one, and the morbid sadness of the other Whether it is her pet greyhound Lily, or the sunburnt, curly, ragged village child, the object glows before us with something of that daylight sunshine which we find in its highest perfection in the rural and familiar images of Shakespeare

§ 15 III ORIENTAL NOVELS — The immense colonial possessions of Great Britain, and particularly her colossal empire in the East, combined with the passion for travelling so strongly manifested in the nation, have created in our literature a class of works which may be considered as forming almost a separate department of fiction These are novels which have for their aim the delineation of the manners and scenery of distant countries, and as among these works the Oriental are naturally the most splendid and prominent, we shall take three which seem the most favourable specimens of this subdivision They are different from each other in form, in tone, and in scope, but are equally distinguished for their cleverness and individuality Of these Oriental novels, then, we select, as the most striking examples, The History of the Gaijeh Kathel, by WILLIAM BEECHER (1760-1844), the romance of

Anastasius, by THOMAS HOPE (about 1770-1831), and the inimitable Haji Baba of JAMES MORIEN (d 1849) The first of these fictions was as wild, strange, and dreamily magnificent as the character and biography of its author—a man almost as rich, as splendidly luxurious, and as coldly meditative as the Comte de Monte-Christo, in Dumas's popular story Vathek is an Arabian tale, and was originally published in 1784, in French, being one of the rare instances of an Englishman being able to write that difficult language with the grace and purity of a native Being afterwards translated by the author into his mother tongue, it forms one of the most extraordinary monuments of splendid imagery and crustic wit which literature can afford It is very short, and in some respects resembles (at least in its cold sarcasm of tone and exquisite refinement of style) the Zadig of Voltaire But Vathek is immeasurably superior in point of imagination, and in its singular fidelity to the Oriental colouring and costume Indeed, if we set aside its contemptuous and sneering tone, it might pass for a translation of one of The Thousand and One Nights It narrates the adventures of a haughty and effeminate monarch, led on, by the temptations of a malignant genie and the sophistries of a cruel and ambitious mother, to commit all sorts of crimes, to abjure his faith, and to offer allegiance to Eblis, the Mahomedan Satan, in the hope of seating himself on the throne of the Preadamite sultans The gradual development in his mind of sensuality, cruelty, atheism, and insane and Titanic ambition, is very finely traced the imagery throughout is truly splendid, its Eastern gorgeousness tempered and relieved by the sneering sarcastic irony of a French Encyclopédiste, and the concluding scene soars into the highest atmosphere of grand descriptive poetry Here he descends into the subterranean palace of Eblis, where he does homage to the Evil One, and wanders for a while among the superhuman splendours of those regions of punishment The fancy of genius has seldom conceived anything more terrible than "the vast multitude, incessantly passing, who severally kept their right hands on their heart, without once regarding anything around them They all avoided each other, and, though surrounded by a multitude that no one could number, each wandered at random, unheeding of the rest, as if alone on a desert where no foot had trodden "

Hope, like Beckford, was a man of refined taste, luxurious habits, and possessed of a colossal fortune accumulated in commerce His work, though very different in form from that of Beckford, was not unlike it in some points Anastasius, published in 1819, purports to be the autobiography of a Greek, who, to escape the consequences of his own crimes and villainies of every kind, becomes a renegade, and passes through a long series of the most extraordinary and romantic vicissitudes The hero is a compound of almost all the vices of his unfortunate and degraded nation, and in his vicissitudes of fortune we see passing before us, as in a diorama, the whole social, political, and religious life of Turkey and the Morea. The style is elaborate and passionate and this, as well as the character of the principal personage, reminds us, in reading Anastasius, very strongly of the manner of Lord Byron. Indeed, this romance is very much what Byron would have written in prose—the same splendid, vivid, and ever-fresh pictures of the external nature of the most beautiful and interesting region of the world, the same intensity of passion, the same gloomy colouring of unrepenting crime.

“Link’d with one virtue, and a thousand crimes,”

But if the darker side of Oriental nature be presented to us in Vathek and Anastasius, in the former combined with the caustic irony of Voltaire, in the second with the mournful grandeur of Byron, the Hajji Baba of Morier will make us ample amends in drollery and a truly comic verve. This is the Gil Blas of Oriental life. Hajji Baba is a barber of Ispahan, who passes through a long but delightfully varied series of adventures, such as happen in the despotic and simple governments of the East, where the pipe-bearer of one day may become the vizier of the next. The hero is an easy, merry good-for-nothing, whose dexterity and gaiety it is impossible not to admire, even while we rejoice in the punishment which his manifold rascalities draw down upon him, and perhaps there is no work in the world which gives so vast, so lively, and so accurate a picture of every grade, every phase of Oriental existence. Mr Morier, who resided nearly all his life in various parts of the East, and whose long sojourn as British minister in Persia made him profoundly acquainted with the character of the people of that country, has most inimitably sustained his imaginary personage. The Hajji is not only a thorough Oriental, but intensely Persian, and a Persian of the lower class into the bargain; a perfect specimen of his nation—the French of the East—gay, talkative, dexterous, vain, enterprising, acute, not over scrupulous, but always amusing. The worthy Hajji, in the continuation of the story, comes to England in the suite of an embassy from “the asylum of the universe,” and perhaps nothing was ever more truly natural and comic than the way in which he relates his impressions and adventures in this country, his surprise at the condition of women among us, his admiration of the “moonfaces,” and, above all, his astonished wonder at the “Coompany,” the great enigma to all Orientals.

§ 16, IV, NAVAL AND MILITARY NOVELS.—It now remains only to speak of one species of prose fiction—that which has for its subject the manners and personages of marine or military life. It may easily be conceived that, the former service being most entwined with all the sympathies of the national heart, the subdivision of marine novels should be the richest. The contrary might be naturally expected in France, and in France we accordingly find that though, particularly in modern times, numerous novelists have endeavoured to put in a picturesque and attractive light the manners and scenes of a sea-life, yet that it is the army which has supplied popular literature—the novel, the chanson, and the vaudeville—with the types of character most identified with the national feeling and predilection. What the militaire is to the French public, the sailor is to the English: in the songs of the people, on their stage, in their favourite books, the “Jack Tar,” the “old Agamemnon” who followed Nelson to the Nile, is as perpetually recurring and indispensable a personage as the “vieux moustache,” the “grogneur de la vieille garde,” to the French. And this is natural enough. Each country is peculiarly proud of that class to which it owes its brightest and least disputable glory: as the Frenchman naturally hugs himself in the idea that France is incontestably the first military nation in the world, so the Englishman, no less naturally, is peculiarly vain of his country’s naval achievements, not that in either case the former at all forgets or undervalues the naval triumphs of his flag, or the latter the military exploits of his, but simply because France is not essentially maritime, and England is, and therefore the natives of each attach themselves to that species of glory which they consider the peculiar property of their nation.

At the head of our marine novelists stands CAPTAIN MARRYAT (1792-1848), one of the most easy, lively, and truly humorous story-tellers we possess. One of the chief elements of his talent is undoubtedly the tone of high, effervescent, irrepresible animal spirits which characterises everything he has written. He seems as if he sat down to compose without having formed the least idea of what he is going to say, and sentence after sentence seems to flow from his pen without thought, without labour, and without hesitation. He seems half tipsy with the very gaiety of his heart, and never scruples to introduce the most grotesque extravagances of character, language, and event, provided they are likely to excite a laugh. This would produce absurdity and failure as often as laughter were it not that he has a natural tact and judgment in the ludicrous, and this happy audacity—this hit-or-miss boldness—serves him admirably well. Nothing can surpass the liveliness and drollery of his Peter Simple, Jacob Faithful, or Mr Midshipman Easy, what an inexhaustible gallery of originals has he paraded before us! The English national temperament has a peculiar tendency to produce eccentricity of manner, and a sea-life in particular seems calculated to foster these oddities till they burst into full blow and luxuriance. Marryat's narratives are exceedingly inartificial, and often grossly improbable, but we read on with gay delight, never thinking of the story, but only solicitous to follow the droll adventures, and laugh at the still droller characters. Smollett himself has nothing richer than Captain Kearney, with his lies and innocent ostentation, Captain To, with his passion for pig, his lean wife and her piano, or than Mr Easy, fighting his ship under a green petticoat for want of an ensign. This author has also a peculiar talent for the delineation of boyish characters: his Faithful and Peter Simple (the "fool of the family") not only amuse but interest us, and in many passages he has shown no mean mastery over the pathetic emotions. Though superficial in his view of character, he is generally faithful to reality, and shows an extensive if not very deep knowledge of what his old waterman calls "human natur." There are few authors more amusing than Marryat: his books have the effervescence of champagne.

CAPTAINS GLASCOCK and CHAMBER, MR HOWARD and MR TROTTER, have also produced naval fictions of merit: the two last authors have followed a more tragic path than the others mentioned above, and have written passages of great power and impressiveness, but their works are injured by a too frequent occurrence of exaggerated pictures of blood and horror—a fatal fault, from which they might have been warned by the example of Eugène Sue.

The tales called Tom Cringle's Log and The Cruise of the Midge are also works in this kind (although not exclusively naval) of striking brilliancy and imaginative power. In these we have a most gorgeously coloured and faithful delineation of the luxuriant scenery of the West Indian Archipelago, and the manners of the creole and colonist population are reproduced with consummate drollery and inexhaustible splendour of language. They were the production of MR MICHAEL SCOTT (d 1835), a gentleman engaged in commerce, and personally familiar with the scenes he described, and the admiration they excited at their first appearance (anonymously) in Blackwood's Magazine caused them to be ascribed to the pen of some of the most distinguished of living writers, particularly to that of PROFESSOR WILSON.

The military novels are mostly by living authors, and are therefore excluded from our work. MR GLEIG has recorded in a narrative form many striking episodes of that "war of giants" whose most glorious and terrific scenes were the lines of Torres Vedras, the storm of Badajoz, and the field of Waterloo, and a number of younger authors, chiefly Irishmen, as MESSRS LEVER and LOVER, have detailed with their national vivacity the grotesque oddities and gay bravery of their countrymen, who never appear to so much advantage as on the field of battle

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS.

OTHER NOVELISTS.

A few other Novelists, omitted in the preceding chapter, deserve a few words —

HENRY MACKENZIE (1745-1831), a Scotch man and a resident in Edinburgh, where he enjoyed great literary celebrity. His best known by The Man of Feeling, published in 1771, in which he imitated with considerable success the style of Sterne. He also wrote The Man of the World, which is inferior to the former novel.

THOMAS HOLGROVE (1745-1809) an ardent admirer of the French revolutionary doctrines which he introduced into his novel, Anna St Ives, published in 1792. His better known by his comedy, The Road to Ruin.

SOPHIA LEE (1750-1824) and HANNAH LEE (1766-1851), the authoresses of the Canterbury Tales of which the greater part was written by the younger sister. The first volume appeared in 1797. These Tales are of real merit, and will well repay perusal. "Krulsner, or the German's Tale," says Lord Byron, "made a deep impression upon me, and may indeed be said to contain the germ of much that I have since written." He produced in 1821 a dramatic version of this tale, under the title of Werner, or the Inheritance.

Dr JOHN MOORE (1729-1802), a native of Stirling and a medical man, wrote numerous works, of which his novel called Zeluco published in 1785 is the best known. Dr Moore had lived abroad for some years and the scene of the novel is laid chiefly in Italy.

ANNA MARIA PORTER (1781-1832) and JANE PORTER (1776-1850), two sisters, whose works were very popular in their day. The Thaddeus of Warsaw (1803) and the Scottish Chiefs (1808) of the latter are the best known. The style is animated, and some of the scenes striking, but they exhibit little knowledge of real life or character.

MRS. MARY BRETTON (1778-1818), a native of the Orkneys, and the authoress of Self Control (1811) and Discipline (1814) two novels of considerable power.

MRS. ELIZABETH HAMILTON (1758-1816), a native of Belfast, but brought up in Scotland, the authoress of the popular moral tale, The Cottage of Glenburnie, published in 1808.

JOHN GIBSON LOCKHART (1794-1854), who will claim a fuller notice in the following chapter, must be mentioned here on account of his four remarkable novels: Valerius, a Roman Story (1821), a tale of the times of Trajan, Adam Blair (1822), Reginald Dalton (1823) and Matthew Wallis (1824).

JAMES BAILLIE FRASER (d. 1858), the author of two Oriental romances, The Kurzibash, a Tale of Khorasán (1837), and The Persian Adventurer, of the same character as Mr Motier's novels.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË (1816-1855), better known by her pseudonym CURRIER BELL, the daughter of a Yorkshire clergyman, published in 1847 a novel, entitled Jane Eyre. This was followed by Shirley in 1849, and Villette in 1853. These novels are remarkable works, exhibiting great knowledge of human nature and striking power.

ALBERT SMITH (1816-1860), a native of Chertsey, was educated for the medical profession, which he abandoned for literature. His Adventures of Mr Ledbury, Christopher Tadpole, The Poppleton Legacy and smaller works, are amusing, and have had an extensive circulation.

DOUGLAS JENNOLD (1803-1857) was a native of London, but spent his early life at Sheerness, where his father was manager of the theatre. His education was scanty. He went to sea at an early age, sailing with Captain Austen as a midshipman. When peace came he left the navy, and was apprenticed to a printer. It was at this time that his first literary production appeared—a criticism upon the opera ‘Der Freischütz.’ This was followed by a number of dramatic pieces, among which Black-Fyed Susan was the most celebrated. He now became a most industrious writer of plays. Rent Day was his crowning success, performed at the leading theatres, and obtaining the kindly notice of the artist Wilkie, from whose picture it had been elaborated. This was followed by The Prisoner of War, Time works Wonders, The Heart of Gold.

Contemporaneously with these dramatic writings, his prose works were claiming the ear of the public. A Man made of Money, The Chronicles of Clovernook, St Giles and St James, were contributed to different magazines of the day. Punch found him one of its most successful supporters. In this paper appeared his Story of a Father, Punch’s Letters to his Son, and the Candle Lectures.

He took a leading part also in political writing. He contributed to the Ballot and the Examiner, started the weekly news paper called after his own name, and at last undertook the editorship of the popular and largely circulated Lloyd’s Newspaper. Douglas Jerrold was best known in the social circle. His wit and repartee, his trenchant and mirthful sayings are still remembered and repeated. He died on the 8th of June, 1857.

ADDENDUM

Since the publication of the last edition of this Work four great novelists have died

§ 17 CHARLES DICKENS (1812–1870) Dickens sprang into the place of national favourite when still very young, and at a single bound. The son of a government clerk, whose life was a continuous struggle with poverty and debt, he was forced in early boyhood to undergo humiliations galling to his sensitive nature. Though he was—to use his own words—“a child of singular abilities, quick, eager, delicate, and soon hurt,” he was doomed to drudge for some years in a blacking manufactory situated in the worst quarter of London. Yet this cruel school supplied an admirable training for the future novelist, the manifold knowledge that the child thus gained of city life in its lowest forms, treasured up in a most tenacious memory, furnished materials for many of the man’s greatest works. He was afterwards office-boy to an attorney, then reporter in Doctors’ Commons, then reporter in Parliament, winning his way to comparative competence by steady industry. His first efforts in literature were some contributions to the Monthly Magazine, which, when published in a collected form as Sketches by Boz, attracted some notice, and soon reached a second edition. But the same year (1836) distinction of the most dazzling kind suddenly came to him. At the request of a publishing firm he began the Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club, and before the work had half run its course he had risen to a height of popular favour rarely exemplified in literary history. Everybody read the Pickwick Papers, the sayings of Sam Weller passed briskly from mouth to mouth, the sale of the monthly numbers rose to 40,000 copies.

This was the beginning of a career of incessant literary activity and unbroken success. Before Pickwick was ended Oliver Twist was begun, and when this work was finished, Dickens's large experience of a hitherto neglected section of humanity enabled him to give to the world, in swift succession, Nicholas Nickleby, the Old Curiosity Shop, and Barnaby Rudge. The last of these works was published in 1841, Dickens had added five masterpieces to the literature of humour before he had reached his thirtieth year.

There now seemed to be some danger of the early vein being prematurely worked out, and in 1842 Dickens went to America to gather new materials for his pen. He was welcomed there with a burst of applause such as few men of letters have ever experienced, the whole nation strove its best to do him honour. Yet the American Notes and Martin Chuzzlewit, which came out soon after his return home, drew a picture of Transatlantic society which, whether true or false, deeply wounded the national feeling, and Dickens was charged with gross ingratitude to his generous hosts. His defence was that the man who did not spare his own countrymen could hardly be expected to sacrifice the truth through tenderness for what was absurd in the ways of foreigners. He next paid a long visit to the Continent (1844-1847), during which he wrote the Christmas Carol and Dombey and Son, the last number of the latter appearing in 1848. His next work, David Copperfield (1849), is usually regarded as marking the culmination of his genius, and its author would seem to have thought so himself, "of all my books," he says, "I like this the best." And no wonder, in the hero we must recognise Dickens himself, and in many of the incidents of the work the events of his own early life.

Fame and fortune were now assured, and henceforward longer intervals separated the publications of his great serial novels. Bleak House was finished in 1853, Little Dorrit in 1857, Our Mutual Friend in 1865. Notwithstanding the alleged decay of power in these later works there was no decay of popular interest, Dickens never lost the place he had early won in the national heart. Last came the beginnings of The Mystery of Edwin Drood, but death snapped the thread of the author's life before many numbers were given to the world. Edwin Drood remains a fragment.

Dickens had more than once projected monthly or weekly periodicals. His first enterprise of this kind, Master Humphrey's Clock, lived long enough to start the Old Curiosity Shop and Barnaby Rudge, but his latest, Household Words, which was begun in 1850, struck vigorous root, was transformed, nine years later, into All the Year Round, and thus in a sense exists still. For this he wrote his shorter novels, Hard Times, the Tale of Two Cities, and Great Expectations, of which the last is hardly less excellent.

than the best of his greater works. Soon after his return from a second visit to America, in which the Americans nobly avenged themselves by making it a still greater triumph than the first, he was suddenly smitten down by apoplexy, the penalty of an overtasked brain, at his house of Gadshill, near Rochester, and died the next day, June 9, 1870. He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

To specify even the leading characteristics of Dickens's genius is hardly possible within the limits of a book like this. His one peerless gift was his humour, rich and inexhaustible, of this it seemed as if the fountain could never run dry, it shows itself as clearly in the Mutual Friend as in the Pickwick Papers. The file of irresistibly comic characters that he created, Sam Weller, Dick Swiveller, Micawber, Wemmick, and the others—to name them all were not easy—stretch far beyond the longest that can be drawn out for any other writer, in this respect Dickens is unapproachable. This supreme manifestation of humour was, perhaps, the product of two forces, a power of observation so marvellous as almost to suggest inspiration, and a boundless faculty of conceiving new humorous touches and strokes of character, by which he added to, and thereby heightened, the laughable traits of the men and women of his experience. In this way his unthriftly father became Micawber, his mother Mrs Nickleby. Dickens has many other merits, but his humour eclipses them all. He was fond of a peculiar kind of sentiment, but this often threatens to degenerate into maudlin sentimentality, his inborn love of dramatic effects betrayed him into an occasional striving after the sensational. But on the whole the tone of his writings is manly and sound, and their general view of life cheerful and inspiring. He failed completely in the construction of a plot, indeed, many of his works can hardly be said to have any plot at all. Their manner of publication—in monthly numbers, each of which was expected to have a unity of its own—was, perhaps, chiefly to blame for this fault, but it goes far towards vitiating their character as works of art.

§ 18 LORD LYTTON—Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer-Lytton—(1805-1873), was of a totally different type of genius from his great contemporary, Charles Dickens. The most striking feature in his literary character was the vast range of his intellectual activities, poet, playwright, social critic, journalist, essayist, historian, orator, statesman, and above all novelist—in each character he gained eminence, in all but one or two not far short of the highest attained in his time. The fertility of his mind was still more wonderful. He was born in 1805, and was the son of General Bulwer and Miss Lytton, of Knebworth in Hertfordshire, both whose names he ultimately united on inheriting his mother's property His genius bloomed early, at fifteen he wrote Ismael, a tale, a little later, when a student at Cambridge, he won the Chancellor's prize for a poem on Sculpture After two or three other youthful attempts, he made his first decided hit in Pelham (1827), which soon became the fashionable novel of the day From this date till his death he toiled incessantly to win himself an honourable name in literature. Novel succeeded novel, each showing a distinct improvement on its predecessor, poem succeeded poem, that on Milton gaining the approbation of the judicious, and in 1838 Bulwer was made a baronet at the Queen's coronation solely because of his distinction as a man of letters Among the many novels written by him since 1827, the most valuable are Eugene Aram, The Last Days of Pompeii, and Rienzi, and of these the latter two are likely to keep the public favour longest. Both seek to bring back to life past ages and extinct societies, and with more than average success, in any case they awaken in their readers a vivid interest in the men and women of bygone times

Bulwer's greatness, however, was long in ripening Much unfriendly criticism and not a little ridicule were directed against him for many years He was accused of being affected, artificial, dandified, exception was taken to the morality of his works, and especially to the tinsel glitter that he was declared to have thrown over vulgar crime Carlyle made him the butt of solemn banter in Sartor Resartus, Thackeray scoffed at him in more than one of his compositions And undoubtedly his works had many faults, but most of these gradually disappeared before the chastening influence of time and study In what we may call the novels of his second period Bulwer clearly rose to a higher level of thought, morality, and art The names only of the more impressive can be given here—the Last of the Barons, Harold, and the series of the Caxton Novels, the latter being the best of all his works The qualities of genius become even more marked, as we pass into the novels and romances of his third period, in The Coming Race—a political romance of the Utopia type—The Parisians, and Kenelm Chillingly—the last published posthumously—the stream of thought, intellect, and observation, still flows in full volume

Lord Lytton's dramatic gifts too were of a high order He wrote many plays, and three of them, Richelieu, The Lady of Lyons, and Money, still hold the stage, and are great favourites with playgoers His poems—of which one, King Arthur, is an epic—never gained the recognition that their author thought they deserved, but besides Milton, a goodly share of admiration has been given to St Stephens, a sketch of past and present parliamentary celebrities in vigorous and harmonious verse He was, moreover, a biting satirist, his New Timon had a sharp sting in it for some of his

also, and most of what she wrote is richly flavoured by it. This blending of the new with the old, of the scientific spirit with a large unforced sympathy for traditional beliefs and time-worn usages, indeed, for all things that custom and the reverence of generations had made sacred, was a vital fact in her spiritual nature, and gives a unique interest to her work.

She was already in her thirty-seventh year when her first attempt at fiction, The Sad Fortunes of Amos Barton, appeared in Blackwood's Magazine early in 1857. Other sketches—for Amos Barton was hardly more—soon followed in the same periodical, and by the time that these were collected into a single volume Miss Evans had fixed upon "George Eliot" as her name in literature. The clearer-sighted critics of the day began slowly to recognise in the new author a genius of unusual power and breadth, and to see in the Scenes of Clerical Life—for such was the title of the volume—infinite promise of great things to come. But this recognition was by no means general, for there was much in the structure of these compositions, and in their modes of thought, to startle, and not a little to offend, the tastes and sentiments of the hour. Yet some curiosity was felt regarding the writer, who still withheld her name, even from the editor of the Magazine. This quiet interest had not quite died away, when the appearance of a more ambitious work from the same pen quickened it into a vigorous life, that has gone on widening and deepening ever since. In January, 1859, Adam Bede was published. Yet even this novel, whose surpassing excellence there are few left to question, received no rapturous welcome, readers accustomed to the piquant fiction of the day could not at once bring themselves to relish fairly the calm thoughtfulness of this new type of novel, in which profound reflection, ripe scholarship, and rare inventive capacity seemed to have met together. But this coyness in the public mind soon gave way, erections so fresh and winning as Mr Irwin and Mrs Poyser could not be long resisted, the ruddy tints of English life, among the green pastures, sweet-smelling country lanes, sleepy farmhouses, and village homesteads of the Midlands, were too warm and natural to fail of their effect, and in time the book made its way into the very core of the national heart, whence it is not likely to be soon dislodged. Curiosity was stimulated, but the secret of authorship was well kept, until a gentleman who lived near Nuneaton was pitched upon by the neighbourhood as the too-retiring genius, and had almost persuaded himself of his identity with George Eliot, when the veil was gradually withdrawn.

Adam Bede proved, however, to be but the beginning of an illustrious line, its immediate successor, The Mill on the Floss, which appeared in 1860, deservedly carried the fame of the author also, and most of what she wrote is richly flavoured by it. This blending of the new with the old, of the scientific spirit with a large unforced sympathy for traditional beliefs and time-worn usages, indeed, for all things that custom and the reverence of generations had made sacred, was a vital fact in her spiritual nature, and gives a unique interest to her work.

She was already in her thirty-seventh year when her first attempt at fiction, The Sad Fortunes of Amos Barton, appeared in Blackwood's Magazine early in 1857. Other sketches—for Amos Barton was hardly more—soon followed in the same periodical, and by the time that these were collected into a single volume Miss Evans had fixed upon "George Eliot" as her name in literature. The clearer-sighted critics of the day began slowly to recognise in the new author a genius of unusual power and breadth, and to see in the Scenes of Clerical Life—for such was the title of the volume—infinite promise of great things to come. But this recognition was by no means general, for there was much in the structure of these compositions, and in their modes of thought, to startle, and not a little to offend, the tastes and sentiments of the hour. Yet some curiosity was felt regarding the writer, who still withheld her name, even from the editor of the Magazine. This quiet interest had not quite died away, when the appearance of a more ambitious work from the same pen quickened it into a vigorous life, that has gone on widening and deepening ever since. In January, 1859, Adam Bede was published. Yet even this novel, whose surpassing excellence there are few left to question, received no rapturous welcome, readers accustomed to the piquant fiction of the day could not at once bring themselves to relish fairly the calm thoughtfulness of this new type of novel, in which profound reflection, ripe scholarship, and rare inventive capacity seemed to have met together. But this coyness in the public mind soon gave way, creations so fresh and winning as Mr Irwin and Mrs Poyser could not be long resisted, the ruddy tints of English life, among the green pastures, sweet-smelling country lanes, sleepy farmhouses, and village homesteads of the Midlands, were too warm and natural to fail of their effect, and in time the book made its way into the very core of the national heart, whence it is not likely to be soon dislodged. Curiosity was stimulated, but the secret of authorship was well kept, until a gentleman who lived near Nuneaton was pitched upon by the neighbourhood as the too-retiring genius, and had almost persuaded himself of his identity with George Eliot, when the veil was gradually withdrawn.

Adam Bede proved, however, to be but the beginning of an illustrious line, its immediate successor, The Mill on the Floss, which appeared in 1860, deservedly carried the fame of the author also, and most of what she wrote is richly flavoured by it. This blending of the new with the old, of the scientific spirit with a large unforced sympathy for traditional beliefs and time-worn usages, indeed, for all things that custom and the reverence of generations had made sacred, was a vital fact in her spiritual nature, and gives a unique interest to her work.

She was already in her thirty-seventh year when her first attempt at fiction, The Sad Fortunes of Amos Barton, appeared in Blackwood's Magazine early in 1857. Other sketches—for Amos Barton was hardly more—soon followed in the same periodical, and by the time that these were collected into a single volume Miss Evans had fixed upon "George Eliot" as her name in literature. The clearer-sighted critics of the day began slowly to recognise in the new author a genius of unusual power and breadth, and to see in the Scenes of Clerical Life—for such was the title of the volume—infinite promise of great things to come. But this recognition was by no means general, for there was much in the structure of these compositions, and in their modes of thought, to startle, and not a little to offend, the tastes and sentiments of the hour. Yet some curiosity was felt regarding the writer, who still withheld her name, even from the editor of the Magazine. This quiet interest had not quite died away, when the appearance of a more ambitious work from the same pen quickened it into a vigorous life, that has gone on widening and deepening ever since. In January, 1859, Adam Bede was published. Yet even this novel, whose surpassing excellence there are few left to question, received no rapturous welcome, readers accustomed to the piquant fiction of the day could not at once bring themselves to relish fairly the calm thoughtfulness of this new type of novel, in which profound reflection, ripe scholarship, and rare inventive capacity seemed to have met together. But this coyness in the public mind soon gave way, creations so fresh and winning as Mr Irwin and Mrs Poyser could not be long resisted, the ruddy tints of English life, among the green pastures, sweet-smelling country lanes, sleepy farmhouses, and village homesteads of the Midlands, were too warm and natural to fail of their effect, and in time the book made its way into the very core of the national heart, whence it is not likely to be soon dislodged. Curiosity was stimulated, but the secret of authorship was well kept, until a gentleman who lived near Nuneaton was pitched upon by the neighbourhood as the too-retiring genius, and had almost persuaded himself of his identity with George Eliot, when the veil was gradually withdrawn.

Adam Bede proved, however, to be but the beginning of an illustrious line, its immediate successor, The Mill on the Floss, which appeared in 1860, deservedly carried the fame of the author still higher. This we believe to be George Eliot's masterpiece, the one of her compositions pre-eminent in strokes of the noblest order of genius. The character and history of Maggie Tulliver, child, girl, and woman—in whom we are allowed to see something of the writer herself—the things “sad, high and working,” which form the element of her life, the play of light and shadow on the ways, doings, and sufferings of everyday men and women, and a hundred other features of interest, enchain the attention, and stir the emotions to a depth and intensity that few other works of prose fiction have reached. Yet Silas Marner, which followed in 1861, seems to us the most pleasing of the series, in fact, a perfect prose idyll, breathing of the green fields, and telling of the simple lives, loves, sins, foibles, and frailties of simple country folk in a healthy, social order that progress has effaced. Since Perdita's time no prettier lass has ever run on the greensward than Eppie Marner.

Romola came next (1862-63). The design and subject of this work put the writer's powers to a severer test than anything she had attempted, but the result amply vindicated her confidence in them. If taken merely as a book, without any allowance being made for the difficulties inherent in its plan, Romola is, in our opinion, inferior to The Mill on the Floss, but if judged with a due consideration of the nature of the task imposed by its composition, and as a proof of the author's strength, it is equal, if not superior, to anything of the kind ever written. To bring back to life an extinct age, to reanimate grand historical forms of men and things—this George Eliot essayed in Romola, and came nearer to absolute success than any other English writer that has undertaken a similar task, nearer, we think, than even Thackeray in Esmond. Whether Florence in the days of the Renaissance and Savonarola really were what Pomola depicts, it is of course impossible to say, but there is no doubt about the animation and impressiveness of the picture. In Felix Holt (1866) George Eliot came back again to the familiar ground of English life, but hardly succeeded in maintaining the high level of her previous works. The days of the Reform Bill failed to kindle within her the same living interest as the days of the immediately preceding generation.

By this time her pen had begun to move more slowly, it was not until 1872 that her next novel, Middlemarch, reached the public. The secret of this slowness is revealed in the work itself, a conscious and loftier purpose, and a grander design, necessitated a broader and more populous canvas and a more vigorous and steadily sustained effort. In Middlemarch we certainly find the old power, and much more of it. We find a wonderful variety of strongly drawn characters, and abundance of calm energy, but hardly the old freshness and freedom we seem to miss the old blithe, spontaneous movement, and with it some of the charm, of the earlier books. In Adam Bede and Silas Marner we have, as it were, the subject working through the author, in Middlemarch the author working through the subject. And this remark, if it be true, applies with still greater force to her last and most elaborate novel, Daniel Deronda (1877). Hard, though excellent, work is visible in every page, there is great display of intellectual strength, it always astonishes, often gives a keen pleasure, but the demands it makes on the attention of readers will prevent its ever becoming a popular work, the mental strain required to keep up with the train of reflection and observation is too exacting. Yet the greatness of both Middlemarch and Deronda is indisputable, the "wise, witty, and tender sayings" in which they abound, the genial love of mankind, the catholic spirit that overleaps all social barriers, and draws within the range of our sympathy classes that prejudice has placed under a social ban, have already established them among the weightier classics of the language. And these are but a few of their merits, their pages are crowded with beautiful or forcible types of manhood and womanhood—Dorothea Brooke, Caleb and Mary Garth, and Mrs Cadwallader, in the former, Mr Gascoigne, the Jew Mordecai, Gwendolen Harleth and Grandcourt in the latter, do but stand out from large groups of figures, each of which is striking.

George Eliot now and then strayed into other paths besides that of prose fiction, but never to the same excellent purpose. Poetry attracted her, and she did all that genius and toil could do to secure a position among the great poets of her country. In 1868 she published The Spanish Gypsy, a volume in verse that wanted little but the gift of song to make it a great poem. Throughout its pages we meet with the large heart, the ripe wisdom, the various knowledge, the luxuriance of imagery and illustration, the felicity and fulness of expression, that distinguish George Eliot, but seldom the free flowing force, the melody and glow, inseparable from the idea of a poet. Many smaller poems, valuable for their weighty matter and weightier utterances, for their softness, tenderness, and humanity, she has also given us, and we should be loth to part with them. Of these Jubal, How Lisa loved the King, Stradivarius, and Brother and Sister—this last evidently a leaf from the history of her own early life—are especially noteworthy. Her last composition was The Impressions of Theophrastus Such (1879), which, as its name denotes, is a book of characters, similar in design to those of Overbury and Earle. It is a work of unequal merit. In June, 1880, she married Mr Walter Cross. On the following 22nd of December she died at Chelsea.

The grand general feature that distinguishes George Eliot as a writer seems to us to be a thoughtful, sympathetic, loving realism, which rests on a deep, natural feeling for "the kindly race of men" as its basis, and works in an element of knowledge and culture—is irradiated by this element, and yet loses no whit of its mellowness and kindness. Of all modern writers she is the one that watches the ways of men with the clearest and most faithful eyes and warmest sense of kinship, her breadth of culture but gives distinctness and truth to her pictures, while her breadth of sympathy gives richness of colouring and geniality. Her comprehensive charity embraces all creatures, every living thing that passes under her gaze is not merely touched with the revealing light of the intellect, but is bathed in an atmosphere of love and tenderness. This is especially true of her earliest works, in them the most delightful, because honest and homely, types of English humanity are preserved for future times in an element of thought and feeling that neither distorts nor dims, neither blurs nor makes indistinct. "Clear images before our gladdened eyes," these works certainly place. They do a vast deal more, but this chiefly.

§ 20 The unique combination of a brilliant novelist and an imperial statesman of world-wide fame is found in BENJAMIN DISRAELI (1804-1881), created, in 1876, Earl of Beaconsfield. This illustrious man—known in early life as "Young Disraeli," to distinguish him from his father, Isaac Disraeli, author of the Curiosities of Literature and several other works—had made himself a considerable name in prose fiction years before he entered Parliament, gave even more conclusive, if not so abundant, proofs of his singular powers in the same field whilst his political greatness was still ripening, and returned to it with unabated zest and surpassing success after he had long led a great party and been Prime Minister of England. And his genius for this manner of writing, and its peculiar qualities, are so unmistakably expressed in the bulk of his compositions, that his preference of politics to literature is still resentfully deplored by admiring critics. He was a great literary artist, these men think, thrown away on the service of the Empire. His earliest work, Vivian Grey (1826), is a most striking, if crude, attempt to body forth the notable men of that time, and to give utterance to singularly daring and original ideas on politics. The Young Duke, written in 1829, is a more mature effort "to portray the fleeting manners of a somewhat frivolous age," yet betrays its author's fascinated interest in the movement of public life. Contarini Fleming (1832), being published anonymously, missed its mark for the moment, being, in its writer's words, "almost stillborn," but made its way, though slowly, after a time, and gained the hearty approval of more than one other man of genius. His next publication, The Wondrous Tale of Alroy (1833), an historical and oriental novel, revealed, for the first time, how tenderly and passionately the soul of the young Anglo-Israelite brooded over the history, spirit, ideas and destiny of the extraordinary race from which he was sprung. The very year 1837, which began the transformation of the novelist into the politician, he issued two novels, Henrietta Temple and Venetia, which have nothing whatever to do with politics. The first is what it calls itself, "a love story", into the second the personalities of the poets Byron and Shelley are worked, and in its action their destinies are blended with some ingenuity but doubtful felicity.

Disraeli was seven years in Parliament when his first strikingly impressive book, Coningsby (1844), appeared before the public. In this powerful work the author delivered his soul on "the origin and condition of political parties," with such scorching irony, humour, sarcasm, keenness of temper, and flashing wit, that it has settled into a kind of classic, its Rigby, Taper, and Tadpole, are still familiar as typical figures in the public life of the day. It was followed by the second and third portions of the great Trilogy, as their author names the group, Sybil (1845), and Tancred, or the New Crusade (1847), in which the mounting politician's original and occasionally fantastic views were further and fully developed. The alternative title of the last is significant, its dark utterances and darker hints, regarding certain doctrines of national regeneration that had been revealed to the Hebrew race alone, mystified the public, and under the name of "the Asian mystery" were mercilessly bantered and scoffed at by the professed wits.

Twenty-three years later, when the man of letters was believed to have been irrecoverably lost in the statesman, the political veteran startled the world with Lothair (1870), of which he boasts that it "has been more extensively read than any work that has appeared for the last half century." The freshness of spirit and thronging life of its pages, in which many of the high-placed personages of the hour are made to play their parts under thin disguises, explain to some extent its amazing popularity. Intended, as its motto conveys, to put young men of rank and wealth on their guard against the perils and pit-falls of the time, it repeats in old age a marked characteristic of its author's earlier work, the vigilant regard he shows for, and high value he sets upon, the rising generation, whose guidance into the paths of safety ought to be the vital concern of a nation. The glittering file closes with Endymion (1881), another work of like character with Lothair, and making up by its absorbing personal interest,—for its hero is a reminiscence of the writer's own youthful personality,—for what it may lack of the sparkling qualities of its predecessor. Besides these, Lord Beaconsfield wrote the Revolutionary Epoch (1834), a Tale of Ahoy (1833), an historical and oriental novel, revealed, for the first time, how tenderly and passionately the soul of the young Anglo-Israelite brooded over the history, spirit, ideas and destiny of the extraordinary race from which he was sprung. The very year 1837, which began the transformation of the novelist into the politician, he issued two novels, Henrietta Temple and Venetia, which have nothing whatever to do with politics. The first is what it calls itself, "a love story", into the second the personalities of the poets Byron and Shelley are worked, and in its action their destinies are blended with some ingenuity but doubtful felicity.

Disraeli was seven years in Parliament when his first strikingly impressive book, Coningsby (1844), appeared before the public. In this powerful work the author delivered his soul on "the origin and condition of political parties," with such scorching irony, humour, sarcasm, keenness of temper, and flashing wit, that it has settled into a kind of classic, its Rigby, Taper, and Tadpole, are still familiar as typical figures in the public life of the day. It was followed by the second and third portions of the great Trilogy, as their author names the group, Sybil (1845), and Tancred or the New Crusade (1847), in which the mounting politician's original and occasionally fantastic views were further and fully developed. The alternative title of the last is significant, its dark utterances and darker hints, regarding certain doctrines of national regeneration that had been revealed to the Hebrew race alone, mystified the public, and under the name of "the Asian mystery" were mercilessly bantered and scoffed at by the professed wits.

Twenty-three years later, when the man of letters was believed to have been irrecoverably lost in the statesman, the political veteran startled the world with Lothair (1870), of which he boasts that it "has been more extensively read than any work that has appeared for the last half century." The freshness of spirit and thronging life of its pages, in which many of the high-placed personages of the hour are made to play their parts under thin disguises, explain to some extent its amazing popularity. Intended, as its motto conveys, to put young men of rank and wealth on their guard against the perils and pit-falls of the time, it repeats in old age a marked characteristic of its author's earlier work, the vigilant regard he shows for, and high value he sets upon, the rising generation, whose guidance into the paths of safety ought to be the vital concern of a nation. The glittering file closes with Endymion (1881), another work of like character with Lothair, and making up by its absorbing personal interest,—for its hero is a reminiscence of the writer's own youthful personality,—for what it may lack of the sparkling qualities of its predecessor. Besides these, Lord Beaconsfield wrote the Revolutionary Epoch (1831), a fragment of an ambitious poem, and Count Alarcos, a tragedy (1839), the Life of Lord George Bentinck (1851), and some minor pieces of fiction. His manner as a writer is a somewhat puzzling, occasionally distracting, mixture of seriousness and jest, of the grave and the gay, stinging satire and solemn sneer alternate with generous outbursts and sincere earnestness. He shows throughout a distinct turn for the splendid, the dazzling, the gorgeous in modern life, his style is often rhetorical and heavy, a kind of literary cloth of gold. But the mark of high genius is on all his work.

§ 21 With Disraeli's death died the last of the 'giant brood' of English novelists. In passing to ANTHONY TROLLOPE (1815-1882) we sink to a lower level of art and faculty—to mere talent in fact. But Trollope's work is sound, wholesome and genial, its quiet and true pictures of ordinary English life have a soft and winning, if somewhat tame and commonplace, charm peculiar to themselves. The circumstances of his life may have been largely answerable for the character of his writings. Though born of a good family, a younger son of the author of Widow Barnaby, and educated at Winchester and Harrow, he was driven by the misfortunes of his father to take a clerkship in the Post Office, from which, rising by slow degrees to the position of surveyor, he was compelled to travel much, to live for periods of varying length in many parts of England and Ireland, and thus to mix with and observe average insular humanity of many forms and shades of local or individual character. His love of the hunting field, amounting almost to a passion, added considerably to his opportunities of noticing the ways of men. His literary essays met with scant encouragement for several years, but struggling on with that methodic persistence which only death arrested, he at last contrived to make a palpable hit in The Warden (1856). The favour thus gained was maintained by the still widely-read Barchester Towers (1857), a sequel to the Warden, and was never afterwards seriously imperilled. For a quarter of a century from this time he was the untiring and unrelenting producer of modest and well-flavoured fiction, over-flowing narratives of personal adventure, and an occasional slight biography, for readers of homely tastes. For several years no day passed without its allotted number of pages, no pause in the regular, almost punctual, birth of book after book gave warning of flagging energy or failing materials. Among the half hundred of novels thus created, perhaps the most worthy of notice are Doctor Thorne, Framley Parsonage, Orley Farm, The Small House at Allington and the Last Chronicle of Barset, but out of such abundance and such a distinct tendency to uniformity of merit, it is not easy to choose. Trollope has merit enough to leave room for him to sink below himself, and this he has certainly done in Lady Anna and The Eustace Diamonds. He carried to a barely warrantable extent the practice that Thackeray used so happily, of introducing successful characters over and over again into his books, though he had the art of toning down its wearisomeness. He was most at home in clerical circles: his Archdeacon Grantley, Dean Arabin, Mr Crawley and Mrs Proudie are prominent in several of his novels, and the Mr Plantagenet Palliser of Framley Parsonage, with or without Lady Glencora his wife, is, as Duke of Omnium, the central or an important figure in Can you Forgive Her, Phineas Finn, the Prime Minister, and the Duke's Children. Several books of foreign travel also came from Trollope's pen, and brief lives of Thackeray, Cæsar, and Palmerston. Hawthorne's verdict on Trollope is likely to be final. "His characters are just as real as if some giant had hewn a great lump out of the earth, and put it under a glass case, with all its inhabitants going about their daily business, and not suspecting that they were made a show of."

CHAPTER XXIV

PROSE LITERATURE OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

- § 1 Characteristics of the period. § 2 Progress of Historical Literature. The influence of Niebuhr § 3 Writers upon Ancient History. DR ARNOLD. SIR GEORGE CORNEWALL LEWIS § 4 Writers upon Modern History. LORD MACAULAY § 5 HENRY HALLAM § 6 Theological Literature. ROBERT HALL. JOHN FOSTER. THOMAS CHALMERS § 7 Philosophical Literature. SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON. ARTHUR WHITLEY § 8 Physical Science. HUGH MILLER § 9 Political Literature. The Edinburgh Review. FRANCIS JEFFREY. STANLEY SMITH § 10 The Quarterly Review. WILLIAM GIFFORD. JOHN GIBSON. LOCKHART § 11 Literary Magazine. JOHN WILSON. § 12 CHARLES LAMB § 13 THOMAS DE QUINCY § 14 Political Economy and Jurisprudence. JEREMY BENTHAM § 15 THOMAS CARLTON § 16 HENRY HART MILMAN § 17 ARTHUR PENNENT STANLEY § 18 J. S. MILL.

1 IN presenting a brief sketch of the prose literature of the present century, it will be useful in the first place to obtain some general view of the period, and to point out the features by which it has been marked. Some critics have divided the age into two periods, and on a careful consideration of the literature of the century a marked distinction will be perceived between the writings of the first generation and those of the generation which has just closed. The close of the reign of the fourth George will present us a line of division as can be chronologically obtained, and the distinctive features of the first thirty years are well marked from those which belong to the period succeeding. The early years of this century were years of conflict and excitement. The public mind was wrought to the highest pitch, now of fear, and now of triumph. England fought for the liberties of Europe, at times the struggle seemed to be for her own existence. The literature of a people always reflects something of the prevalent tone of its age, and we may therefore expect that the chief compositions of the first part of the period will be marked by intense feeling, passion, and emotion. Such is the case. A larger amount of the highest poetry is to be referred to the first period. There is no age in English history which can exhibit such an array of masterpieces of song. The most passionate states of the human mind demand an expression in song. In the "Victorian age," on the other hand, the prose element has predominated. The calmer inquiries into politics, philosophy, art, and physical science, have been prosecuted in the more tranquil period, and the first noticeable feature in the writers of the present century is the growing prevalence of our prop-literature Another distinguishing characteristic of the prose of this age is the increasing sphere occupied by works of a fictitious character The present day is, without doubt, the day of novels The works of fiction of past generations have been few Richardson was the father of the modern novel, and till recently there have been comparatively few names in fictitious literature that deserve remembrance

A third feature of the present age is the growth of periodical literature. The rise of our leading reviews will be noticed presently, and together with these have sprung up the countless magazines and newspapers which form the chief part of most men's reading The Book has become too laborious, too tedious a thing for the study of this overworked age We have come to require stimulants in our reading Everybody reads something, and few read much The result of this widespread craving for brief and striking compositions must be a weakening of thought, an impoverishing of ideas, and a supply of what is superficial and often crude

The chief external influence affecting the literature of the age has come from Germany The study of the language, and the increased facilities of communication, have brought us into close union with that country The thoughts and even style of this philosophical literature have done much to shape and regulate English thoughts and language Coleridge introduced it largely, and he has been followed in the work by Thomas Carlyle The place once held by the French has been almost usurped by the German

Having thus given a general view of the age, we shall proceed to sketch more in detail the different portions of our prose literature, with brief notices of the most eminent writers

§ 2 In no department of literature has Europe made greater progress during the present century than in that of History A new impulse was given to the study of Ancient History by the publication of the first volume of Niebuhr's Roman History in Germany in 1811 This remarkable work taught scholars not only to estimate more accurately the value of the original authorities, but to enter more fully into the spirit of antiquity, and to think and feel as the Romans felt and thought. Previous writers of Ancient History, with the exception of Gibbon, had seldom apprehended the ancient world as a living reality, while in the use of their authorities they had shown no critical sagacity and no appreciation of the value of evidence, quoting equally as of the same importance the fabulous tales of a late mythographer, and the sober statements of a contemporary writer In the treatment of Modern History the advance has been equally striking An historical sense, so to speak, has grown up A writer of any period of modern history is now expected to produce in support of his facts the testimony of credible contemporary witnesses, while the public records of most of the great European nations, now rendered accessible to students, have imposed upon historians a labour, and opened sources of information, quite unknown to Hume, Robertson, and the historical writers of the preceding century.

§ 3 The most eminent English writers upon Ancient History are BISHOP THRELWALL (1797-1875) and GEORGE GROTE (1794-1871), both of whom have produced Histories of Greece far superior to any existing in other European languages. DR. THOMAS ARNOLD (1795-1842), Head-Master of Rugby School, wrote a History of Rome in three volumes (1836-40-42), which was broken off, by his death, at the end of the Second Punic War. This work is chiefly valuable as a popular exhibition of Niebuhr's views, and is written in clear and masculine English. Dr. Arnold also published some Introductory Lectures on Modern History (1842), which display more independence of thought. He was also the author of several theological works, which exercised great influence upon his generation. The most formidable opponent of Niebuhr's views was SIR GEORGE CORNWALL-Lewis (1806-1863), equally remarkable as a statesman and a scholar, and whose untimely death the country still mourns. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, and, after holding the office of Poor-Law Commissioner and other public appointments, he became Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1855. Subsequently he was Secretary of State for the Home Department, and finally Secretary of State for War, which latter office he held at the time of his death (April 13, 1863). Sir George Lewis's most important historical work is An Inquiry into the Credibility of the early Roman History, published in 1855. While rejecting with Niebuhr the received narrative of early Roman history, Sir George Lewis attacks the defective method adopted by the German historian in attempting to reconstruct this portion of Roman history. He observes that Niebuhr, "instead of employing those tests of credibility which are consistently applied to modern history, attempts to guide his judgment by the indications of internal evidence, and assumes that the truth can be discovered by an occult faculty of historical divination." It would not be within the province of the present work to discuss this question, but it cannot admit of doubt that Sir George has rendered an important service to historical investigations, and that the principles which he has laid down are in the main correct. Sir George Lewis was also the author of many valuable political works, of which the most important are A Treatise on the Method of Observation and Reasoning in Politics, The Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, and The Use and Abuse of Political Terms.

§ 4. The most illustrious recent writer upon modern history is

THOMAS BARRINGTON MACAULAY (1800-1859), born October 25, 1800. He was the son of Zachary Macaulay, an ardent philanthropist, and one of the earliest opponents of the slave trade. Educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which College he became a Fellow, and called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, he suddenly achieved a literary reputation by an article on Milton in the Edinburgh Review in 1825. This was the first of a long series of brilliant literary and historical essays which he contributed to the same periodical. He entered Parliament in 1830, and was almost immediately acknowledged to be one of the first orators in the House. He went to India in 1834 as a Member of the Council in Calcutta and as President of the Law Commission. Soon after his return he was elected by the city of Edinburgh as their representative in Parliament (1840), and became successively Secretary at War and Paymaster of the Forces. He lost his election in 1847, in consequence of opposing the religious prejudices of his constituents, and from this time he devoted all his powers to the undivided cultivation of letters. Although he sat in Parliament again from 1852 to 1856, he took little part in the debates of the House. He was raised to the peerage in 1857, and died on December 28, 1859.

Macaulay is distinguished as a Poet, an Essayist, and an Historian. His Lays of Ancient Rome are the best known of his poems, but the lines which he wrote upon his defeat at Edinburgh in 1847, and in which he turns for consolation to literature, are, in our judgment, the finest of all his poetical pieces. His Essays and his History will, in virtue of their inimitable style, always give Macaulay a high place among English classics. His style has been well characterized by a friendly but discerning critic — "It was eminently his own, but his own not by strange words, or strange collocation of words, by phrases of perpetual occurrence, or the straining after original and striking terms of expression. Its characteristics were vigour and animation, copiousness, clearness, above all, sound English, now a rare excellence. The vigour and life were unabating, perhaps in that conscious strength which cost no exertion he did not always gauge and measure the force of his own words. Those who studied the progress of his writing might perhaps see that the full stream, though it never stagnated, might at first overflow its banks, in later days it ran with a more direct undivided torrent. His copiousness had nothing tumid, diffuse, Asiatic, no ornament for the sake of ornament. As to its clearness, one may read a sentence of Macaulay twice to judge of its full force, never to comprehend its meaning. His English was pure, both in idiom and in words, pure to fastidiousness, not that he discarded, or did not make free use of the plainest and most homely terms (he had a sovereign contempt for what is called the dignity of history, which would keep itself above the vulgar tongue), but every word must be genuine English, nothing that approached real vulgarity, nothing that had not the stamp of popular use, or the authority of sound English writers, nothing unfamiliar to the common ear" *.

Macaulay's Essays are philosophical and historical disquisitions, embracing a vast range of subjects; but the larger number and the most important relate to English History. Two Essays, however, were only preparatory to his great work on the History of England, which he had intended to write from the accession of James II. to the time immediately preceding the French Revolution. But of this subject he lived to complete only a portion. The two first volumes, published in 1849, contain the reign of James II and the Revolution of 1688, two more, which appeared in 1855, bring down the reign of William III to the peace of Ryswick in 1697 while a fifth, published in 1861, after the author's death, nearly completes the history of that reign. Macaulay, in a Review of Sir James Macintosh's History of the Revolution, observed that "a History of England, written throughout in this manner, would be the most fascinating book in the language. It would be more in request at the circulating libraries than the last novel." The unparalleled popularity of Macaulay's own History verified the prediction. In a still earlier Essay he had remarked that we had good historical romances and good historical essays, but no good histories, and it cannot be denied that he has, to a great extent, attained his ideal of a perfect history, which he defines to be "a compound of poetry and philosophy, impressing general rules on the mind by a vivid representation of particular characters and incidents."

§ 5 The other great writer on modern history in the present century, superior in judgment to Macaulay, though inferior in graces of style, is HENRY HALLAM (1777-1859). He was born at Windsor, July 9, 1777, the only son of a Canon of Windsor and Dean of Wells. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, and practised at the bar for a few years, but having an ample income, which was augmented by his being appointed one of the Commissioners of Audit, he withdrew from the profession of the law, and devoted himself entirely to literature. He was one of the early contributors to the Edinburgh Review, and his criticism in that Journal in 1803 of Sir Walter Scott's edition of Dryden's works was marked by that power of discrimination and impartial judgment which characterized all his subsequent writings. As one of the Edinburgh Reviewers, he was pilloried by Lord Byron—

"And classic Hallam, much renown'd for Greek."

Mr. Hallam was an excellent classical scholar, and to his knowledge of antiquity he added an accurate and profound acquaintance with the language, literature, history, and institutions of the chief nations of modern Europe. The result of his long-continued studies first appeared fully in his View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages, published in 1818, and exhibiting, in a series of historical dissertations, a comprehensive survey of the chief circumstances that can interest a philosophical inquirer during the period usually denominated the Middle Ages. Mr Hallam's next work was The Constitutional History of England from the Accession of Henry VII to the death of George II., published in 1827, and his third great production was An Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries, which appeared in 1837-39. Mr Hallam's latter years were saddened by the loss of his two sons, the eldest of whom formed the subject of Tennyson's In Memoriam. The historian himself died January 21, 1859.

* Dean Milman's Memoir of Lord Macaulay, p. 12.

An estimate of Hallam's literary merits has been given by Macaulay, his illustrious contemporary, in a review of the Constitutional History.—"Mr Hallam is, on the whole, far better qualified than any other writer of our time for the office which he has undertaken. He has great industry and great acuteness. His knowledge is extensive, various, and profound. His mind is equally distinguished by the amplitude of its grasp, and by the delicacy of its tact. His speculations have none of that vagueness which is the common fault of political philosophy. On the contrary, they are strikingly practical, and teach us not only the general rule, but the mode of applying it to solve particular cases. In this respect they often remind us of the Discourses of Machiavelli. The manner of the book is, on the whole, not unworthy of the matter. The language, even when most faulty, is weighty and massive, and indicates strong sense in every line. It often rises to an eloquence, not florid or impassioned, but high, grave, and sober, such as would become a State paper, or a judgment delivered by a great magistrate, a Somers or a D'Aguesseau. In this respect the character of Mr Hallam's mind corresponds strikingly with that of his style. His work is eminently judicial. The whole spirit is that of the bench, not that of the bar. He sums up with a calm, steady impartiality, turning neither to the right nor to the left, glossing over nothing, exaggerating nothing, while the advocates on both sides are alternately biting their lips to hear their conflicting misstatements and sophisms exposed. On a general survey, we do not scruple to pronounce the Constitutional History the most impartial book that we have ever read."

§ 8 The theological and religious literature of this age is marked by a less metaphysical character than that of former times. Works of a controversial kind have been fewer, while greater attention has been paid to exegetical studies. The practical and homiletical works have been very numerous. The array of Sermons which the last 60 years have seen published is appalling, and if the good accomplished has been proportioned to the number of tracts and sermons issued, there must certainly have been an effect which should cheer the believer in human progress. Space forbids even a mention of the Societies whose special work is the publication of religious literature, of which many were founded in the present century, and all have received their greatest success in the present age. Many of the best known religious writers have won their chief literary honours in the other fields of criticism, history, or philosophy, and will receive notice there. The three most distinguished theological writers are perhaps Hall, Foster, and Chalmers.

ROBERT HALL (1764-1831) was born at Arnsby, near Leicester, the son of a Baptist minister of that place. After studying first at a dissenting academy at Bristol, and afterwards at Aberdeen, he became a minister successively of the Baptist Churches at Bristol, Cambridge, and Leicester, and finally at Bristol for a second time, where he died, February 21, 1831. Mr Hall was without doubt the "prince-of-modern-preachers." With his eloquence and fervour were united a scholarship and intellectual vigour not often found in the pulpit. His style was chaste, polished, and refined. His great Sermons were on Modern Infidelity (1799), Reflections on War (1802), and The Sentiments proper to the present Crisis (1803).

JOHN FOSTER (1770-1843), like his friend Robert Hall, was a minister among the Baptists, but was never celebrated as a preacher, though his writings, in the form of literary and religious essays, are among the most valuable additions to English literature. In his Essays the energy and force of the thought are only equalled by the beauty of the expression. There is a manly tone about everything he wrote. With less impassioned eloquence than Hall, he has more intellectual vigour.

THOMAS CHALMERS (1780-1847) was born at Anstruther, Fife-shire, and educated for the Scotch Church at the University of St. Andrew's. In 1803 he became minister at Kilmany, whence in 1815 he removed to St John's, Glasgow. In 1823 he was appointed Professor of Moral Philosophy at St Andrew's, and in 1828 Professor of Divinity at Edinburgh. In 1843 he headed the secession from the Scotch Church, and remained the most eminent of the Free Church ministers until his death in 1847. In the pulpit Chalmers reigned supreme. Though his manner was rough, and his accent broadly Scotch, the impassioned earnestness, the thorough abandon of the preacher overcame these drawbacks, and enabled him to thrill his audience with something of the emotion which possessed himself

His writings embrace a great variety of subjects, and all are treated ably by his capacious intellect, but he is not the leader of a school. He established no great principle. He added nothing to divinity, science, or philosophy. He shone not with the blazo of the meteor, or the self-radiance of a sun, but he was the brightest star amongst the other constellations that shone around him. His style was incorrect and often awkward, but there is at times a grandeur of language that bears away the most fastidious critic. The hold he took of a subject was like the grip of a bulldog. He never let it go. He turned it this side and that, holding it up in every light, adorning it with every fancy and illustration. It stood forth before the hearer or reader as clearly as before the preacher or writer.

§ 7 In philosophy a large number of contributions to our literature has been made during the period under our consideration. Though perhaps there has been but little original speculation, and no great discovery in mental science, the investigation of metaphysical phenomena has been profound and accurate. Philosophy has not passed through a crisis, but it has made a brilliant and yet secure advance. The scope of this work forbids a notice of living writers, otherwise we might refer to some names, such as VHEWELL and MILL, whose analysis and investigations, more especially in the systems of inductive science, have had none to compare with them since the great work of Bacon, while in the more direct examination of mental phenomena the Scotch school has had some of its ablest members in the present era, and the materialist schools of different colour have found their strongest advocates and expounders in writers, many of whom are still living. The influence of Germany has been felt in no department of our literature so greatly as here. The followers of Reid owe no little to the writings of Kant, while the idealists of England have borrowed no little of the truth they hold from the profound though the very obscure speculations of Hegel. The study of logic in England proper has been revived almost within our own memory and the once neglected studies have emerged from their misapprehension and obloquy, and are rapidly gaining in the universities their proper position abreast of classics and mathematics.

SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON (1788-1856), the son of Dr Hamilton of Glasgow, was educated at Oxford, and called to the bar in 1813. He became Professor of Universal History at Edinburgh in 1821, and in 1836 obtained the Chair of Logic and Metaphysics, which he occupied until his death. His chief works were essays in the Edinburgh Review, collected as Discussions on Philosophy, &c (1852), and An Edition of Reid, with Dissertations. His Lectures have been published since his death, under the editorship of Mr Mansel and Mr Veitch. Sir William Hamilton was without doubt the greatest philosopher of his age. He founded his system on consciousness, following Reid more than any other master, and guiding his speculations by Aristotle and Kant. This is not the place for a discussion of his philosophical views, but he has done much, perhaps more than any other English writer, to raise philosophical studies in this country. His style is a model of philosophical writing. It is clear, capricious, and appropriate. It neither perplexes by technicalities nor misleads by figure and illustration. It has been well said of his diction that it fills others with the "desire and despair of writing like a philosopher".

ARCHBISHOP WHATELY (1787-1863), the son of Dr Whately of Nonsuch Park, Surrey, was born in London, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford. Having entered the Church, he became Rector of Halesworth in 1822, Principal of St Alban's Hall in 1825, then Professor of Political Economy, and in 1831 was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Dublin. His first publications were, in 1821, three sermons on the Christian's Duty with respect to the Government, followed by his Bampton Lectures and, in 1826 and 1828, by his Logic and Rhetoric. To enumerate all the publications of this diligent writer would not be possible in this sketch. The chief were his essays on New Testament Difficulties (1828), the Sabbath, and Romanism, which were produced together two years later. His lectures on Political Economy appeared in 1831, and later he published other works on social and economical questions.

Whately had a mind of great logical power, with little imagination or fancy. His clear unanswerable arguments produce conviction in his readers. He says of himself that he was personally of no influence among men, but he was able so conclusively to exhibit his processes of reasoning and arguments, that he produced a great impression upon the circles which they affected. His views of questions are often shallow, but always practical. His style is luminous, easy, and well adorned with every-day illustrations. A moralist of much higher tone than Paley,—which fact arose from the general spirit of his time,—he is the best representative of Paley in the present age. He is, as Paley was, clear rather than profound, vigorous rather than subtle, with little speculation he unites much practical sense.

§ 8 A very important portion of modern literature embraces those subjects which have reference to physical science. Our forefathers were more satisfied with reasons than with facts. The aim of modern investigators is to discover what is hidden in nature, rather than, by a course of deductive reasoning from pre-established principles, to display what ought to be found in nature. The inductive method of Bacon has never been so carefully applied and diligently followed as in the scientific researches of the nineteenth century, and the advance of physical science has therefore been more rapid.

than that of any other branch of human knowledge. Some of the greatest writers on physical science are still alive, and many of them will deserve a place in English literature on account of the style of their writings, such as HENSCHKE, LYELL, FARADAY, OWEN, and HUXLEY. One of the most popular, who has died within the last few years, was HUGH MILLER (1802-1856), the eminent geologist. He spent the early portion of his life in the quarries of his native town of Cromarty in the north of Scotland, but by self-study and diligent application he rose from manual to mental labour, and after a few publications—Poems, &c. (1829), Letters on the Herring Fishery, &c.—he became editor of the Witness, a biweekly newspaper. He had meantime devoted himself to geology, and in 1841 appeared his Old Red Sandstone, and in 1850 another geological work, entitled Footprints of the Creator. He published an autobiography, in 1854, My Schools and Schoolmasters, and since his death there have appeared The Cruise of the Betsy, a Summer Ramble among the Fossiliferous Deposits of the Hebrides (1858), and Lectures on Geology, delivered before the Philosophical Institution at Edinburgh. There is no writer who has done more for the spread of geological knowledge than Hugh Miller. His earnest, manly spirit, his lively style, and his religious character, won him a hearing in his native land among every rank and condition in society. His Testimony of the Rocks, completed but not published during his life, is full of some of the most poetic and eloquent passages in the English language.

§ 9 No review is here required of the fictitious literature of the age, as that has already been treated at length in the preceding chapter. We therefore now pass on to the most important and most extensive of the prose writings of the nineteenth century,—namely, those which are for the most part found scattered in magazines and serials, and which embrace the critical essays and other compositions on social, political, and moral subjects. The increased facilities of printing and a larger class of readers have combined to render the “periodicals” the great feature of the age. These range from the valuable quarterlies, through the various forms of magazine and review, down to the daily paper, the peculiar feature of the literature of the times. Some of the most valuable of our essays have been contributed to these magazines. Every shade of politics, every school of philosophy, every sect of religion, has its paper or its magazine. The events of the day, the deliberations and acts of the government, the condition of society, the progress of commerce, the works of art, and the discoveries of science, are thus placed under constant and argus-eyed surveillance. Perhaps the cheap daily paper is the wonder of the age. What a marvel of literary skill is the Times! and very little inferior are the other chief newspapers. No feature is so striking in this class of writings as the real worth and ability displayed in many of the articles of the periodicals. The criticism of the day shows a great improvement in conception and views upon those of past generations. To give a history of all these periodicals is of course impossible, but the establishment of the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews imparted such an impulse to literature as to demand a few words.

The Edinburgh Review was established in 1802 by a small party of young men, obscure at that time, but ambitious and enterprising, who were all destined to attain a high degree of distinction. It founded its claim to success upon the boldness and vivacity of its tone, its total rejection of all precedent and authority, and the audacity with which it discussed questions previously held to be "hedged in" with the "divinity" of prescription. The Edinburgh was an absolute literary Fronde, and its founders—Brougham, Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, Francis Horner—were soon convinced that they had not erred in calculating upon an extraordinary degree of success. The criticisms (many of which were retrospective, that is, discussing the merits of past eras in the history and literature of England and other countries) were marked by a singular boldness and pungency, and in contemporary and local subjects the Review exhibited a power and extent of vision which made its appearance an era in journalism. It was conducted from 1802 to 1829 by FRANCIS JEFFREY (1773-1850), a Scotch advocate, who was subsequently raised to the bench. He wrote a large number of critical articles, marked by good taste and discrimination, the most important of which were republished by him in a collected form in 1844. Another of the most important of the early contributors to the Review, and who indeed edited the first number, was SYDNEY SMITH (1771-1845), an English clergyman, and in the later period of his life Canon of St Paul's. He wrote chiefly upon political and practical questions with a richness of comic humour, and an irresistible dry sarcasm, employed generally in exhaustive reasoning—in the reductio ad absurdum—which is not only exquisitely amusing, but is full of solid truth as well as pleasantry.

§ 10 The influence which the Edinburgh Review soon acquired was exercised in favour of political principles opposed to those of the existing administration, and its authority in matters of literature and taste became almost paramount. Under these circumstances the late Mr Murray, after consulting Mr. Canning and other distinguished politicians and men of letters, determined in 1809 to start a new review to counteract the danger of those liberal opinions which seemed to be menacing the very integrity of the Constitution. This new periodical, which was called The Quarterly Review, was warmly welcomed by the friends of the government, and immediately obtained a literary reputation at least equal to that of the Edinburgh. The editorship of it was entrusted to WILLIAM GIFFORD (1757-1826), the translator of Juvenal (1802), and the author of the David (1794) and Martin (1795), two of the most bitter, powerful, and relentless literary satires which modern days have produced. Gifford was a self-taught man, who had raised himself, by dint of almost superhuman exertions and admirable integrity, to a high place among the literary men of his age. Distinguished as a satirist, as a translator of satires, and as the editor of several of the illustrious but somewhat neglected dramatists of the Elizabethan age, his writings, admirable for sincerity, good sense, and learning, were also strongly tinged with bitterness and personality.

Gifford was succeeded in the editorship of the Quarterly, after a short interregnum, by JOHN GIBSON LOCKHART (1794-1854), a man of undoubted genius, the author of several novels which have been already mentioned, and one of the earliest and ablest contributors to Blackwood's Magazine. He was born in 1794, in Lanarkshire, and was educated at Oxford, where he took a first class in classics. He possessed a clear, penetrating intellect, and under his editorship, which continued from 1826 to 1853, the reputation of the Quarterly was not only maintained, but augmented. Many of the ablest articles were written by himself, and those which combine the biography and criticism of distinguished authors are unsurpassed by anything of the kind in the English language. In 1820 he married the eldest daughter of Sir Walter Scott, and in 1837-39 he published the charming Life of his father-in-law. In biography he was unrivalled, and his Life of Napoleon, which appeared without his name, is far superior to many more ambitious performances.

§ 11 The same reasons which led to the establishment of the Quarterly Review in London, induced another enterprising publisher to start, in the city in which the Edinburgh Review exercised undivided sway, a periodical which might serve as an organ of Toryism in Scotland. Blackwood's Magazine first appeared in 1817, and was distinguished by the ability of its purely literary articles, as well as by the violence of its political sentiments. Among the many able men who wrote for it, two stood pre-eminent, John Wilson and John Gibson Lockhart. Of the latter we have already spoken in connexion with the Quarterly Review, the former, upon whom fell the chief burthen of the magazine after Lockhart's removal to London, must not be dismissed without a short notice. JOHN WILSON (1785-1854) was born in Paisley, May 18, 1785, the son of a wealthy merchant. After studying at Oxford, he took up his abode on the banks of the Windermere, attracted thither by the society of Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, and other eminent men. Wilson was an ardent admirer of Wordsworth, whose style he adopted, to some extent, in his own poems, the Isle of Palms (1812), and The City after the Plague (1816). The year before the publication of the latter poem, Wilson had been compelled, by the loss of his fortune, to remove to Edinburgh, and to adopt literature as a profession. Though Mr Blackwood was the editor of his own magazine, Wilson was the presiding spirit, and under the name of Christopher North and other pseudonyms, he poured forth article after article with exuberant fertility. His Noctes Ambrosianæ, in which politics, literary criticism, and fun, were intermingled, enjoyed extraordinary popularity. His novels likewise were eagerly read (see p 495). In 1820 he was elected Professor of Moral Philosophy at Edinburgh. He died April 2, 1854. "With respect to Wilson's merits as a writer, a variety of judgments will be formed. His poetry can never, in our opinion, take a foremost place among English classics. His prose tales, Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life, The Trials of Margaret Lindsay, The Foresters, etc., had their day. Probably no man, living or dead, could have written them except himself, yet we doubt whether they will find many readers a dozen years hence. Of his criticism, likewise, we are constrained to observe that it is at all times the decision of an impulsive rather than of a judicial mind. But far above all his contemporaries, and, indeed, above writers of the same class in any age, he soars as a rhapsodist. As Christopher North, by the loch, or on the moors, or at Ambrose's, he is the most gifted and extraordinary being that ever wielded pen. We can compare him, when such fits are on, to nothing more aptly than to a huge Newfoundland dog, the most perfect of its kind, or, better still, to the 'Beautiful Leopard from the valley of the Palm-trees,' which, in sheer wantonness and without any settled purpose, throws itself into a thousand attitudes, always astonishing and often singularly graceful."*

§ 12 It would be impossible in our limits to give an account of the many other writers who distinguished themselves by their contributions to the Reviews and Magazines, but in addition to those already mentioned two essayists stand forth pre-eminent—Charles Lamb and Thomas De Quincey.

CHARLES LAMB (1775-1834) is one of the most admirable of those humorists who form the peculiar feature of the literature, as the ideas they express are the peculiar distinction of the character, of the English people. He was born February 18, 1775, in the Temple, where his father was clerk to one of the Benchers, and was educated at Christ's Hospital. He was essentially a Londoner:

* Quarterly Review, No 225, p 240

London life supplied him with his richest materials, and yet his mind was so imbued, so saturated with our older writers, that he is original by the mere force of self-transformation into the spirit of the older literature he was, in short, an old writer, who lived by accident a century or two after his real time. Wordsworth is peculiarly the poet of solitary rural nature, Lamb drew an inspiration as true, as delicate, as profound, from the city life in which he lived, and from which he never was for a moment removed but with pain and a yearning to come back. In him the organ of locality must have been enormously developed. "his household gods planted a terribly fixed foot, and were not to be rooted up without blood." During the early and greater part of his life, Lamb, poor and unfriended, was drudging as a clerk in the India House, and it was not till late in life that he was unshackled from the desk. Yet in this, the most monotonous and unideal of all employments, he found means to fill his mind with the finest aroma of our older authors, particularly of the prose writers and dramatists of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and in his earliest compositions, such as the drama of John Woodvil, and subsequently in the Essays of Elia, although the world at first perceived a mere imitation of their quaintness of expression, there was, in reality, a revival of their very spirit. The Essays of Elia, contributed by him at different times to the London Magazine, are the finest things, for humour, taste, penetration, and vivacity, which have appeared since the days of Montaigne. Where shall we find such intense delicacy of feeling, such unimaginable happiness of expression, such a searching into the very body of truth, as in these unpretending compositions? A chance word, dropped half by accident, a parenthesis, an exclamation, often let us into the very mechanism of the sentiment—admit us, as it were, behind the scenes. The style has a peculiar and most subtle charm, not the result of labour, for it is found in as great perfection in his familiar letters—a certain quaintness and antiquity, not affected in Lamb, but the natural garb of his thoughts. This arises partly from the saturation of his mind with the rich and solid reading in which he delighted, and partly, but in a much higher degree, from the sensibility of his mind. The manure was abundant, but the soil was also of a "Sicilian fruitfulness." As in all the true humorists, his pleasantry was inseparably allied with the finest pathos—the merry quip on the tongue was but the commentary on the tear which trembled in the eye. He possessed the power, which is seen in Shakespeare's Fools, of conveying a deep philosophical verity in a jest—of uniting the wildest merriment with the truest pathos and the deepest wisdom. It is not only the easy laugh of Touchstone in the forest of Arden, but the heart-rending pleasantry of Lear's Fool in the storm. The inspiration that other poets find in the mountains, in the forest, in the sea, Lamb could draw from the crowd of Fleet-street, from the remembrances of an old actor, from the benchers of the Temple. In his poems, also, so few in number and so admirable in originality, we have the quintessence of familiar sentiment, expressed in the diction of Herbert, Wither, and the great dramatists.

Lamb was the schoolfellow, the devoted admirer and friend of Coleridge, and perhaps there never was an individual so loved by all his contemporaries, by men of every opinion, of every shade of literary, political, and religious sentiment, as this great wit and amiable man. The passionate enemy of everything like cant, commonplace, or conventionality, his writings derive a singular charm, a kind of fresh and wild flavour, from his delight in paradox. The man himself was full of paradox and his punning repartees, delivered with all the pangs of stuttering, often contained a decisive and unanswerable settlement of the question. In his drama of John Woodvil he endeavoured to revive the forms of the Elizabethan drama, and the work might be mistaken for some woodland play of Heywood or Shirley. But it was his Specimens of the Old English Dramatists which showed what treasures of the richest poetry lay concealed in the unpublished, and in modern times unknown, writers of that wonderful age, whose fame had been eclipsed by the glory of some two or three names of the same period. In the few lines, often only the few words, of criticism in which Lamb sketched the characters of the dramatists (with whose writings, from the greatest to the least, from Shakspeare down to Broome or Tournour, no man was over more familiar), we see perpetual examples of the delicacy and penetration of his critical faculty.

Lamb's mind, in its sensitiveness, in its mixture of wit and pathos, was eminently Shakspearian, and his intense and reverent study of the works of Shakspeare doubtless gave a tendency to this. The glow of his humour was too pure and steady not to have been reflected from the sun. In his poems, as for instance the Farewell to Tobacco, the Old Familiar Faces, and his few but beautiful sonnets, we find the very essence and spirit of this quaint tenderness of fancy, the simplicity of the child mingled with the learning of the scholar.

Among the Essays of Elia are several little narratives, generally visions and parables, inexpressibly simple and beautiful. The one named Dream-Children, and another entitled The Child-Angel, are worthy of Jean Paul himself while the little tale Rosamond Gray is perhaps one of the most imitable gems ever produced in that difficult style.

§ 13 Perhaps the greatest master of English prose in the present century, not excepting even Macaulay, is THOMAS DE QUINCEY (1785-1859). He was born of wealthy parents near Manchester, August 15, 1785, and in his Confessions of an English Opium-Eater he has left us an extraordinary account of his early life, in which, however, there is clearly a mixture of Dichtung and Wahrheit. As an undergraduate at Oxford, he was remarkable for his extraordinary stock of knowledge upon every subject that was started in conversation, but even at that period he had commenced taking large doses of opium. After leaving Oxford he settled at Grasmere, but resided during the latter part of his life at Glasgow and Edinburgh. He died December 8, 1859. Upon De Quincey's position in the literature of the present day an able critic observes—"De Quincey's mind never wholly recovered from the effects of his eighteen years' indulgence in opium. He himself says, half jocularly, but apparently quite truly, that it is characteristic of the opium-eater never to finish anything. He himself never finished anything, except his sentences, which are models of elaborate workmanship. But many of his essays are literally fragments, while those which are not generally convey the impression of being mere prolegomena to some far greater work of which he had formed the conception only. Throughout his volumes, moreover, we find allusions to writings which have never seen the daylight. And finally, there is The Great Unfinished, the De Emendatione Humani Intellectus, to which he had at one time devoted the labour of his whole life. It is in fact the one half-melancholy reflection which his career suggests, that a man so capable as he was of exercising a powerful influence for good upon the political and religious thought of the present age, should have comparatively wasted his opportunities, and left us his most precious ideas in the condition of the Sibyl's leaves after they had been scattered by the wind. Hence those who approach him with any serious purpose are only too likely to come away disappointed. It is, therefore, rather on his style, at once complex and harmonious, at once powerful and polished, than on the substance of his works, that his posthumous fame will be dependent. The extraordinary compass and unique beauty of his diction, accommodating itself without an effort to the highest flights of imagination, to the minutest subtleties of reasoning, and to the gayest vagaries of humour, are by themselves indeed a sure pledge of a long if not undying reputation."*

De Quincey's writings have been collected in fourteen volumes. The best known is the Confessions of an English Opium-Eater, published in 1821, in which the language frequently soars to astonishing heights of eloquence. Of his historical essays and narratives,

* Quarterly Review, No 219, pp. 15, 16

the finest is his Flight of the Kalmuck Turbans, which is equal, in many passages, to the English Opium-Eater. His literary criticisms, both upon English and German writers, are very numerous, but cannot be further noticed here. Some of his essays are almost exclusively humorous, among which Murder considered as one of the Fine Arts is the best known. The critic whom we have already quoted, thus sums up Do Quincey's literary merits — "A great master of English composition, a critic of uncommon delicacy, an honest and unflinching investigator of received opinions, a philosophic inquirer, second only to his first and sole hero (Coleridge) Do Quincey has left no successor to his rank. The exquisite finish of his style, with the scholastic rigour of his logic, form a combination which centuries may never reproduce, but which every generation should study as one of the marvels of English literature."

§ 14 One of the studies peculiar to the present century has been that of political economy. Adam Smith has been well called the creator of the science, and his followers in the present age have exercised no small influence in moulding the character of public opinion and in controlling the course of public events. RICARDO, SENIOR, MACCULLOCH, and MILL, are writers whose place in a history of literature would perhaps be small, but whose influence on politics and commerce have been so great, that it would be a serious omission not to call the attention of the student to their works. The most important writer upon ethics, jurisprudence, and political economy is undoubtedly JEREMY BENTHAM (1748-1832). He was the son of a solicitor in London, was educated at Oxford, and called to the bar, but did not pursue it as a profession. For half a century Bentham was the centre of a small but influential circle of philosophical writers, and was the founder of what is called the utilitarian school. In one of his earliest works he laid down the principle that "utility was the measure and test of all virtue," and the fundamental principle of his philosophy was, that happiness is the end and test of all morality. It is, however, as a writer on jurisprudence that his fame rests, and almost all the improvements in English law that have since been carried into effect may be traced either directly or indirectly, to his exertions.

§ 15 THOMAS CARLYLE (1795-1881) was the son of "James Carlyle, Mason," of Ecclefechan, a Border village in Dumfriesshire, and many of the singularities of this singular genius may, we suspect, be traced to the fact that, like his own Zethen, he was "a rugged son of the moorlands, nourished, body and soul, on frugal oatmeal, with a large sprinkling of fire and iron thrown in." The proofs of special ability that he gave when still a boy tempted his father, a man of sterling worth and much revered by his son, to put him in the way of getting the best education that Scotland afforded, and at Annan School and Edinburgh University the lad and youth gathered in a supply of miscellaneous knowledge of varying degrees of value. For twenty years after leaving the college he lived an unsettled life, having declined to enter the ministry, to which his father had destined him. He tried teaching at Annan and Kirkcaldy, and was for a time private tutor to the gifted young politician Charles Buller. He tried literature, and did some good journeyman work in it, translating Legendre's Geometry from the French, contributing biographical notices to the Edinburgh Encyclopedia, writing scraps of verse and papers for magazines. He tried farming, he sought professional appointments, visited London and Birmingham, but was long before he found the one thing he thought essential to earthly happiness, a life's work. For much of this time his prospects looked very dreary, disappointment and despondency clouded his spirits, and his temper became impatient, irritable, sarcastic, and censorious. But his heart was strong and sound throughout, his industry was as untiring, and he was irresistibly impelled into that career of creative activity, which he pursued with the happiest results. Three things of great interest or importance befel him in these years, he gained the lasting friendship of the brilliant Edward Irving, still memorable as a pulpit-orator and founder of the Irvingite or "Apostolic" Church, he wandered into German literature, and he married (1826) Miss Jane Welsh of Haddington, whose bright wit and graceful ways cheered his path and tempered his asperities for forty years.

His first considerable literary effort was a translation (1824) of the Wilhelm Meister of Goethe, whose merits Carlyle never through life wearied of preaching, and this was followed in 1825 by the Life of Schiller, to which succeeded in 1827 the Specimens of German Romance. He had now become known to Jeffrey, and was enrolled among the writers for the Edinburgh Review. Gradually, too, he was drifting into that eccentric style, so repellent to most educated persons, now known as Carlylese, his articles in the Review, many of which were on German subjects, became as time went on more and more markedly characteristic and unlike those of any other contributor. For more than seventeen years review-writing formed one of his regular employments, but his hitherto exclusive interest in things German had yielded in due course to the claims of French and English subjects, and his four volumes of Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, published long afterwards, are a collection of papers contributed to a variety of Magazines and Reviews, and by the characters of the subjects dealt with they make a continuous record of the greater literary designs he was engaged in from time to time.

The earliest work that stamped him in the eyes of the more sagacious as a nature of exceptional strength and intensity was Sartor Resartus, which, though written for publication as a book, had to be cut up (1833) for insertion in successive numbers of Fraser's Magazine, because no publisher would have anything to do with it. It was first raised to the dignity of a book in America, but had to wait until 1838 for similar distinction in England. Indeed the first clear glance of recognition and encouragement that fell upon him came from America.

But his real vocation was now determined, and in 1834 he left his moorland farm of Craigenputtock, came up to London, and fixed his abode at 5, Cheyne Row, Chelsea, where he was to live and work for wellnigh half a century. Struggle was not yet over, but he pinned his "desperate hope," as he called it, on The French Revolution, a History, on which he lavished, for a three years' space, his whole wealth of brain and heart, of vigilance and energy. The publication was delayed by a terrible mishap, through carelessness the MS of the first volume was allowed to be burnt, and it had to be written all over again entirely from memory. But in 1837 publication placed it beyond the reach of any similar misadventure. Social and political questions were always high, sometimes uppermost, in his thoughts, and two of his three next publications, Chartism (1839), Heroes and Hero-Worship (1841), and Past and Present (1843), gave utterance to sentiments and opinions in startling contrast to those held and maintained by any of the political parties. In the first he took a gloomy, almost despairing, view of the condition of the country, inveighed with force and fire against the courses then followed by statesmen, and propounded his own idea of a remedy for the evils of the time. In the third he drew from Jocelyn of Brakelond a loving and charmingly-tinted picture of society in the twelfth century, contrasted with this the society then under his eyes, and denounced its leading men and principles of action in a strain of indignant eloquence. His Heroes and Hero-Worship professes to be a report of a series of lectures on the characters and influence of great men, which he delivered to London audiences in 1840, and is an impressive embodiment of the splendid paradoxes on that subject, of which through life he was the consistent apostle.

From the roll of heroes glorified in these lectures his heart was attracted towards one by natural affinity, him he chose for special treatment, spent some years in hard study on a confused heap of materials, and brought out in 1846 his glorification of Cromwell in the work entitled Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches with Illustrations. By this time he had fallen into an attitude of pronounced antagonism to the general movement of his age, its aspirations, opinions, forms of thought, pursuits, principles, schemes, general works and ways stirred within him what Horace and Burke call "splendid bile" what he regarded as its hollowness, unreality, dishonesty, love of shams, of windy talk, of glitter and show, filled his soul with righteous scorn. At length his rage became uncontrollable, and after a premonitory demonstration in his Occasional Discourse on the Nigger Question (1849), he made, in 1850, a "furious raid," as Mr Arnold describes it, into "the field of political practice" with his Latter Day Pamphlets. For eight successive months, in stormful, yet sad and solemn language, he arraigned the whole character and conduct of the time. And the same note rings, though less loudly and fiercely, through his next work, the Life of John Sterling (1851), the loved friend of his riper years, once a shining figure in the intellectual society of London, "whose history," he tells us, was, "beyond others, emblematic of his time."

From these wasting denunciations his mind turned to an enterprise that proved the most laborious of his life, he valiantly buckled himself to the task of doing for the memory of Frederick the Great of Prussia the same service that he had done for Cromwell's. For a whole decade and more he toiled painfully to present to mankind a picture of the great but questionable German, that might wear the features of a hero and yet be not unfaithful to fact. The result was his largest work, the History of Friedrich II of Prussia, of which the first and second volumes appeared in 1858, the third in 1862, the fourth in 1864, and the fifth and sixth in 1865. The author's success in his primary aim is doubtful, no clear signs of a relenting feeling in men's minds towards King Frederick have yet shown themselves—at least educated sentiment has undergone no such revolution regarding his character as it certainly has regarding Cromwell's. Even on the question of the historical value and literary virtues of the work criticism gives us no hearty assurance. The author's mannerisms, as mannerisms are wont to do, had grown upon him with growing age. His style, peculiar, grotesque, puzzling, distracting as it is, sprang from no affectation, it is the natural clothing of such thoughts and feelings as Carlyle struggles to utter, it is the natural outcome of the man's character, and indeed an essential part of the man.

Carlyle's productive career practically ended in the same field where it had begun, for the history of the great German king proved to be his last, as the translation of a work of German genius had been his first grand literary publication. Yet the sixteen years of life that still remained to him were not eventless. In 1865 his University chose him its Lord Rector, and the address that he gave at his installation in the following year, describable as an abstract of the multifarious teachings of his previous works, created a kind of enthusiasm for him in the popular mind which has not been altogether sustained. A few weeks later Mrs Carlyle died suddenly in her carriage when driving in the park, and with her "the light of his life as if went out." The Reform Bill of 1868 roused him into another tempestuous protest against the political current of the time. In Shooting Niagara, and After?—he once more played the part of Cissandra with little perceptible decay of power. A marked falling off, however, was observed in the Early Kings of Norway (1875), though it turned out that this composition had been in MS for many years. Not much, we conceive, would have been lost to the author's reputation had it been left there. To the last he showed a keen, if sarcastic, interest in the things he professed to despise, "raying out," like Mirabeau's father, "curious observations on life" and public men, seldom flattering to either. His judgments on the latter were generally harsh, often unjust, long as he had lived, he had not learnt to do justice to his contemporaries. The burden of the world's mystery weighed heavily on his spirits, age charged many, even the most apparently radical, of his opinions, but did not mellow his nature—his biting tongue and his crabbed temper never left him. He died at Chelsea on the 4th of February, 1881, of mere physical decay. Not many weeks after his death his Reminiscences appeared, a portion of which had been written half a century before, but the greater part in 1867. This work has created a deep, but not altogether gratified, feeling in the public mind. Many passages in it are nothing short of deplorable.

§ 16 HENRY HART MILMAN, D.D. (1791-1868), Dean of St Paul's, was the youngest son of Sir Francis Milman, baronet, President of the College of Physicians. Born in London, February 10, 1791, he was educated at Eton and Brasenose College, Oxford, where, among other high university honours, his poetical taste was proved by his Newdigate Prize Poem on the "Apollo Belvedere." In 1815 he wrote Fazio, a Tragedy, which was acted without his consent at Bath and Covent Garden, while he was Vicar of St Mary's, Reading. This was followed by Samor, a religious epic founded on the legendary history of Britain (1818), a drama of high merit on The Fall of Jerusalem (1818), The Martyr of Antioch (1821), and two other dramatic poems. In 1821 he was appointed Professor of Poetry at Oxford, and a collected edition of his poems was published in 1840.

The poetic spirit is still to be traced in the vivid style of the historical works on which his permanent reputation rests, and which combine sound learning and diligent research with the grace of an accomplished writer. His History of the Jews (1829), provoked some hostility by a freedom of criticism which would now be deemed very moderate. (A new edition was published shortly before his death) In 1835 he was removed from Reading to the rectory of St Margaret's, Westminster In 1840 he published a History of Christianity from the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire In 1849 he was appointed Dean of St Paul's, and he produced his greatest work, The History of Latin-Christianity, in 1854-5. (A new edition, revised by him before his death, was published in 1872) Besides these works, he edited Gibbon's Decline and Fall, with elaborate Notes and Essays, 12 vols, 1838-9 (re-edited by Dr W Smith), and a splendidly illustrated edition of Horace, 1848, and he was a frequent contributor to the Quarterly Review Like his younger contemporary at Westminster, Dean Milman proved his deep interest in his cathedral by the Annals of St Paul's, published in the year of his death, 1868

§ 17 ARTHUR PENRYN STANLEY, D D (1815-1881), Dean of Westminster, was born on December 10th, 1815, at Alderley, Cheshire, the living of his father, the Rev Edward Stanley, younger brother of the first Lord Stanley of Alderley, and afterwards Bishop of Norwich, and a fast friend of Dr Arnold of Rugby, of whom Arthur Stanley became a favourite pupil Proceeding from Rugby to Balliol College in 1834, he entered on a brilliant career at Oxford, where he became Fellow and Tutor of University College, and resided for many years His place in literature was at once gained by his Life and Correspondence of Dr Arnold (1844), a biography as remarkable for literary skill as for devotion to the memory of the master and friend, whose influence moulded his whole career He was at this time a contributor to Dr William Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, and at a later period he enriched the Dictionary of the Bible with some characteristic articles His appointment as select preacher to the University (1845), gave the occasion for his Sermons and Essays on the Apostolical Age, the first of those works which displayed his special capacity for reproducing the scenes of sacred and ecclesiastical history in their living spirit, as he conceived it, and with the charm of pictorial vividness The same character was stamped on the four Essays, suggested by his association with Canterbury Cathedral as Canon (1851), on St Augustine, Thomas Becket, and the Black Prince, published under the title of Historical Memorials of Canterbury His peculiar power of "picturesque sensibility" (to use one of Lord Beaconsfield's happy phrases) was still more conspicuous in his Sinai and Palestine (1853), the fruit of a tour in Egypt and the Holy Land

Returning to Oxford as Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History, to which chair he was appointed in 1856, he delivered his Lectures on the Eastern Church (1859) in which the scenes of early Ecclesiastical History are made alive with his power of imagination and his personal knowledge of the East, and the controversies agitated at the great councils are dealt with in the fearless spirit of independence which marked his whole career as a leader of what is called the "Broad Church" party. Another fruit of his professorship was his volume of Lectures on the Jewish Church (1863).

In 1863 he was appointed to the Deanery of Westminster, and, while much that made him honourably conspicuous in that office would be out of place here, it is right to notice the wide sympathy with literature and science which he showed on the occasion of the funerals of such men as Grote, Herschel, and others, and the zeal for his Minster and its historical associations displayed in his Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey (1868, with a Supplement, 1869). To these works are to be added a Commentary on the Epistle to the Corinthians, and many sermons, lectures, and articles in reviews and magazines, on subjects which proved the comprehensive range of his sympathies. He died on the 18th of July, 1881, and was followed to his grave in Henry the VII's Chapel by a concourse attesting the love as well as admiration felt for him, alike by the Queen of England and men of all sects and parties.

§ 18 Foremost among the antagonists of Hamilton and Whately (see § 7), and perhaps a more successful leader of thought than either, was JOHN STUART MILL (1806-1873). Mill was the finest type of the indomitable intellect and fearless thinker that the current age has seen. His father, James Mill, still known as the historian of India and founder of an unspiritual philosophy, fashioned him almost from his cradle to be the apostle of pure reason, the finished incarnation of the logical faculty. From the hour of dawning intelligence he fed the intellect of the child with purely secular knowledge, leaving the seeds of feeling utterly untended, and jealously guarding the unfolding mind against the intrusion of religious influences. At eight the boy was deep in Greek, had besides other authors, read copiously in Herodotus, Plato, and Xenophon, and travelled well-nigh the whole circuit of English historians then in repute. His capacity of acquisition proved boundless, at fourteen his stores of knowledge had swelled to a portentous heap, he had grown familiar with the spacious literature of the intellect in Greek, Latin and English, and even made good progress in mathematics and experimental science. Though this preposterous education failed to make Mill a scholar, it forced, without enfeebling, his native faculty, and established industrious study as his habit and passion. A long visit to France, the sharpening experience of debating societies—of which one, the "Utilitarian," was founded and named by himself at sixteen—and other forms of mental discipline fixed the set given to his nature by his father's training, and fostered in him the faith that it was his destiny to be a grandly effective worker in the service of humanity. In 1823 he was admitted to a clerkship at the India House, where his father held an important post, and there showing a special talent for the finest kind of administrative work, he reached eventually an office of the highest trust, which secured to him the firm foothold on life essential to the success he sought. The bent of his genius was decided by the reading of Dumont's Traite de Legislation, or exposition of Bentham. In his own words this supplied him with "a creed, a doctrine, a philosophy—a religion," whose propagation he marked out for himself as his great task among men. And so swiftly did he fit himself for this office, that while yet scarce a stripling he was the hope of the "philosophic Radicals."

For a time he trod briskly in the path his father and expectant friends had traced for him, contributing papers of the desired character to the Westminster Review. But in a few years his nature instinctively swerved from the groove they would confine him to, a fretful discontent came over his spirit, and in this mood, falling in with the Memoires of Marmontel, he found himself awakened thereby to higher and wider aspirations. Poetry, especially the poetry of Wordsworth, won him with its charm—a fund of warm emotions revealed its existence within him, ceasing to be a mere intellectual machine, he nourished his heart with generous passion and robust sentiment. And a close friendship that he formed with John Sterling and Carlyle fanned the growing flame. Yet to the end the intellectual was the ruling force among his faculties, heated to the core though it often was by social and other enthusiasms.

By this time Mill had convinced himself that the scientific method was as obligatory on the single-minded inquirer into the principles of human conduct as it was in physics, and that by the employment of this method conclusions might be reached in morals and politics as certain, as little dashed with error, as were those of Kepler and Newton. Acting on this belief he took upon himself the office of setting men in the way of thinking correctly on their most vital concerns, and in his four years' editorship (1836-1840), of the London and Westminster Review, made this his special aim. His master-effort, however, towards this end was his powerful System of Logic (1843), on which he had laboured long. This, though his first, is still recognised as his greatest work. It is a miracle of stubborn and rigorous reasoning. It set upon a strong foundation its author's fame, and the principles of the philosophical school that his father had founded. This, known as the "Experience Philosophy," is the exact opposite of the intuitional system of Hamilton, for "it derives," as its expounder avows, "all knowledge from experience, and all moral and intellectual qualities from the direction given to the associations" As an exhaustive text-book of this school, Mill's Logic is hardly likely to be soon supplanted It was with the same view that Mill composed his second masterly work, the Principles of Political Economy (1848) Clearness, courage, and originality, distinguished this in as high a degree as the work on Logic, it was at once widely read, and its influence has proved itself as extensive as its popularity It still holds the first rank in the literature of economics And deservedly in Cairnes's opinion, "all that renders political economy a complete and well organized body of knowledge, has been the work of Mill"

Mill's later writings diffused rather than added to his fame These are somewhat numerous, the deposition of the Company from the Government of India, in 1858, having discharged him to a well-pensioned leisure for the rest of his life, which left him free to toil exclusively at his self-appointed function His little volume, entitled On Liberty (1859), is a fervent and stimulating appeal for the largest admissible measure of emancipation from restraint in the dealings of civilised men with one another In 1860 he published Representative Government In Utilitarianism (1861) he defends his cherished beliefs against the manifold attacks made upon them from various sides In the Examination of Sir W. Hamilton's Philosophy (1865), he seeks to carry by force of a fiery and dexterous logic the vital positions of the leading adversary of his philosophical tenets His Subjection of Women (1869) is a comprehensive arraignment of the existing status of the physically weaker sex, and a pleading for its elevation to an equality with that of men.

In 1865, he was drawn, by his unsolicited election for Westminster in the Liberal interest, into an active participation in public affairs, and was for three years a man of mark in Parliament, as an observant and intensely-interested debater, who was zealous for many things, in particular for the success of unfamiliar or distasteful schemes of reform, and corrective checks on the coming democracy Rejected, however, in 1868, he retired to his southern home near Avignon, and lived there till his death in 1873 A comparatively brief but most valuable Autobiography, and three essays—on Nature, Utility of Religion and Theism—which cannot be said to flood with light their several subjects, were given to the public after his death. These, with some volumes of Dissertations and Discussions, scattered papers recovered from reviews, complete the sum of Mill's contributions to our literature

Mill's place in the history of the human mind is a tolerably definite one It is that of an unshrinking and luminous expounder of a philosophy that subjects the mind of man to the same processes as are used in the investigation of external nature, and classes the manifestations of the human spirit with the phenomena of the material world, yet professes to educe from its principles rules of conduct that tend to the moral and social amelioration of the race. Mill is the accredited prophet of the "utilitarian school" of which his father, author of the Analysis of the Mind was the founder.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

OTHER PROSE WRITERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

WILLIAM WILBERFORCE (1759-1833) was born at Hull, and educated at Cambridge. He took a leading part in Parliament for the abolition of the Slave-trade, and deserves a notice in English Literature on account of his Practical View of Christianity, published in 1797, which had an immense sale, and exercised throughout the earlier part of the nineteenth century a great influence upon religious literature.

SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH (1765-1832) was born at Aldourie, on Loch Ness, Inverness-shire October 24 1765 and was educated at the Universities of Aberdeen and Edinburgh for the medical profession, but he soon abandoned medicine and maintained himself by literature in London. In 1791 he published his Indische Gallien a reply to Barthe on the French Revolution, a work which at once gained him a great reputation. In 1795 he was called to the bar, and four years afterwards he delivered, with great applause, in the hall of Lincoln's Inn, his lectures On the Law of Nature and Nations. He rose rapidly at the bar, and his speech in defence of Peltier (Feb. 21, 1803) who had been prosecuted for a libel on Bonaparte, then First Consul, placed him among the great orators of the age. In 1804 he was appointed Recorder of Bombay, and after spending seven years in India he returned to England, was made a Privy Counsellor, and in 1830 Commissioner for the Affairs of India. He died May 22, 1832. His principal works are, a Dissertation on Ethical Philosophy prefixed to the seventh edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica three volumes of a History of England, a Life of Sir Thomas More, in Lardner's Cyclopædia, and a fragment of a History of the Revolution of 1688 which was published in 1834. Everything which Sir James Mackintosh has written is pleasing, but nothing striking, and in a few years more his writings will probably be forgotten.

WILLIAM HAZLITT (1778-1830), son of a Unitarian minister, was born at Maidstone, April 10 1778 was educated as an artist, but lived by literature. He was one of the best critics in the earlier part of this century. His paradoxes are a little startling, and sometimes lead him astray, but there is a delicacy of taste, a richness of imagination and a perceptive power, that make him a worthy second to De Quincey. His style is vivid and picturesque, and his evolutions of character are clear. His chief works are Principles of Human Action, Characters of Shakespeare's Plays, Table Talk, Lectures on various authors, Essays on English novelists in the Edinburgh, and a Life of Napoleon in four volumes.

WILLIAM CORBETT (1782-1835) was a native of Farnham in Suffolk. From an agricultural labourer he became a soldier then a writer on political questions, and finally member of Parliament for Oldham. In his paper, called The Weekly Register, he attacked all sides with rancour and bitterness. His English is forcible and idiomatically. He published several other works of which his English Grammar most deserves mention.

JOHN WILSON CROKER (1780-1857), born in Galway, December 20, 1780, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He entered Parliament, and held the office of Secretary to the Admiralty from 1809 to 1830. He was one of the chief writers in the Quarterly Review. His Essays on the French Revolution, which originally appeared in that Review, have been republished in a separate form and exhibit a remarkable knowledge of that period of history. His principal work is an edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson which was criticised most severely, but most unfairly by Macanlay, in the Edinburgh Review. Croker also edited the Suffolk Papers, Lady Hervey's Letters, Lord Hervey's Memoirs of the Reign of George II., and Walpole's Letters to Lord Hertford.

The following historians deserve a brief notice —

JAMES MILL (1773-1836), a native of Montrose, rose to eminence as a writer in the leading periodicals of his time. His History of British India (1817-1818) is written with great impartiality and procured for the author a place in the India House. The Analysis of the Mind is a useful contribution to mental science, and has done much to illustrate the principle of association as one of the first general laws of mind.

DR. JOHN GILLIES (1747-1836) was born at Brechin in the county of Forfar Scotland, and succeeded Dr. Robertson as Historiographer Royal for Scotland. He published several historical works, of which his History of Greece is the best known.

WILLIAM MITFORD (1744-1827) born in London, February 10, 1744, was the eldest son of a country gentleman in Hampshire. He became captain in the same regiment of militia in which Gibbon was then major and the conversation of the latter probably strengthened in him the determination to become himself an historian. His History of Greece, though grossly unjust to the great leaders of the Athenian democracy had no small merits, and was far superior to that of Gillies, though it is now entirely superseded by the works of Thirlwall and Grote.

REV WILLIAM COKE (1747-1823) Archdeacon of Wilts wrote several works on various periods of modern history, such as the History of the House of Austria, History of the Kings of Spain of the House of Bourbon, Memoirs of the Duke of Marlborough, Sir Robert Walpole, &c. These works may still be consulted with advantage.

SHARON TURNER (1768-1847), a solicitor in London, wrote the History of the Anglo-Saxons, upon which his reputation chiefly rests. He continued the history of England down to the death of Elizabeth. He also published a Sacred History of the World.

DR. JOHN LINGARD (1771-1851) was born at Winchester and entered the Roman Catholic Church. His principal work is a History of England from the earliest times to 1688. He also wrote Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church (1809). Though his History is a valuable addition to our historical literature, he has allowed his religious views to colour his conclusions as an historian, and slightly warp his judgment.

PATRICK FRASER TITLER (1791-1849) born at Edinburgh, August 30, 1791, was the son of ALEXANDER FRASER TITLER (1747-1819), the author of Elements of General History a work which has gone through several editions. The son has written the best History of Scotland in the English language.

SIR WILLIAM NAPIER (1785-1860) born at Celbridge, in the county of Kildare, Ireland, was a distinguished officer in the Peninsular war but deserves mention here on account of his History of the War in the Peninsula and the South of France from the year 1807 to the year 1814 which is unquestionably the best military history in the English language. He had a thorough knowledge of the art of war had been present in many of the scenes which he describes, and possessing a lively imagination and great command of language, he brings the events vividly before the mind of the reader. This is his great work, but he also wrote a History of Sir Charles Napier's Administration of Sicily a Life of Sir Charles Napier &

CHAPTER XXV.

MORE RECENT WRITERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

- § 1. Introduction § 2 THOMAS LOVE PEACOCK § 3 CHARLES KINGSLEY
 § 4 JOHN RUSKIN § 5 JOHN HENRI NEWMAN § 6 EDWARD BOURNE PUSLEY § 7 RICHARD WILKINSON § 8 ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH § 9 MATTHEW ARNOLD § 10 SIR FRANCIS H. DOYLE, JOHN CAMERON SMITH § 11 ROBERT BROWNING § 12 ALFRED, LORD
 TENNYSON § 13 EDWARD ROBERT, EARL OF LYTON § 14 CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN § 15 SIR HENRY SUMNER MAINE § 16 SIR
 RICHARD OWEN § 17 Historians, SIR FRANCIS PALGRAVE § 18 JOHN
 RICHARD GREEN § 19 EDWARD AUGUSTUS FREEMAN

§ 1 Again has death supplied ample material for a fresh chapter * A distinguishing and most expressive feature of English literature in the ago that has just ended, is the unusually frequent combination in the same writer of excellence in both kinds of writing of a certainty no preceding age produced so many novelists, historians, theologians, critics and divines, who were poets also and writers of verse that must live This might seem extraordinary in a time of almost frenzied industry and unprecedented material expansion, yet is possibly but an inevitable outcome of this very portentous activity—the human spirit being doubtless incapable of making a remarkable advance even in the mechanical arts without generating the vital heat that creates poetry, and thus furnishing of itself the best corrective to its own temper Whatever the cause, the present chapter will give abundant proof of the fact

§ 2 Of such a composite nature THOMAS LOVE PEACOCK (1785–1866) is an interesting example Peacock was the son of a London merchant, and never went to a University, yet he had made himself, when still young, a deeply-read and discriminating proficient in the Greek and Latin classics, and familiar also with the literature of Italy and France Hence came his distinction of style and fame in English letters He first tried to move the public by poetry, but little notice was taken of either his Palmyra (1806) or Genius of the Thames (1810) Indirectly, however, these effusions were of service, the friendship with Shelley, which is now the chief feature of his history, and which has added so much to our knowledge of the poet, is clearly traceable to them The connexion began in 1812, and was maintained by personal intercourse or

* Some of the names given below were accidentally omitted in the previous chapter, to which they properly belong

correspondence till the death of Shelley. At this time Peacock lived much in North Wales, and thus provided the local colouring for some of his best work. In 1816 he published his first novel, Headlong Hall, a somewhat whimsical story, but well-stocked with the constituents of general satire. It was followed, two years later, by a better specimen of the same class, Nightmare Abbey, and by Rhododaphne, a classical poem that received a friend's review from Shelley, and is the best-esteemed of his longer efforts in verse. From 1819 till late in life he held appointments of delicate trust in the India House, but his handsome salary did not prevent him writing, among other works, his Maid Marian (1822)—and Crotchet Castle (1831), the latter undoubtedly the finest product of his genius. Then, after a virtual silence of nearly thirty years, broken only towards the end by some magazine articles, he gratified curious readers by one more publication, Gryll Grange (1861), a composition creditable to so old a man.

Peacock is a singular rather than a great writer, yet his singularity has the precise flavour that critical palates relish most. He could neither make a plot, create a character, nor give life to those already created for him, as Jonson was the dramatist, so he is the novelist, of "humours," of which his personages are generally attempted embodiments, his scenes appeal rather to the trained intellect generalized by culture, than to the general reader. But his workmanship—its grace and finish—his sallies of wit, his peculiar humour, combined with other admirable qualities to give his novels a native quality that is both exquisite and rare, and their value is heightened by the amusing caricatures of illustrious contemporaries which one or two of them contain, especially those of Coleridge, Shelley, and Byron. And the occasional bursts of verse, such as the War Song of Dinas Yawr, scattered even to profusion among his novels, are often those of a real, though at times somewhat eccentric, poet.

§ 3 Not often has a more various celebrity in the works of both verse and prose been manifested to Englishmen than that of CHARLES KINGSLEY (1819–1875). Poet, pastor, man of science, historian, social reformer, even traveller, Kingsley seemed equally earnest in every pursuit proper to the several characters, and wrote eloquently on each. His father was a Hampshire squire who took orders in his riper years, and after some clerical work in Devonshire and the Fen country, became Rector of Clovelly, and eventually of St Luke's, Chelsea. Both at his successive homes, at different schools, and at Magdalene College, Cambridge, Charles showed a moderate affection for book-study and the playground, but a hearty love of the pastimes and lore of the sea and open country, and a marked fondness for original composition, especially in verse or poetic prose Yet he obtained a first class in the classical tripos of 1842 Though already possessed by that "divine discontent" which was to animate his whole career, he embraced in the same year the clerical profession without perceptible misgiving, and then the connexion, which proved life-long, with Eversley in Hampshire began Bringing to his work a spirit of high endeavour, formed under the influence of Coleridge, Carlyle, and Maurice, he entered on his task of helping, by practical effort, preaching, and writing, his fellow-men to make themselves wiser, better, and happier, with a zest that was the outcome partly of temperament and partly of passionate conviction Nor was ever spirit less ascetic or puritanical, a large, free, healthy appetite for the invigorating enjoyments of body and mind, for every form of manly exercise, was almost a kind of moral force with him throughout Hence the name afterwards given, tauntingly at first, to his body of religious sentiments, "muscular Christianity"

In 1848 appeared his first book, The Saint's Tragedy, a dramatic poem in which the life of S Elizabeth of Hungary is made the occasion for uttering thoughts regarding life and society widely different from ordinary opinion Next year, Yeast a problem, enforced the same views in the guise of a prose fiction, and in 1850 the novel of Alton Locke, Tailor and Poet, gave them their crowning expression The Chartist agitation and its obvious causes, working upon his strong sense of the sorrows and sufferings of the poor, had made him an apostle of the doctrines then called Christian Socialism, his frank advocacy of which brought him into some disfavour with his brethren and the authorities of the Church This, however, he was not long in living down Phaethon, or, Loose Thoughts for Loose Thinkers, published in 1852, was substantially the last deliverance of his soul on this theme, though its spirit never left him

Next year (1853) he gave the world its first taste of his own peculiar quality in prose and first proof of special historical study in Hypatia, in which the tragic story of the gentle victim of fifth century fanaticism expands into an imaginative reproduction of an extinct society and age, and a warning to the present Alexandria and her Schools, the publication in 1854 of lectures given at Edinburgh, was a natural sequence to Hypatia His most popular work, Westward Ho! followed in 1855, but is too well-known to need more than mention here The war in the Crimea having worked his impressionable nature to a high pitch of interest, he sought, in Two Years-Ago, published in 1857, to create out of passing events a picture as vivid and inspiring as those already drawn from the long past, but with hardly the same success Next year his fine poem, Andromeda, perhaps the most successful in an exotic metre ever written in English, along with a few of those penetrating lyrics in which he excelled, was given to the public

In 1860 he was appointed Professor of History at Cambridge—an office that he held for nine years. Though he discharged its duties with all the fervour and nervous energy of his character, his reputation was not advanced by the appointment. Several of his lectures on the subject were published, and one series, The Roman and the Teuton, has had some vogue, as, indeed, those on the Ancien Regime (1867), which were given in London, have also had. In truth Kingsley's temperament unfitted him for historical work of the kind now in favour. In 1864 his friends had the mortification of seeing him decidedly worsted in an encounter with Dr Newman which an unguarded expression had provoked. On the whole those nine years were far from a season of triumph to him. In his own special field too signs of declining power were manifesting themselves. It is true that The Water-Babies, published as a book in 1863, is a work of rare originality and charm, and exhibits several of his best qualities in perfection, but it was the last he wrote with his old familiar ease. In 1867 he bade good-bye to prose fiction with Hereward the Wake, the least admirable of his romances, though it is, in some respects, no unworthy close to a worthy career. Science—the science of sea-shore, field and stream, in particular—had always attracted him, and as early as 1855 he had shown his capreity for the study by his Glaucus, or, the Wonders of the Shore. To its pursuit and his undying interest in social questions history and fiction had now to give place, after the publication, in 1868, of The Hermits, he did nothing considerable in either. But his scientific writings, of which Town Geology (1872) is the most notable, reveal the man of letters and the moral teacher rather than the true spirit of the subject.

From first to last Kingsley was a great preacher and publisher of sermons, and the various issues of these have been widely read and deeply influenced many minds. Fully a dozen collections, under several titles—Village Sermons, Town and Country Sermons, Good News of God, and such like—appeared and reappeared in quick succession, indeed, his last publication was a volume of Westminster Sermons. His appointment, in 1869, to a canonry at Chester, from which, in 1873, he was transferred to a more valuable one at Westminster, gave him a more commanding position for the display of his powers in this way, which he did not fail to use. His health, however, forced him to make frequent journeys by land or water, generally across the Atlantic. To one of these we owe his last popular work, At Last, a Christmas in the West Indies, published in 1871, which bears the stamp of its author's genius on every page. Besides those mentioned, Kingsley's miscellaneous publications were numerous; and some were subsequently broken up and redistributed. Plays and Puritans is, perhaps, the most noticeable. After a tedious illness he died at Eversley in January, 1875. His loss was widely and sincerely mourned.

Kingsley was hardly an artist, but his manly strength as a novelist, and native force as a poet, have given him a firmer hold on the affections of the young and generous than most artists can hope for. A frank, high-spirited, eager-hearted boy himself throughout life, he is naturally loved by boys and the boyish-hearted of every age, his warm feeling for valour and daring in the past, unreserved acceptance of the conditions of life in the present, and trust in God and the future, and the "big manly voice" that gave them utterance, act in youth as a trumpet-call to all strenuous, honest endeavour to do, dare and suffer with courage and endurance. He is the Greatheart of our nineteenth-century literature, an undespending guide and stimulus when both are deeply needed. From this position time and circumstance will doubtless displace him. But over a considerable fraction of his verse neither can have any power, his Andromeda and a round dozen of his smaller pieces—above all, two or three lyrics of a peculiar strain—must surely outlive every changing fashion in things poetical.

§ 4 The force and significance of poetry in the still current epoch are strikingly seen in the early history of the Oxford Movement, which was heralded by poetry, awakened by a poet, and led by poets. In a sermon preached by JOHN KEBLE (1792-1866) the most famous of its leaders afterwards discerned the first note of the movement. Keble was born at Fairford, in Gloucestershire, his father being a scholarly vicar, under whose sole tuition the son acquired a degree of learning that won him, in his fifteenth year, a scholarship at Corpus, and proved the foundation of an unusually brilliant university career. His strong Churchmanship also came to him from his father, in whom the Church traditions of a former age were still a living force. After winning a double first, and being elected Fellow of Oriel at nineteen, he remained in the service of his college and the university till 1823, when he withdrew from both to take a curate's work in his father's parish. Henceforth he was an unassuming, unworldly country parson, deeply influencing widening currents of opinion through his poetry, his pupils, and an occasional sermon or tract, and watching outside movements that affected the Church with an anxious eye, whilst he steadily grew into an object of unsought love and reverence, but labouring all the time, with a seemingly absorbed mind, on mere parish work. The book that has almost sanctified his name, The Christian Year, was given to the world in 1827, though the last six poems did not appear till the third edition, issued in 1829. The work represents an eight years' cultivation of his powers, some of the pieces having been seen as early as 1819. Yet Keble himself thought its publication premature, but for the importunities of friends he would have gone "on improving the series all his life," and left it "to come out, if judged useful," after his death. Had he been allowed his own way, ninety-five editions, the least of which consisted of 3,000 copies, would have been lost to the world. In another year these had swollen to a dozen more. Nor does the work yet show any sign of declining popularity.

He was still but a country curate when, in 1833, he preached the Assize Sermon at Oxford, published as National Apostasy, to which Newman traced the great movement. And he was undoubtedly a powerful force, though no conspicuous figure, in its development, seven only of the wonder-working tracts coming from his pen. In 1835, after having again and again refused offers of preferment, he accepted the vicarage of Hursley, near Winchester, and to do his part there faithfully was his chief ambition for the rest of his life. Having, however, been elected, in 1831, Professor of Poetry at Oxford, he held the office for ten years, taking great pains with his lectures, which had then to be given in Latin. His second volume of verse, the Lyra Innocentium, appeared in 1846, but, despite the beauty and charm of several of its poems, it fell comparatively flat. Of his many subsequent publications, the edition of Hooker and the Life of Bishop Wilson are perhaps the most generally valuable.

The extraordinary popularity of The Christian Year may be fairly attributed to its perfect fusion, in exactest proportions, of the poetical with the religious temperament. In Keble met for the first time the eye and the sensibility of a poet, the cultivated judgment and classical taste of a trained scholar, the convinced faith of a Christian, and the devotional spirit of a loyal Anglican. Nature and time of birth made him a poet of the Wordsworthian type, circumstances an ardent Churchman, and added a refining and enriching culture, and The Christian Year, written before the Churchman got the better of the poet, was the result. That the balance was not so evenly maintained in the Lyra Innocentium is doubtless the explanation of its comparative failure.

§ 5 In the works of Keble's virtual disciple, who soon became the most powerful leader of the movement, JOHN HENRY, Cardinal NEWMAN (1801-1890), the literary faculty reached its finest expression in English. Newman was born in London, his father being a banker whose house failed at the end of the great war, and his mother a lady of Huguenot extraction. Religious and Calvinistic influences encompassed Newman in his boyhood, and his naturally plastic mind was almost wholly shaped by them. From the first Religion was to him the master concern of life. Though his undergraduate career at Trinity College, Oxford, brought him no distinction, he was able, in 1823, to gain the highest then open to him, a fellowship at Oriel, which in time associated him closely with Whately, though the connexion was not lasting. From Keble he was kept apart for a year or two by mutual prejudice, but this once removed, spiritual affinities drew the two together into a union that stood the severest strain ever imposed on such a bond. Directly, Keble had much to do with the formation of his religious temper, but indirectly still more, through Keble's pupil, Hurrell Froude, who had made himself an enthusiastic propagator of his master's principles. During these years Newman was himself steadily maturing into an influence, and his reign as such may be said to have begun in 1828, when he became vicar of St Mary's, the University church.

It was through the sermons which from that time he preached in St Mary's every successive Sunday afternoon, that his magic power impressed itself on the souls of the young in his audiences, who bore away in their hearts "words and thoughts which were a religious music—subtle, sweet, mournful." Yet his first publication, The Ariens of the Fourth Century, made in 1833, evinces hardly any of the graces now associated with his style, in it his peculiar charm is undiscoverable. Nor is it, the learned aver, a sound history either. Its theological and biographical interest, however, is still great.

In September, 1833, the mighty movement began with the appearance of the earliest of the tracts from which it got its name. The first was Newman's composition. He had just returned from a lengthened continental journey—in the course of which he wrote the matchless hymn, Lead, kindly Light, and passed through a dangerous illness—and had brought back with him a firm persuasion that a tremendous task had been laid upon him at home. Though not so prominent a leader as others, he was for eight years, at least, the intellectual and spiritual centre of the work, of the ninety tracts that fed it, "the bulk and the most forcible" were of his writing. But it being his task to revivify Church doctrine, and convert neglect or listless assent into ardent, heart-nourishing belief, his greater works of this time of conflict are too exclusively theological and controversial to find a place in general literature. The Via Media, published first in 1837 under a longer title, and the Lectures on Justification by Faith (1838), may serve as examples. The literature of the pulpit received an enormous and priceless accession to its wealth in the eight volumes of Parochial and Plain Sermons, the sum of those addresses that had such a fascination for select hearers. Even when read their delicate searching power and "refined homeliness" of diction are irresistible to many. Contributions to the "British Critic" furnished material for some volumes of Essays, Critical and Historical, containing much that is of large general interest. Not a little verse too, of unique sweetness and tenderness, and instinct with the same Church-loving spirit, had fallen from him, which, reprinted with pieces of like temper from other pens, formed the collection called Lyra Apostolica, published in 1836. They fully prove that he was a poet. But in 1841 the fierce storm that he raised by Tract 90, and one or two other incidents, awoke in him the misgivings which eventually deepened into a conviction of the falsity of his position. In 1842 he resigned St Mary's, and withdrew into seclusion at Littlemore, and in October, 1845, he was received into the communion of Rome.

Whatever the consequences to the Church of this step, literature was no loser by the change. Not only do his later writings testify to a marked quickening of the literary sense, but a much larger proportion of them takes the high rank that is their due in the domain of letters as distinguished from theology or polemics. Entering in 1848 the Oratory of St Philip Neri at Birmingham, he passed all but a few years of the rest of his life there. The first-fruits of this new harvest, Loss and Gain, published the same year, presents a purely imaginative picture of a young Oxford man who eventually takes refuge in the same fold as the author, and is highly valued by many that are in little danger of conversion. Between 1852 and 1858 he lived in Dublin as Rector of the newly-founded Catholic University, and certain discourses he delivered there were published as The Idea of a University, a work remarkable for its depth and strength of thought and feeling, its generous wisdom, its piety and eloquence. And about the same time a companion volume appeared, ultimately called the Rise and Progress of Universities. Next came a second characteristic product of his imagination, Callista - a Tale of the Third Century (1856), described by its writer as "an attempt to imagine and express the feelings and mutual relations of Christians and heathens at the period to which it belongs."

To Newman's admirers Callista is, of all his works, the truest and fullest image of his mind and spirit, but it never attained the celebrity of some of the others. For that which is actually the most celebrated the world has to thank Kingsley. In 1864 Kingsley was thoughtless enough, in a magazine article, to impute to Newman, in common with the Roman clergy, an habitual trimming attitude towards truth, and was at once asked for his proofs. In the encounter that ensued Newman had the advantage of his assailant in every way, and used it mercilessly, stinging Kingsley into issuing, in pamphlet form, a virtual arraignment of his whole career. To this Newman's answer was the world-famed Apologia pro Vita sua, written rapidly in the early spring of 1864. It produced a deep impression. Towards Newman himself the national feeling completely altered, distrust and suspicion gave way to esteem and even pride, till his death the general interest in him never flagged. Tokens of this juster and happier disposition may be read in his election, in 1877, to an honorary fellowship at his first college, Trinity, and in the general satisfaction at his elevation, in 1879, to the Cardinalate. His other publications as a Roman Catholic are mostly, like the Essay on Development and Lectures on Anglican Difficulties, of too professional a cast to call for notice here, though the highest literary genius is obvious in them all. But The Dream of Gerontius and an Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent, published respectively in 1868 and 1870, widely different as they are, agree in standing out prominently from his other works of the time. Newman's one volume of poetry, entitled Verses on Various Occasions, bears witness to a decidedly less generous poetic vein in his early Roman Catholic than in his Anglican time. The Dream demonstrates the contrary. Never has the imagination won a more signal victory, in alliance with a spiritual sense of rare intensity it has, in this poem, transfigured certain conceptions of the theologian into a soul picture of inexpressible beauty. Nor has any equally brief poem in our language more of that mystic melody, the music unheard by mortal ear, yet far more real to some than any mortal music. The Grammar of Assent seeks to ascertain the elementary principles on which belief is given or withheld, and to justify the implicit faith that cannot always justify itself. Cardinal Newman died at Birmingham on August 11, 1890. The love and reverence of well-nigh the whole nation followed him to the grave.

Our weightiest authorities in criticism are singularly unanimous in their opinion of Newman's style. To them it is the nearest perfection of any our speech can show. When at its best, a better is barely conceivable. "In quietness and confidence is its strength," its tone of perfect moderation and perfect conviction at once secure our respect and impress our minds, ease, delicacy, grace, measure, and finish, without an effort, win a ready way to the reader's heart, abundance without excess, artistic yet unaffected simplicity, the telling word, the telling phrase, each seemingly spontaneous, seemingly unobtruded, the orderly arrangement, the perfect harmony of sentiment and expression, the chasteness of diction that no tawdriness dare approach, above all, the subduced, yet variously modulated musical note that is never absent—these and other virtues of style work together to give an unparalleled distinction and charm to everything of the higher kind that Newman wrote. He has certainly the one mark of a supreme master in these days, he is not afraid of a long sentence.

§ 6 After all, Newman was not the most important man in the movement he helped to originate. This is admitted by all to have been EDWARD BOUVERIE PUSEY (1800–1882), familiar to all for forty years as Dr. Pusey. A member of an historic family of French origin, which did not assume its English name till his childhood, Pusey entered Christ Church in 1818, took, in 1822, a first class in classics, and in 1824 became Fellow of Oriel. He then studied for a time in Germany, and by 1828 had built himself so high in learning, theological and Oriental, and so clearly demonstrated his capacity, that the Crown appointed him Regius Professor of Hebrew and Canon of Christ Church, thus giving him an official connexion with the Church which lasted till his death. Kindly disposed towards the Oxford movement from the first, he was yet slow to join it. But his adhesion, once made, decided its fate. His high standing, solid reputation and steadfast character brought to it the assurance of stability that its ardent young promoters could not bring of themselves, a champion of its principles whose credit and position ensured them a hearing, and a “head and centre” for its disciples throughout the country. By his writings and sermons he fixed its beliefs, he fought its battles, directed and cheered on its partisans, suffered for it, toiled for it, stood to its original principles with inflexible constancy throughout. Such success as it achieved was due to him more than to any other. No wonder, then, it came to be called after his name. But the grave and measured speech, the learning and the reasoning that he put into his Tracts, his several sermons on the Real Presence, on Confession, and other doctrines, his work on Daniel, his commentary on the Minor Prophets, and his Evening, can secure these writings a place in the literature of theology only. In the English Church, however, he remains a great and honoured name.

§ 7 To none of the prophets of this great school does the mind that loves the things of the mind turn with warmer regard than to the latest-born, RICHARD WILLIAM CHURCH (1815–1890), in whom the best literary qualities were so nicely balanced with the best clerical as to receive, whilst they gave, a special grace. Born at Lisbon, of an Irish father and a German mother, he passed his early boyhood chiefly in Italy. Coming home in 1828 he eventually graduated at Wadham College, Oxford, with a first class in classics, and in 1838 was elected Fellow of Oriel. At Oxford he was caught in the great movement, was brought into the closest and most affectionate relations with Newman, and clung steadfastly alike to its principles and his friendship with Newman when both seemed lost. To its first organ, "The British Critic," he contributed a series of papers, which he long afterwards recast into his one historical work, Saint Anselm, published in 1870, and to its second, "The Christian Remembrancer," his masterly essay on Dante, now reckoned among the choicest classics of English criticism. This was published in 1850. Another contribution of his to the same periodical, that of 1854 on The Early Ottomans, is perhaps the best written brief account our language offers of the rise and growth to greatness of the Turkish power. In 1853 he married, and retired to tranquil pastoral work, and a singularly secluded pursuit of congenial study and production, at Whatley, near Frome. There he remained, sturdily declining to accept any preferment or dignity till 1871, when he yielded to his friends' persuasions and became Dean of St Paul's. The industrious peace of Whatley now bore excellent, if not abundant, fruit, in 1879 a monograph on Spenser, in 1884 another on Bacon, gave us the distinctly ablest studies we possess of their several subjects, successive volumes of sermons, collections of essays and lectures, bestowed on the world the best thoughts of a mind of rare justness, insight, elevation and refinement, and he left at his death, finished and almost ready for the press, an account of The Oxford Movement, which worthily narrates from the point of view of a clear-eyed friend and promoter, that memorable chapter of Church history. Of prominent merit among his sermons and lectures are those that aim at the exposition of the relations of modern civilisation to the eternal truths of religion, and those that examine the influence of Christianity on national character. In tone, in temper, in large and liberal knowledge, in force of grasp on the grand verities of faith, and in the appropriate literary graces, these are perhaps unsurpassed among their kind. They are orthodox theology and the highest literary culture in the happiest union.

§ 8 In a few years the spirit generated by the movement threw out other and somewhat adverse forms, of which also Oriel was the nursing mother, and which also showed a tendency to clothe themselves in verse. A typical instance of one of these developments is seen in ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH (1819-1861). Four years after his birth in Liverpool, Clough was carried by his father, who was a cotton merchant, to America—so early did the fate declare itself which all through life tossed him about in body as in spirit. Returning for his education he went to Rugby, where he stayed seven years, the almost realized ideal of a modern school-boy, and a marked favourite with Dr Arnold. Yet the promise of Rugby was not quite fulfilled at Oxford, where his Balliol scholarship led in 1841 to only a second class in classics—a disappointment ascribed by his friends to the distractions caused by the stir of the time. In 1842, however, he won an Oriel Fellowship, and next year became a tutor also. But at Oxford “he could not rest,” his doubts had condensed into a settled scepticism, the sorrows of the outside world vexed his spirit—in 1848 he left the place for ever. He found little rest anywhere else either, a short stay at Liverpool, another at Paris, a longer at Rome, a brief tenure of the headship of University Hall, London, a still briefer sojourn at Cambridge in Massachusetts, and a few years’ work as examiner to the Education Office substantially completed his life. In November, 1861, he died at Florence.

Clough’s genius was strangely dependant on reasons and circumstances, and the moments in his life, when the internal and external conditions were simultaneously favourable, were few and brief. One such followed his departure from Oxford, he then wrote—the first in England, the others in Italy—his three most successful long poems, The Bathos of Toper na-Iuolich (subsequently Tuber-na-Iuolich), Amours de Voyage, and Dipsychus. Another was the journeying time that preceded his death, when he composed Mari Magno, its last lines as life was ebbing. Yet in some of his occasional pieces he is also seen at his best, as in Qui laborat, orat and A London Idyll. Clough’s place as a poet is still undetermined, our accredited critics being at variance regarding it. The power of his strongest work is unmistakable, and Mr. Lowell may be right in his notion that the men of the middle of the next century will recognize in his poems the true voice of his time. He handled the hexameter in the Bathos and Amours with fine effect, the former has, at any rate in his friend Arnold’s opinion, “some admirable Homeric qualities—out-of-door freshness, life, naturalness, buoyant rapidity.” But his workmanship is at times very faulty. Possibly the coming time will know him mainly as the subject of his friend’s immortal elegy, Thyrsis.

§ 9 Of this friend, MATTHEW ARNOLD (1822-1888), the early life and training ran much the same course as Clough’s. The eldest son of the celebrated Dr. Arnold, Matthew received his school education at Laleham, Winchester, and Rugby, went to Oxford in 1842 as a Balliol Scholar, won there the Hertford Scholarship, won the Newdigate, yet failed to reach the coveted first class in classics. He was, however, chosen Fellow of Oriel in 1845. The most noteworthy fact of his life at Oxford for us was the formation of his friendship with Clough. Tenderly attached as he was to the “sweet city with the dreaming spires,” whose sentiment his verse was to express with such magical sobriety, he accepted in 1847 the post of private secretary to the aged statesman, the Marquis of Lansdowne. In 1848 his tiny volume, now so priceless, The Strayed Reveller and Other Poems, by A., appeared, and ere long found a fit audience, however few. The Inspectorship of Schools, which he received in 1851, henceforward afforded him the main occupation of his life and a rich supply of material for both mind and pen. His second tiny volume, Empedocles on Etna and Other Poems, followed in 1853, but was soon withdrawn, something in its principal piece proving distasteful to him. This, however, did not prevent him trying again, and even putting his name to the new publication, which was made in 1854, or to that which shortly after succeeded it. These two consisted of selections from their predecessors and new compositions. In 1858, his elaborate yet doubtful attempt at a tragedy in the Greek manner, Meiopo, completed the poetical achievement of his earlier time. A gratifying proof of the reputation this had brought him had already been given in his election, in 1857, to the professorship of poetry at Oxford, to which at the end of the first he was re-elected for a second term of five years, and would almost certainly have been chosen for a third, had a third been possible. Not till 1867, however, did the lovers of his verse get anything fresh from his pen, but in the volume of New Poems, then published, they had the clearest assurance that his long silence had been owing to no decay of power. After this he wrote little poetry, his two volumes of 1869 were but a collected edition of all his previously-published pieces that he wished to live.

Whilst solid security was thus being taken for an enviable, if somewhat limited, renown as a poet, he was also unobtrusively laying the basis of a much wider fame as a writer of prose. His early reports as school-inspector survive to show that form was a foremost consideration with him from the first. His introduction to his new, and henceforward almost sole, character in the world of letters was made by a preface to Meiopo (1858), and the keen interest thereby excited was raised to a yet higher level by his lectures at Oxford and occasional magazine articles. Indeed, he made the ten years of his professorship a kind of epoch in the annals of criticism. All that is most characteristic in the criticism of the present as distinguished from that of the preceding age, its peculiar tone, temper, principles, and aim, and the increased sense of the importance of the art in the literary economy, were largely determined by four of his publications in those years—Three Lectures on Translating Homer (1861), Last Words on the same subject (1862), Essays in Criticism (1865), and The Study of Celtic Literature (1867). It is true that, like everything new, these were ill received in some quarters, and they undoubtedly abound in matter calculated to provoke resentful opposition and ridicule. But their brightness, keenness, freshness, and originality, the gracious ends they proposed, the manifest truth of their essential doctrines, the salutariness of the methods they advocated, their fine seriousness, and above all the consummate charm of their writing, gained them in time an acceptance of their ideas and principles general enough among the growing generation to ensure a new, wider, and truer life to criticism. Twice sent to Continental countries to inquire into their several systems of education,¹ he was thereby enabled, in 1861, to enlighten his countrymen on a vital question with Popular Education in France, in 1864 with A French Eton, and in 1868 with Schools and Universities on the Continent—works on education which in lucidity, earnestness and literary quality have no fellow in the language.

Without abandoning literary criticism, he next widened his view, and made assay of his powers in that of politics and society. To that end he published—as a book in 1869—a long essay entitled Culture and Anarchy, the purpose of which is to weigh in the balance of its author's critical system the various elements of English society. In this he urges with much liveliness the remedy of culture, or a treatment of the maladies he discovers by a regimen of "sweetness and light"—a phrase borrowed from Swift. The essay was received with mocking laughter by some, with blisterous scorn by others, and became the butt of many an allusive witicism, but it made a stir, affected minds, and produced a lasting effect on both opinion and conduct. Few modern books furnish more delightful and salutary reading, though it has obvious defects. In 1871 he published Friendship's Garland, a series of letters that strove to turn the laugh against the laughers, but he never permitted a second edition.

But by this time he had entered upon a more perilous path, the constructive and interpretative criticism of religion. His first effort in this was St Paul and Protestantism, published in 1869, a treatise in which the aims, methods, and chief side-issues of the new enterprise were plainly disclosed, but the subject is too theological for discussion in these pages. Of a similar nature was his Literature and Dogma, described by himself as an "Essay towards a better apprehension of the Bible," which appeared in 1873, and this he followed up in 1875, with an equally strenuous effort, God and the Bible, described by himself as "a review of the objections to Literature and Dogma." Two years later, he added one more buttress to his position, entitled Last Essays on Church and Religion, and thus brought to a close his persevering attempt to transform and thereby save religion by his wide-working panacea of culture. It seems to have been a somewhat unfortunate adventure for his reputation. On all his main issues judgment must be taken to have gone against him, his outfit of needful learning was, it is ruled, altogether inadequate, his assumptions baseless, his reasonings generally unsound, and success in his design sure to be fatal to the interest he was toiling to serve. Yet the presence of a master in the art of letters is felt in every page.

Though theology continued to share his attention with literature, politics, and education, his remaining work consists almost exclusively of occasional papers or lectures on topics relating to one or another of those three subjects, which he gathered into volumes of Mixed Essays (1879), Discourses in America (1885), and such like, as they accumulated. In politics and education he combated with much brilliance the aims and methods of his friends, the Liberals, in literature he still went on deepening the old lines, telling Englishmen, for their good, what foreigners thought of their famous men of genius, and trying gently to lead them to right principles of thought and feeling in letters. A second series of Essays in Criticism, collected in a posthumous volume, gives several of these pieces. His later poems, "alas too few!" show his strong sensibility to the humbler as well as to the higher friendships, and that the fount of song within him was still pure and sweet. He died with startling suddenness, at Liverpool, on April 15, 1888.

In both kinds of writing Matthew Arnold was equally excellent. In the formal virtues of composition, in quality of cunning craftsmanship, some of his later prose has never been surpassed, his verse seldom. In his hands language becomes a living thing, instinct with spirit and grace, matchless for expressiveness, prose so luminous as his, so well knit yet so flexible, so perfect an image of the workings of the informing intellect, so measured and masterly in its construction, verse in which the sustained musical note is in such exact harmony with the sentiment, the spiritual mood, that would utter itself, may safely be asserted to have come but once from the same English pen. Of the general character of the matter expressed more doubtful speech is necessary. The tendency of current opinion is to set his verse distinctly above his writings in prose. Yet in the critical sphere at all events Arnold's greatness in prose remains only less real in matter than in manner, much of his work in this must stand, if only in the writings of others. Of the vitality of his poetry there can hardly be a question. It is too genuine, too penetrating, too expressive of a profound and painful spiritual feeling of its author's age, to be allowed to perish. It has the marvellous gift of healing in the very act of wounding, its dominant note of melancholy, its brooding scepticism, its distress before the great puzzle of the world, are corrected, and the harassed spirit soothed, by the very speech that imparts them And to have successfully revived the pastoral style, as he has done in Thyrsis and The Scholar Gypsy, would alone entitle him to unique distinction

§ 10 Arnold's two immediate successors in the chair of poetry, Sir FRANCIS H C DOYLE (1810-1888), and JOHN CAMPBELL SHAIRP (1819-1885), also strove to combine poetry with criticism in prose The former brought to the office the fame of having written The Loss of the Birkenhead, a poem in much favour still, and The Return of the Guards, the latter of being the author of Kilmahoe, A Highland Pastoral (1864), and of Studies in Poetry and Philosophy (1868), and both sought to maintain the prestige Arnold had given it by publishing their lectures Professor Shairp, who was a Scotsman of Oxford education, and eventually a principal at St Andrew's, had a real gift of song, as some of his sacred pieces show, but a still stronger turn for criticism, of which he gave proof in a volume on the Poetic Interpretation of Nature (1877), and a larger entitled Aspects of Poetry (1881), made up of lectures given at Oxford He also wrote a Life of Burns (1879), and other works

§ 11 The eccentricity or contempt of law regarded by Mr Arnold as the worst reproach of English genius in his day, may be thought by some to be signally exemplified in the work of ROBERT BROWNING (1812-1889), the most singular of our master poets, yet held by his admirers the profoundest interpreter of this modern age Born at Cumberwell and of middle-class origin, Browning, like Pope, was the fondling of fond parents, and almost solely educated by them and by home and local influences and himself A little schooling at Peckham and still less lecturing at University College, London, seem to have been all the external teaching he ever got But his father, though of commonplace strain and only a clerk in the Bank of England, was no commonplace man, but a scholar, a poet, and an artist, who early saw and fostered his son's extraordinary powers, and took care that their growth should be unchecked and unwarped Knowledge came to him from various sources, influences also, as of the poems of Shelley and Keats, and such of both as were congenial were left to their natural workings He was given full freedom to choose his own path, and he chose that of poetry Thanks also to kindly circumstance, a life competence was ensured him from the first, he had never, any more than Wordsworth, to write for bread Such were the conditions that went to the development of this masterful intellect

Browning's career was of unusual length, constancy, and consistency His first volume was published in his twenty-first year, his last on the day of his death, and of the years that came between, more than thirty severally received published tributes in 1846 with the eighth number, which contained Luria and A Soul's Tragedy. These years were plainly the first flowering time of this peculiar genius. The morning freshness and moral and artistic beauty of Pippa Passes are especially striking, its idea is not too deep to be reached by a little curious inquiry, yet deep enough to reward the search, and the noble optimism that breathes through it acts upon the spirit like a benediction. A Blot on the 'Sentcheon has had the distinction of being put on the stage with a certain measure of success, but for all the praise that has been lavished on it, to some minds it seems to have itself a painful blot, artistic as well as moral. The Dramatic Lyrics (1842), besides such pieces as In a Gondola and Waring, so dear to the esoteric disciple, contains also the universally popular Pied Piper of Hamelin, already a demizen of four continental languages, and the Dramatic Romances, besides The Tomb at St Praxeds, The Flight of the Duchess, and Saul, contains also How they Brought the Good News and The Lost Leader, which are delightful to every body.

All these, or nearly all, were products of the dramatic faculty—"are so many utterances of so many imaginary persons," not his. In his next publication, made in 1850, Christmas Eve and Easter Day, the poet himself speaks, and with power. Christianity as preached and believed is its theme, that all "service is true service" so far as it goes, and love the fulfilment of the law, its conclusion. Browning's mannerism is strongly marked in it, but fails to damage materially the effect. By this time the poet had been for four years the husband of the poetess, already in esteem as Miss Barrett, whom he had met in an apparently dying condition and soon afterwards married. Their fifteen years of united life were passed in Italy, and mainly at Florence, with occasional visits to England and elsewhere. For some reason this was a less productive time for Browning. Men and Women—a collection of miscellaneous pieces, none of any great length, in two volumes—is its only fruit. Better fruit, however, to the general taste, his genius never grew. In no two volumes of his are found so many poems, such as A Toccata of Galuppi's, Childe Roland, Andrea del Sarto, and A Grammarian's Funeral, of so grateful a relish to the mass of the poetry-reading public. Even his Dramatis Personæ, published in 1864, has not an equal proportion of such excellence, though it has James Lee and The Worst of it, and also the noblest burst of expression on the most awful of subjects that ever broke from mortal lips, Prospice, written shortly after his wife's death.

In 1868-69 his admirers received that monster gift of his genius, The Ring and the Book, which some think a magnificent fresh, others a possession for ever. "A whole series of books about what of Browning's great, perhaps greater, friend, the most august poetic personality of this later age, Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Between these two master spirits certain radical resemblances are not undiscoverable, but in every force and aim that stamp character on work they were direct opposites. Tennyson was as reverent of law as Browning was contemptuous, was as punctilious in the observance of the principles and rules of his art as Browning was negligent, was as resolute in his self-restraint as Browning was confident in his self-abandonment. Never has a genius so masculine been so vigorous in its self-discipline, had so exacting an ideal of workmanship, been so vigilant and patient in its quest of consummate expression, even Pope was hardly so painstaking. He is our one peerless example of the "good poet" that "is made as well as born." To this distinction he added that of a career of single-minded and consistent devotion to verse exceeding even Browning's, not in length alone, but in sustained excellence of achievement to the end also, no other of our poets of the front rank has written so long, so equably, and with a natural force so little abated by old age.

§ 12 ALFRED TENNYSON (1809-1892) was born on August 6, 1809, in the parsonage-house of his father's parish of Somersby, not far from Horncastle. Of his six brothers, the two elder, Frederick and Charles, were also drawn early towards poetry, and in their riper years produced works in verse not unworthy of their name. The first nineteen years of the future poet's life were passed almost exclusively in his native county, Lincolnshire, with the result of giving to this typical north-eastern land an interpreter of its natural features and human characteristics not less sympathetic and true than the Lake-country had already gained in Wordsworth. The scenery and local colouring of many of the poems that first established Tennyson's reputation are taken from Lincolnshire, whilst a character-piece of his latest volume reproduces the dialect "current in his youth at Spilsbury." Such formal education as fell to his lot came to him from the village school, the grammar school of Louth—where he stayed from his eighth to his twelfth year—and from home tuition under his father and others. His bent towards verse declared itself in earliest childhood, he might be almost called a prattler in numbers. By 1827 Charles and Alfred found that they had produced poetry enough to fill a modest volume, and being, like the authors of the Lyrical Ballads, thirty years earlier, in want of a little money to cover the expenses of a projected tour, at the suggestion of the family coachman, they sought, as the same illustrious pair had done, to barter their verse for it, and succeeded. A Louth bookseller gave them £20 for the copyright, and in the same year published the volume, Poems by Two Brothers, now the object of so much curious inquiry, containing, as it does, the blossoms of a poetical faculty that had not ceased to bear fruits of the best sixty-five years afterwards. Which of the one hundred and two pieces thus published were Charles's and which Alfred's, can only be guessed, the boys having agreed never to tell. And neither reprinted a single one of the poems; only an occasional thought, image or expression was rescued by Alfred to reappear, more or less altered, in his later verse.

In 1828 the brothers went to Trinity College, Cambridge. The studies and scholastic training of Cambridge would seem to have been as immaterial to the development of Tennyson's genius as universities usually are in the case of great poets, and like many of his order before him, he left without taking his degree. But in another way, and in the one vital direction, Tennyson's obligations to Cambridge can scarcely be overrated. Being constitutionally shy, diffident, and singularly sensitive to criticism, he had the good fortune to be thrown into a numerous society of young men of great parts, high character, and fine aspirations—known academically as the Apostles—most of whom came to more or less distinction in after life, and to earn the esteem of all, and the love of several. To mix, as familiars, and interchange thought, with such spirits as Trench and Kemble, Milnes and Spedding, and beyond all, Arthur Hallam, then fresh from Lton and Italian travel, and two years his junior, was itself an intellectual and moral training of priceless value to a temper like his, reared in the seclusion of a remote parsonage. He read his poems to them, and his sense of their keen intelligence and fastidious taste doubtless controlled everything he wrote. They recognized his genius, and were generous in their praise, and his relations with Hallam assumed an intimacy which his verse has made one of the memorable friendships of all time. In 1829 he gained the Chancellor's Medal by a poem in blank verse on Timbuctoo, which became not only the admiration of his circle at Cambridge, but the subject of an enthusiastic notice in the "Athenæum," and is certainly of a merit unique in its class. Encouraged by these tokens, he brought out, in 1830, his first separate volume of verse, Poems, chiefly Lyrical, containing fifty-three pieces, of which about half was subsequently retained as part of his permanent work.

His premature departure from Cambridge, upon his father's death in 1831, was probably due to a resolution to make poetry the business of his life, and the character and reception of the volume of 1830 certainly justified him in forming it. That volume had, of course, no lack of faults and failings, but also ample power and grace to satisfy unbiased criticism as well as the author's friends, that the age was to have "one poet more," and a poet of its own type, though with a genius cast in a different mould from any of the others. Discouragements, however, and sorrows were not slow to come. Early in 1832 his peculiarities and admirers were rallied by Christopher North (John Wilson) in a tone that stung him to a retort—not a very felicitous one. This was inserted in a second slight volume, Poems by Alfred Tennyson, published the same year, which was, in many ways, a marked advance on the first, containing several such pieces as Enone, The Palace of Art, and The Lotus Eaters, though also several that were subsequently suppressed. Yet a mocking criticism it received so wrought upon the poet's sensitive spirit, that he at once countermanded what would have been his third publication, The Lover's Tale—a poem composed at Cambridge five years before—just as it had begun to issue from the press. The Lover's Tale had to wait till 1879 to attain authorized publication, and even to see its sequel, The Golden Supper, sent into the world ten years before it. And before the year had ended the sorrow that was long to darken his life had befallen him, in September, 1833, the friend whose spirit had been one with his, and mind so largely moulded his, Arthur Hallam, suddenly died at Vienna.

The immediate effect of these successive shocks was to bring his first period of poetical production to an abrupt close. For ten years the world got nothing from him but two short pieces, unwillingly contributed to Annals. This pause, of a length so extraordinary in the history of expanding genius, has a significance in Tennyson's that is equally extraordinary. Long as it was, he was making himself all the time. Suspecting probably that the praise of his Cambridge friends had betrayed him into a premature publicity, he now set himself doggedly down to the task of educating his powers, and pursued it throughout these years with a stubborn self-suppression rarely found in men of his class. Living mostly in London, and gradually winning his way to friendly intercourse with the eminent men of letters of the day, he kept working steadfastly, studying, composing, recasting, pruning, revising, subjecting his genius to a remorseless drill, and all but immovable to every temptation to publish. Only St Agnes, and the lines beginning with "O that 'twere possible!" that eventually proved the germ of Maud, out of the slowly growing results of his toil and study, were doled to the public in 1837. His grief, too, had already begun to struggle towards the expression that was to make it immortal, In Memoriam was unfolding itself, though fitfully, and, as it were, leaf by leaf. The general issue of this decade of labour and sorrow was to make him the best disciplined poetic intellect ever grown in England, while its special outcome was the production of two volumes of poems which laid the foundations of a greatness achieved by few.

This publication, which was issued in 1842, was that three-fold collection of the best of the author's previous work, published and unpublished, which, given since 1848 in a single volume, has been the "truly golden book" of English song to its lovers ever since. A worthy rival to it in general diffusion and influence would not be easy to find. To describe its contents, therefore, is needless, it is enough to say that in the combination of the elements that make the power of verse composition—thought, sentiment, nobility of movement and tone, dramatic force and picturesqueness in form and colour, verbal music and natural charm—its new portion is the nearest approach to uniformity of excellence that our literature offers. It sprang at once into high favour, especially with those themselves eminent in letters. Tennyson's fame was now safe. He was still poor, however, and a grant of £200 a year from the Crown, made by Sir Robert Peel in 1845, was no more than was necessary to free him from the most prosaic of cares. Yet it gave offence, and was made the occasion of some forced satire by Bulwer Lytton in "The New Timon," to which the poet replied in a somewhat caustic strain in the columns of "Punch." But detraction was powerless to touch his reputation. In 1847 The Princess appeared and received a hearty welcome for its poetry, though its conception and scheme failed to satisfy critical judgments, and do not yet satisfy. To deal adequately with so deep-reaching a question as the new status claimed for women, in the serio-comic vein, was doubtless a hopeless undertaking from the first, and the "medley" that resulted no less an incongruity because it was intended to be such. But its issue is a most delightful poem which few of the great world of readers would wish different. Pre-eminently beautiful are the lyrics, but those that divide the sections, as well as some passages in the body of the poem, were added to later editions.

Every great poet has his "great year", 1850 has, perhaps, the best claim to be Tennyson's. In 1850 he published In Memoriam, was married to a lady who came from the same countryside as himself, and succeeded Wordsworth as Poet Laureate. Moreover, a sixth edition of the Poems, a third of The Princess, and two more of In Memoriam, were published in the same year. Clearly the tide was rising fast. Especially remarkable was the reception given to the splendid tribute to the memory of his early-lost friend. That a long and varied poem of such depth and subtlety of thought and feeling, of so strongly-knit yet fine a texture, so close in its reasoning, in form, design and character of allusion so unlike the ordinary elegiac, and with such a brooding sadness resting upon it, should have passed through three editions in its first year, is a striking testimony to its beauty, power and sincerity. Yet the careful student will be at no loss to discover the reason. It is much more than an elegiac poem, more than even Lycidas and Adonais are, impressively as it utters the sense of a priceless friendship blighted by death, and appeals to all hearts wrung by like anguish, it has a nobler office still. It images the manifold moods of a strong nature doomed for a time to contemplate man, nature, and human destiny, and the mysterious problems that these suggest, through the veil of a clouding sorrow, yet probing to the quick, but always in a reverential spirit, the very questions that fascinate and perplex the modern mind.

Fame, most of it of the best, and an assured worldly position had now been won, and both went on growing in breadth and solidity till the foremost precedent of contemporary glory and gain from poetry had been far outdone. Dissident voices of course were not wanting, Tennyson had still to face not a little honest and intelligent criticism, and much of the usual cavilling, carping, and mockery, that is ever sure to snarl at the heels of prosperous genius. But the poetry-reading public only continued to love and read him all the more. Most indeed were disappointed at first with his Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington, which appeared in 1852, and did not at once catch the marvellous beauty and intense sincerity of Maud, which followed in 1855, but considerable changes in a new edition gave an improved position to the Ode, and, despite the adverse verdict of accredited criticism, Maud—which was also altered and enlarged in the second issue—came in time to be recognized for what it really is, the most piercingly dramatic, impassioned, and intensely yet delicately tender, of all the poet's work. The angry ravings of the hero, and certain peculiarities of expression, with other causes of offence, retarded its advance into its proper place as a poem, but once there, it was not likely to be dislodged. Maud was the first fruits of the poet's residence at Farringford, in the Isle of Wight, which remained his favourite dwelling till the end, and is worthily commemorated in the lines of invitation, To the Rev F D Maurice, perhaps the most perfect of the kind ever written. During these years his keen patriotism, under the stimulus of events in France and the Crimean war, moved him to contribute to the press a succession of rousing lyrics, of which Hands all Round (1852), The Charge of the Light Brigade (1854), and Riflemen, form (1859), have seldom been surpassed in their various kinds.

It is a high distinction of Tennyson's—whether actually his highest, cannot yet be asserted—to have added to our literature a brilliant epic on the fascinating but arduous theme that Milton and Dryden, after a long wistful look, had to turn away from, lighting up the "dim Arthuriad" with the radiance that song alone can give. The populous legend of King Arthur had early kindled his imagination, and, when but twenty-four, he began work on the subject, meaning, as he said himself, "to write a whole great poem upon it," but, discouraged by his first reviewers, he laid it aside after he had composed the Morte D'Arthur. Still, constant in this as in every other attachment, whatever its nature or rank, he held firmly to the design, returning to it again and again, and not completing it till 1885, half a century after the plan had been first conceived. Even the publication of its different parts stretched across forty-three years, and of these there was not one that did not seem to be final. Moreover, it was not until the appearance of the third contribution that the plan of the work, whether original or only shaping itself as its execution grew, was disclosed, and this again was so elastic as to permit of expansion almost to any extent. It now consists of twelve parts—The Coming of Arthur and The Passing of Arthur enclosing between them the ten other Idylls of the King that have at different times fallen into the scheme of "The Round Table." Of these twelve the first was the first to appear—in 1842, as the famous Morte D'Arthur. Next came—in 1859, and under the title of Idylls of the King—the third and fourth (first published as a single Idyll and called Enid), the sixth and seventh, called respectively Vivien and Elaine, and the eleventh, Guinevere. In 1869 the first, eighth and ninth—these two being The Holy Grail and Pelleas and Etarre—were added, when, too, the last was given under its new name, and then the scheme of the gathering poem was first revealed. The second and tenth—Gareth and Lynette and The Last Tournament—joined the muster in 1872, and in 1885 the fifth, Balin and Balan, closed the list, so far as it has gone. So "the whole Round Table" was composed. And what is this imposing monument of constructive genius? To our conception it is, in the main, what the first-written and grandest portion declares its subject to have been, "an image of the mighty world," exhibiting a splendid array of typical examples of idealized humanity in action on a stage that Imagination had prepared for them—a stage that, like Camelot city, was "never built at all, and therefore built for ever." It is the epic of humanity transported by the poet into an ideal world, starting enthusiastically towards the realization of high ideals, yet moving towards a very different destiny, towards the social ruin and dissolution that is the penalty of their own sin. The wisdom of reading an allegorical significance into it, as the poet and others have done—who assure us that "by King Arthur the soul is meant, by the Round Table the passions and capacities of a man"—may, to say the least, be fairly doubted, the consequent gain in edification of the moral sense might hardly repay the expenditure of intellect necessary to the working out of such an interpretation, much less compensate the inevitable loss in the purest kind of spiritual pleasure—which, and not instruction, is the primary end of all poetry.

Between the second and third instalments of the great idylls, Tennyson gave fresh proof of an idyllic faculty of a homelier quality—that which long before had produced Dora—in a volume entitled Enoch Arden, etc., published in 1861. But several of its pieces, the consummate Tithonus among them, had already appeared, in periodicals or elsewhere. Though not well received by the critics, the larger poems of this volume—Enoch Arden, Aylmer's Field and Sea Dreams—would seem to have won especially upon the affections of the general public. And in the Northern Farmer, Old Style, the poet displayed an unexpected gift for dramatic monologue in dialect, of which he subsequently gave several other effective specimens.

Tennyson had incontestably so much of the dramatic artist in him—he could represent with singular truthfulness an individual type taking the world into his confidence, laying bare his soul in appropriate and expressive speech. Whether he could also bring together a varied assemblage of characters, and happily combine their actions, passions and humours to the effective exhibition of “a just and lively picture of human nature,” remained to be seen, and for nine years the bulk of his work was a dogged effort to demonstrate that he could. Between 1875 and 1881 he published six plays, Queen Mary, Harold, The Falcon, The Cup, The Promise of May, and Becket, all of which, except Harold, were, or have been since, also brought out on the stage, one or two with considerable, and Becket with brilliant, success. The result, however, remains doubtful. All that can yet be safely said is that his art distinctly improved as he went on, his Becket, a full drama of the historical class, marking a clear advance on its predecessors.

Happily, dramatic work was far from absorbing his energies during this time. In 1880 a volume of Ballads and other Poems, containing such masterly work as Rizpah, The Northern Farmer (new style), The Revenge, and The Defence of Lucknow, was given to the world. And in the next decade three more appeared, which Idylls and other Poems in 1885, Locksley Hall, Sixty Years (1854), and in Demeter and other Poems in 1890. Their various contents, such as Teiresias and The Progress of It is a high distinction were of earlier composition, but the vast highest, cannot yet be recent work. No doubt a falling off is brilliant epic on the first these, The Charge of the Heavy Brigade (1885) must lose by comparison with its companion piece of earlier birth. But Tennyson could lose and yet excel, in Despair, The Spinster's Secret-arts, To Virgil, and Early Spring—all of the 1885 volume—the loss is not obvious, the excellence unmistakable, the later Locksley Hall bears little mark of age but its wisdom, and the Demeter volume, besides its name-giving poem, offers in Fastness, The Ring, and The Throstle achievement that would add lustre to any poet's prime. And in the deathless verses that close the volume, Crossing the Bar, the one manlike attitude of man towards Death is given with an impressiveness that has made it the most moving poem of the age.

In 1884 he had been offered and had accepted a peerage, being the first Englishman ennobled by the State for intellectual pre-eminence only. His life had passed smoothly—though often saddened by the death of a friend, and once, in 1886, heavily clouded by the loss of his younger son—in an opulence such as unaided poetry had never before brought one of her children. And the year that was to end his earthly course was also to heighten his renown. Early in 1892 he surprised the world with one more drama, The Firesters, a woodland pastoral in four acts on the story of Robin Hood, which was produced simultaneously in New York and London, and was enthusiastically received. In the autumn, after he had entered his eighty-fourth year, yet another volume from his pen was announced. But when this was almost ready for publication, his slowly sinking physical powers unexpectedly gave way, and he died in the early morning of October 6, at Aldworth, the house near Haslemere he had built for himself in 1868 as an occasional residence. Some days later his body was borne to its grave in the Poet's Corner amid a ceremonial of unwonted solemnity and grandeur. And before the month had ended, his voice was once more heard in The Death of Chaucer and other Poems, and heard with nearly all its old nervous strength, if with something less than its old music and depth. Most of the pieces thus published are the products of extreme old age, but evince no touch of senility, the weakest of them bears the firm impress of the master's hand. The last, upon the Duke of Clarence's death, is a graceful example of the composing terseness of his occasional elegiac strain, which is also exemplified in the few brief epitaphs he wrote.

The fate of Tennyson's writings in the future, the future only can show. But he has been to his own age much more than any other poet has ever been to his, he has been not only a pure-well-head of noblest song, but also an unfading spring of comfort, stimulus, and power towards the worthiest ends. No other English poet has ever been in such close and sympathetic touch, not with Nature and Man alone, but with so many sides of contemporary life, in such intimate intelligence with the most beneficent forces of his age. This age has found in his verse a melodious voice for its thoughts, longings, and aspirations, but has found something better also, a corrective, if it will only listen, to much that is unsound and dangerous in these. Whatever posterity may think of him, he has laid his contemporaries under a debt of gratitude that could hardly be exaggerated.

§ 13 The poetic gifts of the first Lord Lytton reappeared, amplified and embellished, in his only son, EDWARD ROBERT, Earl of LYTTON (1831-1891). But, in the field of letters, his poetic gifts excepted, the second Lord Lytton, all-accomplished as he was, showed, as a genius, little of his father's versatility. On history, however, he has left a much deeper mark than his father, high imperial concerns divided his energies with poetry through well nigh his whole life. After a formal education limited to Harrow and Bonn, he entered the diplomatic service, at Washington, when barely eighteen, and rising through its successive grades—doing in the process work of varying importance in nearly every European capital—he happened, in 1876, to be our minister at Lisbon. There Mr Disraeli surprised him with an offer of the viceroyalty of India. He accepted, and made the four years that followed memorable in imperial politics by the resolute thoroughness with which he pursued a line of conduct which was bitterly assailed by the Opposition at home, but on which time, to all appearance, is now setting her seal. Resigning, with his Tory friends in England, in 1880, he was created an earl, but for seven years had no public employment.

Lytton was a precocious versifier, showing facility and fluency, and even sparkle, as a rhymers when but twelve years old. His first work was written before he went to Washington, though not published till 1856. It was called Olytemnestra, the Earl's Return, and other Poems, and appeared under the pseudonym of Owen Meredith, which he continued to use as his name in letters for some time. Next came The Wanderer, a volume of lyrics, in 1857, this was followed, in 1860, by Lucile, and this again, in 1861, by Tannhäuser, or the Battle of the Bards, of which he was, as Edward Trevor, only part author, his friend, Julian Fane, being, as Neville Temple, also responsible. In most of these compositions the poet showed himself brilliant—at times even dazzling—easy, graceful, effective, full of fancy and fire, in possession, seemingly, of the most telling characteristics of the born singer. But he was the victim of a fatal plasticity under the influence of others, the voice and spirit of Browning are the expressive forces in the first, those of Tennyson in the last. Lucile was an interesting experiment, to show that the story of a French novel could be powerfully told in English ana-past, but the author lived to express regret that he had made it. Yet in some pieces original genius could be distinctly seen struggling under its incumbrances, and the critical world continued to hope. But two of the next three volumes were almost avowed imitations, Serbski Pesme (1861) of Servian national songs, and Orval, or the Fool of Time (1869), of a Polish writer, and the third, Chronicles and Characters (1868), too obviously owed its existence to Hugo's "Legends of the Ages." All three are, however, strong and splendid work. If it was Lytton's fate to be a mocking bird, the result has all the effect of a natural and spontaneous product. At last his Fables in Song (1874) justified, in the main, the hopes of his friends. They showed a light and heat unborrowed of any sun, and were given an honourable place among original verse. But the next publications, Glenaveril (1885) and After Paradise (1887), were disappointing, the former, a kind of novel in metre, though abounding in excellence, did not take with the public, the latter, which is a gathering of metrical legends and parables, is a small affair. Sent as ambassador to Paris in 1887, he died there in 1891, pen in hand, and writing verse. The volume thus suddenly closed appeared later on as Marah, but in the lyrics that composed it men detect the note of Heine. One more chance remained, in 1874 he had written, and not ceased till death to labour at the perfecting of, King Poppy. In December, 1892, this was published, and proved the long-promised triumph. In design, construction, execution and aim, King Poppy attests the presence of the best powers of an original poet. Criticism has nothing but praise for it.

§ 14 Science and Poesy, we are told, are in the very nature of things opposites, yet Browning and the mightiest scientific spirit of his age were alike endowed with, and had as a condition of their peculiar greatness, an eye of preternatural vigilance and acuteness. The name of CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN (1809-1882) has, besides the literary quality that appears in his writings, the intimate connexion with literature of a writer that has changed the whole complexion of literary thought on matters of the last interest and importance. Darwin was born at Shrewsbury, and was the grandson of two notable men, Erasmus Darwin, of Lichfield, and Josiah Wedgwood, of Etruria. First intended for the medical (his father's) profession, he was sent to Edinburgh University, but his aversion to some of its unavoidable studies moved his father to transfer him, in 1821, to Christ's College, Cambridge, with a view to his entering the Church. This purpose faded from his mind, and having by his turn for scientific enquiries brought himself under the notice of the Botanical Professor, Henslow, he had no sooner graduated than, at Henslow's instance, he became naturalist in the Beagle, then appointed to make a surveying voyage round the world. The voyage lasted nearly five years (Dec 1831—Oct 1836), and the work Darwin did upon it proved the making of his genius, and the basis of his fruitful speculations in the future. His first series of publications were also its outcome, of which that now known as A Voyage of a Naturalist round the World, and first issued separately in 1845, has more than a purely scientific interest. In 1839 he had married his cousin, Miss Wedgwood, and in 1842 had settled to the life's work of secluded research at Down, in Kent, which he was to pursue "without haste or rest" for forty years. He was just fifty when its first astonishing result, the two volumes entitled Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, was, in 1859, placed before the public. Their reception of it, the repugnance and panic it raised in certain quarters, the fierce resistance these offered it at first, and their reluctant submission and eventual reconciliation to its positions, the long doubtful attitude of portions of the scientific world itself, and the ultimate triumph the book won over hostile criticism, are now among the tritest commonplaces of history. One or two other publications, chiefly designed to strengthen the central position of the Origin of Species, followed, and then, in 1871, Darwin's second great achievement, the Descent of Man, was given to the world, in which the likelihood of our ancestor being "a hairy quadruped furnished with a tail and pointed ears, probably arboreal in his habits," was demonstrated to the satisfaction of most biologists. The sensation and antagonism it provoked were mild as compared with the storm of twelve years before, but it profoundly and permanently impressed the thoughts of thinking men on the most vital questions. Thus the great doctrine of evolution that now comes so readily to every one's lips was first made current. Henceforth the habits of plants, already treated by him in more than one publication, mostly engaged his attention, on these he published several books. But his latest and, perhaps, next to his great two, most interesting, effort, was an exposition of the value of earthworms in the earthly economy, on this he published his famous monogram in 1881. On April 19th, 1882, he died at Down, and, a week later, was buried with every mark of a nation's reverence in Westminster Abbey. Among English men of Science who have revolutionized the very stuff of thought in one of its most important provinces, only one other can be supposed to have been as great as Darwin.

§ 15 About the same time a method near akin to Darwin's was applied, with an acuteness and success hardly less than his, to the elucidation of early law and custom, and their meaning for the present time, by Sir HENRY JAMES SUMNER MAINE (1822-1888), one of the most discerning and constructive intellects of the century.

SIR HENRY is also eminent among those remarkable for their efficiency both in public business and in speculative enquiry. His career indicates this, it was, all through, an unbroken course of academic and state appointments, held for many years even simultaneously. The son of an Oxfordshire physician, and a pupil of Christ's Hospital, Maine was unusually distinguished at Cambridge, became, when only twenty-five, Regius Professor of Civil Law there, and, when thirty-two, Reader in Jurisprudence at the Middle Temple. The outcome of his labours in this capacity was his first book, Ancient Law, published in 1861, perhaps the most important work on its subject written in English. Seldom has such a theme been handled in so masterly a fashion, or so fascinating a book been made out of such unpromising materials. By a strict adherence to the comparative and historic methods, as distinguished from the a priori reasonings or elaborate guesses of preceding times, it shed a stream of new and unexpected light on "the connexion" of ancient law "with the early history of society and its relation to modern ideas." The very completeness of its success has dimmed the fame of the author, its positions, once so original, being now so familiar as to seem nothing extraordinary. Maine sprang at once into notoriety. Sent in consequence to India in 1862 to become a Member of the Council there, he gained thereby the ready means of making his second notable book, Village Communities in the East and West, published in 1871, in which the evolution of much that is characteristic in later social organization is traced to a primitive institution not yet extinct. Though the central principle of this book has been vigorously disputed, its exceptional interest to the historical and general student is beyond dispute. His third publication, which took place in 1875, and is called The Early History of Institutions, was the outcome of a professorship which Oxford had practically founded for him in 1871, in which year he had also been knighted and appointed to a seat in the Indian Council at home. The professorship he exchanged in 1878 for the Mastership of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, the public post he retained till his death. Dissertations on Early Law and Custom, which appeared in 1883, was his last addition to the literature of his special subject, and worthily upheld his reputation. Two years later, his latest but not least valuable service to correct thought was rendered—Popular Government, a republication of articles contributed to 'The Quarterly,' which made a deep impression when published, and is full of profitable matter for the coming time. But this is almost equally true of everything that Sir Henry produced.

§ 16 Second to Darwin's only in this age was the scientific reputation of SIR RICHARD OWEN (1804-1892), the record of whose massive labours and tale of their results, authentic as they are, almost pass the bounds of credibility. A native of Lancaster, and a student for some years at the University of Edinburgh, Owen came to London in 1825, and having qualified himself there for the surgical profession, began practice in 1826. Already, however, a skilled anatomist, he was soon drawn into more befitting work, in 1828 he was induced to accept the trust of making the famous Hunterian collection available for systematic study and research. From that year till he retired, fifty-five years later, a still unexhausted veteran, from the active service of science, he toiled at his congenial task of widening the area of special knowledge with an energy and patience that have never been surpassed, first as an arranger and expositor of the Hunterian collection, then as Professor of Comparative Anatomy, successively or simultaneously, to St Bartholomew's Hospital, the College of Surgeons, and the Hunterian Museum, and finally as Superintendent of the Natural History Department of the British Museum. In anatomy and in paleontology, in the whole spacious kingdom of animal biology, his investigations were incessant, and his publications frequent and voluminous beyond all precedent, for reconstructive insight his name became proverbial, as Professor Owen, he was credited with almost miraculous sagacity in the restoration of undiscovered or extinct animal types from the scantiest materials. It is true that his unfriendly attitude towards Darwinism somewhat estranged the younger scientific generation from him in later life, but his public influence and general estimation with the illustrious at home and abroad remained unshaken, as the honours and other tokens of esteem that were lavished upon him from various parts of the world sufficiently show. But in the portentous list of his printed writings no work appears that appeals to the general reader, Science is in sole possession in every page.

§ 17 Oxford has been credited of late years with the formation of a special school of historians called after its name; and undoubtedly the bulk of the ablest and most productive historical workers of our time have been of Oxford training, and in some instances teachers also at Oxford. But there seems to be no sufficient ground for regarding these as a distinct school. At any rate, in the leading forerunner of these men, Sir FRANCIS PALGRAVE (1788-1861), Oxford had no part. Palgrave was the son of a London Jew named Cohen, and so called himself till his marriage in 1823. The first years of his working life were passed in a solicitor's office, but his turn for historical and kindred studies even then asserted itself, especially in the editing of some Anglo-Norman verse. Called to the Bar in 1827 he soon took rank as an approved authority in pedigree cases. After proving his mettle in a short History of the Anglo-Saxons (1831), in 1832 he issued the first of the two great his ambition to the production of a single volume. On this he expended his entire available energy and care for nearly five years, amid circumstances of heavy depression and difficulties that only the strong conviction of a strong heart could have overcome, writing large portions of it over and over again, cancelling, correcting, revising, seldom satisfying himself, and often in despair of even a moderate measure of success. In this way A Short History of the English People, published in 1874, came into existence. What an unexampled success it proved need not be again told. There is undoubtedly much in it to merit this success, however fair a mark for criticism it may be in several material respects, it is obviously a creation of fine genius.

The Short History was afterwards expanded, and, between 1877 and 1880, issued in four volumes as a History of the English People. Mr Green married in 1877, and his life was sufficiently prolonged to give him time to compose two other historical volumes of singular value, The Making of England (1882), and The Conquest of England, published after his death. These are detailed accounts—to which every form of pertinent scholarship has been made to contribute—of the creation and early growth of our nation, the first ending with the triumph of Egbert, the second with that of William the Conqueror. To what extent these volumes will achieve for their writer's memory the reward due to his self-sacrificing devotion in their composition, cannot yet be safely predicted.

§ 19 A very striking, if not equally strong, personality among our historians of this generation was EDWARD AUGUSTUS FREEMAN (1823–1892). The son of a gentleman living in Worcestershire, Freeman was educated at private schools and Trinity College, Oxford, of which he became a scholar in 1841, and, though graduating with only a second class, was elected Fellow in 1845. Losing his fellowship in 1847 through his marriage, and being already provided with a sufficient income, he found a congenial occupation in study and research, chiefly architectural and historical, and was not long in converting them into the means of a distinguished career. It is a curious fact, and may be held significant of the age, though not of the man, that almost his first attempt to catch the public ear was made through a volume of verse, of which he was joint-author with a friend also destined to high distinction in letters. It was published in 1850, was seemingly fashioned on the model of Macaulay's lays, took its subjects from Greece, the Moorish wars and the Conquest, and was called Poems, Legendary and Historical. This, however, must have been a virtual freak, for poetry he cared little at any time, architecture was then his favourite study, and his History of Architecture had of his knowledge, but also the unbridled dominion which his sins of diffuseness and iteration had gained over him. Yet it is a splendid, if unwieldy, work. Appointed, in 1883, Regius Professor of History at Oxford, he continued for some years to send books to the press that were usually made up of lectures given in that capacity, of these The Methods of Historical Study and The Chief Periods of European History, both belonging to 1886, are fair samples. Not a few others, however, of several sorts and sizes, showed how easily he could throw off different kinds of strong work in his darling subject.

But the largest of his schemes was yet to be undertaken. Such was still his energy and faith in his own powers that in his last years he set to work on a History of Sicily, designed on a scale that a dozen thick volumes would scarcely have satisfied, and in 1891 he gave two to the world. A third was soon after announced, and the promise of eventual success began to look less delusive. But on March 16, 1892, the historian died after a short illness at Alicante, in Spain. An insatiable student of historic grounds and sites, he had been, especially of late years, a frequent and eager traveller on the Continent, and he was in quest of new fields for his favourite recreation when he fell a victim to the small-pox. The volume announced was published soon afterwards.

A friendly hand has summed up Freeman's "characteristic and conspicuous merits as an historian" as "love of truth, love of justice, industry, sense, breadth of view, and power of vividly realizing the past." Unbiased criticism will doubtless qualify some points of this judgment, yet substantially confirm the whole of it. It was his misfortune, however, to be a mere historian from this limitation and from his strange vehemence of nature sprang his worst defects. History was an overmastering passion with him, it possessed him, narrowing his vision by its very breadth, and blinding his sense of other things by its very light. "History is only past politics," he said. He would perhaps have been a better historian had he been less of a politician, or had he known history less and general literature more. His manner of writing is eminently plain, direct, and clear, but it is stiff and monotonous, the subject has no power over it. Nor do we owe him any gratitude for his writing partly in the English of earlier centuries and other languages than current English, such as classical Greek represented by Roman letters. But for solid and certain knowledge gained we are deeply indebted to him.

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS.

OTHER POETS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

WILLIAM BLAKE (1757-1827), the astonishing artist whose genius was near allied to, if not actually inspired by, madness, was also occasionally a poet of touching tenderness, sweetness, and simplicity, who practised the principles of Wordsworth when Wordsworth was yet a boy. But much of his verse is hopelessly unintelligible, being the outcome seemingly of sheer delirium, though power is a manifest presence in it throughout. Beginning, in 1783, with Poetical Sketches, he next turned, in 1787, to the Songs of Innocence and, in 1789, The Book of Thel, which were followed, in 1790, by The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, and that, in 1791, by The Songs of Experience—all of which were engraved and illustrated by himself, for he only once allowed a work of his to be printed. But these form only a portion of his publications in verse, which were as extraordinary in number and name as in kind. Blake's poetry has risen into high interest and esteem of late, and many of his smaller pieces clearly deserve all the praise they get, their childlike innocence and delicate humanity must always appeal to every sensitive heart. Nor is there any disputing the strength of his imagination, unbridled as it is. But even his admirers admit the bulk of his writings to be "dark and chaotic to the extreme degree"—these can live only as a wonder and a puzzle.

WILLIAM THOMAS (1786-1848) was a Fife-shire schoolmaster who grew into a Professor at St. Andrews. In 1812 he published a clever mock-heroic poem in ottava rima, called Auster Furr, which is curious, not merely for its undoubted merit, but as offering an example of a style and manner which anticipated, if it did not suggest, that of the more celebrated Whistlercrafts (see p. 476).

SIR AUGUSTUS HUNT DE VENE (1788-1816) was an Irish country gentleman of the county Limerick, who changed his name from Hunt to De Vere in 1832. His verse was of a quality to recommend him to the acquaintance of Wordsworth, with whom he frequently corresponded. He holds an honourable place among the lesser poets; indeed, his Sonnets, which Wordsworth held to be "the most perfect of our age," might be thought to entitle him to a higher rank. His Jultan the Apostle (1822), a dramatic poem, and Mary Tudor (1847), a regular drama, are in best esteem next to the Sonnets.

BARRY WALTER PROCTER (1787-1874), who called himself Barry Cornwall in literature, and was an amiable and sociable man, who was loved by Lamb and lived to be loved by Mr Swinburne, was a London solicitor, and for many years a Commissioner of Lunacy. His continuous race as a poet was short yet productive. Starting in 1819 with Dramatic Scenes, he ended for the time, in 1823, with The Flood of Thessaly. And he only once ventured again with his English Songs, published in 1832. Upon this collection such fame as fell to his lot was chiefly to rest. And in large measure this has come to him from his brother poets and men of letters, their regard for the man possibly colouring their judgment of his verse. He ranks as one of the most impersonal of our poets, being specially fond of identifying himself with emotions and situations to which his actual nature was least akin. Of this propensity the most popular of his English Songs, "The Sea! the Sea! the open Sea!" is an amusing illustration, for he hated the sea.

A tenderer interest attaches to the name of his daughter, ADelaide ANNE PROCTER (1825-1864), among whose Legends and Lyrics (First Series, 1858, Second, 1862) are several pieces of much beauty and intensity of feeling. Most of them first appeared in Household Words, their dominant note is strongly religious. Miss Procter having become a Roman Catholic. The best known, A Lost Chord and Per pacem ad lucem, fairly indicate their general character.

In his verses to Barry Cornwall's memory, Mr Swinburne associates with his theme the memory also of SYDNEY DOBELL (1824-1874), whose work was of quite another texture than Procter's. Dobell was born in Kent, but for the best part of his life was a wine merchant at Cheltenham. His chief writings, The Roman, Balder, and England in Time of War, appeared between 1850 and 1856. The Roman, as manifesting strong sympathy with Italy, hit the humour of the hour, and gained some applause, and more than one esteemed critic still professes to find sound poetical stuff in it, and in Balder. But the ridicule Dobell provoked by his extravagances of metaphor and contortions of sentiment and diction, and his association with the Spasmodic School (v infra), soon raised a strong prejudice against his verse, despite "its intensity of thought, freshness, depth, and width of sympathy," which no effort of criticism has yet been able to overcome.

In the leading representative of the Spasmodic School, ALEXANDER SMITH (1830-1867), there was perhaps more genuine power than in Dobell. Smith was a young Scotsman of humble birth, whose Life Drama and Other Poems, published in 1853, contained such clear evidence of genius, amid all their amazing vagaries of thought and language, as to be deemed worthy of a parody from the keenest Edinburgh wit, who fastened upon them the epithet "spasmodic," which could never be shaken off. Yet neither could their poet be crushed, in 1857 his City Poems, and in 1861 his Edwin of Deira, proved both his courage and the continuance of his poetic gift though still defaced by faults fatal to their permanence.

The wit whose ridicule keeps these in remembrance, WILLIAM EDMONDSTOUNE AYTOUN (1813-1865), was a member of the Scottish Bar who was also Professor of Rhetoric in the University of Edinburgh and already a prominent name in the literature of verse. His Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers, so deservedly popular with lovers of spirited poetry and the daring and picturesque in history, was published in 1843, and the celebrated Bon Gaultier Ballads which he wrote in partnership with Sir Theodore Martin—a book dear to admirers of parody—in 1855. Aytoun was solely responsible for the weightier stroke with the same weapon that had, the year before, been aimed at Alexander Smith Firmilian or the Student of Badajos, a Spasmodic Tragedy. He also wrote Bothwell (1856) and in 1859 produced, again in association with his illustrious fellow-parodist, an excellent volume of translations from the Poems and Ballads of Goethe. He was the author, besides of several humorous stories and other papers, which appeared first in Blackwood, and of an instructive novel, Norman Sinclair. He was the son-in-law of Professor Wilson.

THOMAS LOVELL BEDDOES (1803-1849) had good success in a kind of verse that few excel in and only a few care for—the spectral and gruesome. He was a son of Dr Thomas Beddoes, the eminent Clifton physician, and early friend of Coleridge, and his mother was Maria Edgeworth's sister. He passed nearly the whole of his mature life abroad, and died, under some suspicion of having had a hand in his death, at Basle. Beddoes, in very early youth published two poems of scant merit, after that nothing in English. The moderate, but still real, celebrity attaching to his name, was the outcome of two posthumous publications, Death's Jest Book, issued in 1850 and Poems in 1851. The characteristic note of Beddoes's habitual mood is indicated in the former of these titles, graves, ghosts and winding sheets, and their numerous kin, make the staple of his verse, which is certainly of good quality in its kind. It has had several admirers of the wisest sort, and Mr Browning among the warmest.

A more famous trafficker in the supernatural and the things that belong to it, was RICHARD FRANCIS BARNHAM (1788-1845) perhaps the cleverest weaver of grotesque rhymes and most cunning contriver of drolleries of thought and speech that ever used English verse, at least, below Hood alone. Barnham was a clergyman, and connected with St Paul's and several city parishes or clerical offices from 1821 till his death. He had brought out two novels, and written other things, with little recognition when, in 1837, Dickens enlisted him in the service of the projected Bentley's Miscellany. He was thus set upon the writing of the widely-renowned Ingoldsby Legends, the first series of which, after appearing partly in Bentley and partly in The New Monthly, was first published by itself in 1840, the second and third not till after Barnham's death. For nearly half a century this singular work had a splendid popularity, and is still extensively read. It forms, perhaps, the largest richest, and rarest single fountain of versified mirth we have, not always indeed in the best taste, and too often irreverent, but excessively amusing.

of the Tweed whose poems bid fair to rank as classics of their kind. A native of the Vale of Blackmore, Barnes did not take orders till he was forty six, and had been a lawyer's clerk and a schoolmaster in different places. For the greater part of his clerical life he was Rector of Winterbourne. Came in his native county. His Poems of Rural Life in the Dorset Dialect appeared in three separate collections, issued at intervals, and were first published in a single volume in 1879. They consist of some hundred of pieces, severally purporting to afford "glimpses of life and landscape in Dorset" and delightful to all lovers of such life most of them are. A good judge has placed them "amongst the most varied in subject, the most perfect in form, the purest and sweetest in tone, which our literature contains."

SIR HENRY TAYLOR (1800-1886) was long a valuable servant of the Crown in the Colonial Office, and for two generations the common friend of almost every worthy type of man of letters, of Mr Swinburne as formerly of Southey. His earliest products in verse, Isaac Comnenus (1832) and Philip van Artevelde (1834), both dramas were directed towards the exemplification of a more chastened and dignified spirit in poetry than that in fashion at the time, and in the opinion of some, the success fully justified the attempt. Those works have had considerable vogue among the best class of readers ever since their appearance, and are not likely soon to lose their reputation. His next volume, also a drama, Edwin the Fair, published in 1842 had the same aim, and was at least equally successful, and the same may be said of his later poem, The Eve of the Conquest. And there were others of a similar stamp to follow. Taylor acquitted himself creditably in prose-writing also, in The Statesman (1836) he "gives advice to Sulla" from the stores of his own experience, in Notes from Life (1847) he instructs the generality from the same source, and in Notes from Books (1849) he gives the world the benefit of his views, chiefly on poetry, and mainly on that of Wordsworth. The instruction that lies in the last at any rate, is not yet exhausted. Shortly before his death he published his Recollections, a valuable and interesting record of a long and wide experience of men and matters of importance.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI (1828-1882), famed alike in painting and poetry, was the elder son of an Italian exile and half English mother, whose other children also came to distinction in letters. His brilliant power in both the pursuits of his life manifested itself even in boyhood, and their cultivation divided his attention for a time. Painting, however, got the mastery, as is evidenced by his having helped to found the Preraphaelite Brotherhood, once the wonder of a season or two. Among the several lofty designs he formed in the fervour of the new ideas, in 1850 he actually started The Germ, as a monthly organ, to spread their knowledge. This periodical died with its fourth number, but it brought Rossetti into notice. In it appeared his earliest published poems, one of which was The Blessed Damozel, now rated so high by some. Sister Helen, another cherished example of his peculiar manner, was printed in 1853. Yet his first volume, published in 1861, consisted of translations only. It was that now called Dante and his Circle, but then The Early Italian Poets. Nor did he let the public have a volume of his original verse till 1870, when Poems by D G R appeared, reaching a second edition the same year. And this had to be exhumed from the grave of his wife, with whose corpse he had buried it eight years before. In 1891 the public obtained from him a second volume of original verse, entitled Ballads and Sonnets, in which the sonnets form a single sequence, named The House of Life, and The Brides Prelude, Love Mary and The King's Tragedy are the only poems of any length. A very distinguished place in the development of English poetry has been claimed for Rossetti by high critical authority. But the only verdict that can be accepted as conclusive, that of Time, has not yet been pronounced.

SIR SAMUEL FERGUSON (1810-1896) was of Belfast birth, a successful Irish barrister and Celtic antiquary of wide local and some general renown, which he fully deserved. In this last character he wrote several poems of great spirit, hearty patriotism and genuine learning as his Lays of the Western Gael (1865) and Congal (1876), a long but striking composition in five books, will amply testify. But his name among the poets is likely to flourish or fade with men's future appreciation of The Forging of the Anchor. In 1867 Ferguson was made the first Deputy Keeper of the Records in Ireland and

In 1878 was knighted for the good work he had done.

JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS (1840-1893) was a poet, critic, and historian of wide scholarship and extensive reading, who laboured long and earnestly to interpret the Italian Renaissance and the mind of Italy to his countrymen, and did some valuable work on the literature of Greece and England as well. Like Beddoe, he was the son of a Clifton doctor of great local and some general celebrity. After a distinguished career at Oxford, where he became a Fellow of Magdalen, he was driven by failing health to live at Davos-platz in Switzerland, where he studied and wrote for sixteen years with much assiduity. To the various Sketches and Studies—on Dante, on The Greek Poets, and other subjects—already published, he there added the bulk of his voluminous work, entitled Pennance in Italy (1875-1886), Shakespeare's Predecessors in the English Drama (1884) a monograph of poorish quality on Shelley, a much better one on Philip Sidney, several excellent translations of Italian works of established repute Animi Figuræ, and one or two other volumes of poems original or translated, an elaborate Life of Michael Angelo (1892), and other publications not a few. All are the outcome of careful work and show some effective and much brilliant writing. Mr Symonds had succeeded in attaining a peculiar style of chequered character, often rich, pungent and vigorous but not seldom luxuriant to the verge of rankness.

The poetry of vehement feeling has been enriched by some posthumous pieces of EMILY BRONTË (1819-1848), the second of the three famous Brontë sisters, and author of that strange novel, Wuthering Heights—which will not soon die if criticism can keep it alive; that of devotional sentiment by several publications of DORA GREENWELL (1821-1892), of which Carmina Crucis (1869) is esteemed the best, and that of plain, spontaneous, native grace by some songs and other lyric effusions of WILLIAM ALLINGHAM (1828-1889), whose Misc-Master and Other Poems and Day and Night Songs appeared in 1850 and 1854 respectively. Mr Allingham was of Ulster birth, and long a respected man of letters in London, but his most ambitious effort, Laurence Bloomfield in Ireland, is not usually regarded as a success either as a poem or a shedder of light on the Irish problem.

Mention at least, is due to our one inimitable imitator in verse, GEORGE DARLEY (1705-1846), also an Irishman, whose exquisite lyric, known as The Loveliness of Love, was actually taken by our most sagacious judge of such things into a well-known collection as a specimen of the best work of its kind of the seventeenth century. And the real article offers no better. Darley did some good editing, especially on Beaumont and Fletcher. His poems have been lately reprinted under an editor of high rank in letters. A place too must be found for CHARLES STUART CALVERLEY (1833-1884), a curious character and rare parodist whose Trees and Translations (1862), and Fly Leaves (1872), contain much that enriches the fund of national mirth.

OTHER HISTORIANS

JOHN MITCHELL KEMBLE (1807-1857) was a son of Charles Kemble the actor and therefore nephew of the mere illustrators John Philip and of Mrs Siddons. At Trinity College Cambridge, where he was educated, he gained the friendship of Tennyson and the distinction of a sonnet—To J M K—from the young poet. From the destiny, however that this marked out for him he turned away and plunged into the study of Anglo-Saxon and of history, especially early English, and in these and adjoining fields of labour—and to some extent in general literature also—he found work for the rest of his life. His researches opened the way to those sounder and more scientific conceptions of the beginnings of our history that are now in vogue and by his Codex Diplomaticus Ævi Saxonici he laid scholar, and by The Saxons in England (1849) all historical students of the period under the heaviest obligations. It is true that the glory of the latter has paled somewhat before subsequent research, but its value is still great.

THOMAS HENRY BUCKLE (1821-1862) is a possibly singular instance of a vigorous thinker and historian of boundless reading whose mind received little or no formal training in youth. Born into an opulent London family, and an only son, he was, owing to extreme delicacy, brought up almost altogether at home and without a tutor, having no other reading than the Bible, Shakespeare, the Pilgrim's Progress and the Arabian Nights. When nineteen, his father having died, he travelled for a year, learning languages with miraculous rapidity, and stocking a most capacious memory with various knowledge. On returning home he gave up the business intended for him, surrounded himself with books, and abandoned himself to study, and became an advanced free-thinker and radical. But the general public knew nothing of him till the appearance, in 1857, of his first volume of History of Civilization in England, when he at once became a man of mark, though the production roused much controversy and more antagonism than approbation. Nor did the interest in it decline, new editions were called for, and the second volume, which followed in 1861, was also widely read, and with the same mingled feelings as the first. This was no evanescent interest either, as the steady demand for the united work through the next twenty years testifies. Subsequently, however, its popularity began to flag, and shows as yet no signs of rekindling. Buckle essays to treat history scientifically, and in the spirit and with the methods of an unbending utilitarian. The portion written is but the fragment of an introduction, whose specific aim is the discovery of the fundamental laws of European thought, which in the body of the work were to be applied to the History of England. It is distinguished by the emphasis of its opinions, the energy of its hatreds, and its seeming command of universal knowledge. Buckle owed his death to his love of travel, sinking under a fever at Damascus.

HENRY, LORD BROUGHAM (1779-1868), the indefatigable politician, philosopher, and man of science, could not rest till he had demonstrated his faculty as a critic and historian also. Among the publications that were the outcome of this ambition, three are in some repute—three series of Historical Sketches of Statesmen in the Time of George III (1839-43), two series of Lives of Men of Letters and Science of the same reign (1845-6), and a History of England and France under the House of Lancaster (1852) published anonymously. The first and second must have considerable merits, being still used as authorities by eminent historians, the last is as shallow as it is pretentious.

SIR ARTHUR ALISON (1792-1867), though of Scottish parentage and education, happened to be born in Shropshire, where his father, an Anglican clergyman of the same name and author of certain yet unforgotten Essays on Taste, had a living at the time. Joining the Scottish Bar in 1814, he prospered there, and was eventually appointed Sheriff of Lanarkshire. From early manhood Alison thought and wrote much on financial matters, the currency, and population, and was a steady contributor to Blackwood, for which he also wrote some articles which grew into a Life of Marlborough (1862). Long before this he had established his name as an historian by his voluminous History of Europe from 1789 to 1815, on which he had been engaged for thirteen years (1829-42). Notwithstanding its huge bulk and heavy cost this work continued for years to have an immense sale, reaching a sixth edition in 1844, finding even in America hundreds of thousands of readers and an unabated demand in Britain for close upon a whole generation. He was thus encouraged to carry the enterprise further, and between 1852 and 1857 brought down the narrative to the occasion of Louis Napoleon (1851) in a work which also had an extensive sale. This enormous history is pervaded by a twofold moral motive—to exhibit the dangerous character of unchecked democracy, and the active presence of a controlling providence in human affairs. With all its many and glaring faults—of style of knowledge, and of spirit—it is a valuable work, indispensable indeed to the ordinary English reader who would know the entire story of an extraordinary time. In 1861, Lives of Lord Castlereagh and Sir Charles Stewart proved the last fruit of a most industrious career.

SIR ARTHUR HILLS (1813-1875) the son of a gentleman living at Balham, was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge. He passed his first active years in the service of one statesman after another, and discharged a succession of occasional public trusts at home and abroad; and eventually (1860) was made Clerk of the Privy Council. His talents and judgment gained him the good opinion of the Queen, to whom he henceforward acted as literary adviser and whose publications were made at his instance and under his supervision. Hills tried his skill in several kinds of composition, and seemed at one time to have gained a name of real distinction as an essayist and historian. Two series of essays on subjects of general interest, interspersed with conversations and entitled Friends in Council, were severally published in 1847 and 1859, and brought him into good liking even with the judicious, but their favour has now been for some time on the wane. Still, though commonplace in thought, they are agreeable and instructive reading. His claim to historical rank rests mainly on The Spanish Conquest in America (1855-1861), which, like everything he wrote, had a didactic purpose—the elucidation of the question of slavery and of the government of colonies. It is a well written and honest, if not profound, work, and has not yet been superseded. About a score of other publications, several still read, bear witness to his versatile faculty, among them a drama, Olivia the Serf, several novels, and a dozen miscellaneous volumes.

GEORGE FINLAY (1799-1875) was an Englishman of Scottish parentage, who gave his early manhood to the cause of Greek Independence, and after witnessing its triumph, bought an estate near Athens and lived the rest of his life there. Thence he occasionally contributed to Blackwood and other periodicals, and was for some years correspondent to The Times. There too he wrote the continuous story of the land of his adoption for the twenty preceding centuries—a work which supplied to scholars a new reading of great events, and to the curious reader an historical narrative of special interest and authenticity. It was first issued as several distinct publications, but after the author's death these were combined and edited by Mr Tozer, and so published by the Clarendon Press under the title of A History of Greece from its Conquest by the Romans till the Present Time, B C 146 to A D 1864, in which form it seems certain to keep the recognition it has won as a sound, subtle and thorough if not specifically learned treatment of a large historical theme. It was, perhaps, the first to shake the ascendancy of Gibbon, and move educated historical opinion towards that more favourable view of the 'Greeks of the Lower Empire' that is now making way among intelligent students.

JONAS FORSTER (1812-1875) was the son of a cattle dealer of Newcastle-on-Tyne. Having given early proof of vigorous parts at school and with his pen, he was sent, when only sixteen, to London, where he studied law at University College, and was in time called to the Bar. But journalism and literature engaged his super-abundant energies from the first, he was for several years closely connected with the newspaper and periodical press, being successively editor of the Daily News and of The Examiner, and, though in later life a well paid official of the Linnæan Commission, he was all through an indefatigable biographer, historian and literary essayist. Ardently sympathising with the political Puritans he produced, between 1836 and 1839, his five volumes of his Statesmen of the Commonwealth for the Cabinet Cyclopædia. In 1848 his most pleasing work the Life of Goldsmith, appeared in one volume, and this, already twelve times written, he afterwards expanded into two, yet failed to damage its charm. Forster's is still the best and fullest book we have on Goldsmith. Two volumes of Historical and Biographical Essays were republished from the Quarterly and Edinburgh in 1858, and contain appreciative and attractive estimates of Defoe, Steele, Foote, and Churchill that are still of value. Thence he turned again to his earlier field, producing in 1860 two monographs of some pretensions, The Arrest of the Five Members and The Grand Remonstrance, and in 1861 the Life of Sir John Eliot in two volumes. Though careful studies, these works need cautious use, being defaced by partisanship and not always accurate. Two volumes of a Life of W. S. Landor, and three of a Life of Charles Dickens, published respectively in 1869 and 1871-4, completed the sum of Forster's finished undertakings. Forster was an intimate friend of these as of several other great contemporary writers, his biographies of them are therefore, the standard authorities on their subjects. His last enterprise, a Life of Swift was interrupted by death when but a single volume had been issued. In literary merit it is inferior to his Goldsmith alone.

WALTER FARQUHAR HOOK (1798-1875) was the son of a parish clergyman who became Dean of Worcester and a nephew of Theodore Hook the Wit. As a working clergyman at Coventry and at Leeds, of which latter place he was vicar for twenty-two years, he rose to a splendidly-earned celebrity that is still remembered with gratitude, while at the same time he grew into note as a forcible preacher and expounder of the historical continuity of the English Church. Many of his sermons were printed and widely read. Made Dean of Chichester in 1859, he devoted his leisure till his death to the composition of his great work, The Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, publishing the first volume in 1866, and sending the eleventh to the press a week before he died! This is substantially an ecclesiastical history of England from Augustine to Juxon (597-1663) in which the essential identity of the latest with the earliest form of the English Church is asserted with much force. Though not a work of fine scholarship, it is deservedly held in high esteem.

JOHN HILL BURTON (1809-1881) born at Aberdeen, was the son of a Scottish mother and a lieutenant in the army—an Englishman seemingly—who died early. Boyhood and early manhood was, therefore, something of a struggle to Burton, which, however, his mother's devotion, a dogged temper, and time brought him through with success. He became a member of the Scottish Bar. In 1846 he published his admirable Life of David Hume, which was followed in 1847 by Lives of Lord Lovat and Duncan Forbes of Culloden, also of much value. He also wrote on Law and Political Economy with some success.

In 1853 his History of Scotland from 1688 to 1746 came out, and this was in time seen to be but an instalment of his greatest undertaking, a complete History of Scotland from Agricola's invasion, which was finished in 1870, and forms his chief claim to the gratitude of historical students. Though inartistically constructed, and almost devoid of literary merit, this is an honestly studied, substantially accurate, and fairly exhaustive—and, with all its formal unattractiveness, wonderfully engaging—recital of the story of Scotland for seventeen hundred years. Long before this, his appointment as Secretary of the Prisons' Board, and later on that of Historiographer, lifted him above the necessity of writing for his bread. Yet his pen was not laid aside, his two pleasantest productions, The Book-Hunter (1866) and The Scot Abroad (1862)—both extensions of papers written for Blackwood—were the issue of this time of affluence. In these the man of letters is more distinctly seen than in any other of his works. His latest effort, A History of the Reign of Queen Anne, is a monument of decaying powers only.

JOHN HOSACK (died 1887) was a Scottish lawyer and legal writer, and at last a London police magistrate, whose Mary, Queen of Scots, and her Accusers (1869-1874), forms the fullest and most effective pleading we have in defence of that much-debated historical reputation.

In Philip Henry, LORD MACLAY and EARL STANHOPE (1805-1875), the union of modest pretensions with excellent work done in the best spirit is pleasingly illustrated. A graduate of Oxford, he wrote in youth a Life of Belsharius, and that History of the War of the Succession in Spain, which, when published in 1832, Macanlay made the occasion of a famous essay and subject of a not unfavourable criticism. And this was succeeded in 1836-54, by a History of England from the Peace of Utrecht to the Peace of Versailles, which is still our most satisfactory general account of the period dealt with. Long afterwards, he added the necessary link of connexion between this and Macanlay's great work by prefixing to it the Reign of Anne (1870) subsequently incorporated with the earlier volumes. The high qualities of the historian exemplified in the united work have been no less justly than tellingly expressed by Mr Lecky in the Preface to his work on the same period. Several other valuable contributions to his favourite study were made by Lord Stanhope, the most meritorious being the well-proportioned Life of William Pitt (1861-62) and the Miscellanies (1863). Few Englishmen have done sounder service to history and other intellectual interests than this high-minded and useful nobleman.

ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE (1809-1891) came of a Taunton family that lived by banking. He was educated at Eton, and, like so many coevals of subsequent distinction, at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was called to the Bar in 1837, and ever obtained some practice. Having made a tour in the East in 1835, he gave an account of it in Eastern, one of the cleverest and liveliest books of travel ever written—a record of adventure and various emotion that seeks, and with rare success, only to be entertaining. Always delighting in military history, he took care to be an eye witness of the war in the Crimea, and a fall from his pony at the battle of the Alma having introduced him to Lord Raglan, he afterwards undertook, at Lady Raglan's request, to narrate the course of the war till her husband's death. Kinglake executed his task in eight stout volumes, the first two of which appeared in 1863, the last two in 1887. The History of the Invasion of the Crimea till the death of Lord Raglan is, perhaps, the most detailed account ever given of an historical event, and the ablest military history ever written by one who was not a soldier. The vividness of description, exquisitely polished and glittering style, minute diligence in disengaging fact, and high spirit must long reconcile readers to its obvious faults.

THOMAS AUGUSTUS TROLLOPE (1810-1893), elder brother of Anthony Trollope, was a novelist of a different type from his brother but also an historian of considerable merit. The greater part of his working life was passed at Florence, and the vast bulk of his writings which amounted in all to a good core of publications were upon Italian subjects. In history his best known or most ambitious productions were Paul the Pope and Paul the Friar and a History of the Commonwealth of Florence in four volumes (1865). In fiction he did not attain the vogue of his brother, but his La Beata Marietta and several others passed through a good number of editions.

Several other writers of great worth have been recently lost to historical literature. EDWARD WILLIAM ROBERTSON (died 1874) a Scotsman who lived in England gave us in 1862 two volumes of a work on Scotland under Her Early Kings, and in 1872 a third of Historical Essays, that are both still deservedly rising in reputation. AGNES STRICKLAND (1796-1874) a lady of Suffolk birth, wrote in conjunction with her sister, The Lives of the Queens of England since the Norman Conquest (1810-1819), a work of great industry, much prejudice and little insight, which still finds admiring readers, and was followed by The Lives of our Bachelors Kings. SIR WILLIAM STIRLING MAXWELL (1818-1878) in several scholarly, full and appreciative publications, demonstrated to English minds the splendid side of the historical life of Spain in which his Cloister Life of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, Annals of the Artists of Spain, and Life of Don John of Austria must long remain our chief authorities on their subjects. JAMES SPEDDING (1810-1881), the J. S. of Tennyson's early verse, and the prince of historical specialists, exhausted in his seven volumes of The Letters and the Life of Francis Bacon (1861-74), and two other volumes of Baconian apologetics, a subject that might be thought incapable of exhaustion, as well as helped to edit Bacon's works in seven volumes more. SIR FRANKLIN MAY (1816-1886), eventually Clerk of the Commons and Lord Farnborough, published in 1861-3 a still unsupplanted Constitutional History of England since 1760, and in 1877 Democracy in Europe, which is not considered quite equal to the previous work. The Rev. JOHN SUEPLEN BIEWER (1810-1879), in editing State Papers for the Master of the Rolls, produced a priceless history of the first half of Henry VIII's reign, and also did valuable work on The Student's Hume. DR FREDERICK GUEST (1800-1880), long Master of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, earned the applause and gratitude of our foremost historical scholars by a succession of searching and luminous papers on the historical antiquities of our land, which were posthumously collected and published under the title of Origines Celtice.

India too as was natural, gave employment through the same time to not a few keen historical intellects. GEORGE DUFF's History of the Mahrattas. MOUNTSTUART ELPHINSTONE's History of India till 1761 published in 1811, and posthumous Rise of the British Power in the East in 1867, SIR JOHN WILLIAM KATE's Afghan War and Sepoy War. THORNTON's History of India and JOHN CLARK MARSHMAN's History of India, are solid additions to the literature of an extraordinary subject.

OTHER NOVELISTS AND MISCELLANEOUS WRITERS

JOHN STERLING (1806-1844), notable as the centre, for a brief space, of a brilliant intellectual circle, and the subject in consequence of an admirable biography by Carlie, was a son of Captain Edward Sterling, an Irishman who for several years was a distinguished editor of The Times. Sterling became early associated with The Athenæum, then took deacon's orders, but soon left the active service of the Church, next made some mark as a writer of periodical literature and fugitive verse, and still more as an eager and striking talker on the topics that had then most interest for thinking men. Though his life was broken by frailness of health and the constantly recurring necessity for change of place it imposed, he was for years a conspicuous figure in letters and lettered society, and an object of unusual admiration and affection to a varied group of remarkable men. Among his laboured efforts in verse the Tragedy of Strafford and The Election deserve mention, though neither succeeded with the public, and in the two volumes of Essays and Tales, issued after his death, the papers on Carlyle and Tennyson and The Onyx Ring are still worth reading.

HARRIET MARTINEAU (1802-1876) enjoyed a notoriety in her own day which began to wane even before her death. Of Norwich birth and French extraction, she dwelt for the greater part of her life near Ambleside, and wrote a great many books on a variety of subjects that brought her into repute as an historian, a novelist, an economist, a would-be leader of advanced thought, especially in religion, and as the typical strong-minded woman. Her numerous writings that strove to convey political and economical lessons through fictitious tales have fallen into the oblivion that is the portion of such things. Deerbrook, published in 1839, is, perhaps, the only one of her novels that has still the shadow of a name. Her History of the Thirty Years' Peace (1850) has shown more vitality. Little, however, is now heard of her Digest of Comte's Positive Philosophy, of her volume of letters attacking in alliance with some vanished shadow, all beliefs in religion, her later books on the wise management of life, and other enlightening productions. Her Biographical Sketches and Autobiography, of which the former were collected into a single volume in 1868, and the latter was published after her death, are likely to continue to prove her most serviceable works.

ELIZABETH CLEGHORN GASKELL (1810-1865) the daughter of a Treasury official who had once been a Unitarian Minister at Berwick, and wife of a Unitarian Minister at Manchester, did not begin to write till she was in her thirty-eighth year when she attracted public notice by her Vary Barton (1848) a novel of factory life. Her next marked success was Ruth (1853). None of her novels has shown a stronger lasting power than Cranford, published in a collected form the same year. But Sylvia's Lovers (1863), Cousin Phillis (1865) and Wives and Daughters have all in them the true human touch, and are still delightful to a few. Her biography of Charlotte Brontë (1865) evinces her gifts for another kind of writing, and remains the leading authority on its subject.

Another lively reputation of the same time that has not yet perished, was that of SAMUEL WANNEX (1807-1877), a student of medicine who became a barrister, and developed into an M.P., and at length into a Master in Lunacy. Having first made himself known by his Diary of a Late Physician (1840), he suddenly sprang into celebrity by publishing, in 1841, his novel of Ten Thousand a Year, which was a popular favourite for many years, and has not yet ceased to please. Professor Freeman had a great liking for it. Of Warren's later writings, Now and Then (1848) was on much the same level as the preceding, but The Ivy and the Bee (1851), which is a poem decidedly below it.

More than one of the publications of GEORGE BORROW (1803-1881) are still held in honour by critics of eminence, and indisputably Borrow was a very remarkable writer as well as man. His father was a recruiting officer, whose consequent slittings from place to place brought the son into contact with many varieties of life, even in boyhood. When in a lawyer's office at Norwich, he caught from William Taylor a passion for philology which determined his career. After a long experience of the usual hardships, and adventures in London, he took to wandering, first over England, and then over the rest of Europe and the East, generally in the character of agent to the Bible Society. Coming home and marrying he bought an estate, turned it into a sort of preserve for gypsies, and then made himself "the comet of a season" by his publication, in 1841, of The Gypsies in Spain, and, in 1842, of The Bible in Spain, both these works having that flavour of originality about them which captivates the critical humour. His next book Lavengro (1851), though decried by many, had much originality. He was henceforward the avowed champion of Bohemianism, in bitter feud with respectable literary society, and showing therein a somewhat reckless spirit, affecting both his thought and style. Yet his subsequent publications, Romany Rye (1857), Wild Wales (1862), and Homans Laro-Lil (1874), are credited by qualified judges with enough of the genuine spice of free genius to overpower our sense of their eccentricity and offences against good taste.

JOHN CONINGTON (1825-1869), the son of a Lincolnshire clergyman, educated at Rugby and Fellow of University College, Oxford, was for the last fifteen years of his life in high esteem as Professor of Latin at his own university. His taste and pregnant scholarship are attested by his widely-known edition of Virgil called therein Vergil. But his credit in English letters depends largely upon the deserts of his translations, particularly on those of The Odes of Horace and The Æneid of which the latter is a spirited, if doubtful attempt to reproduce the power of Virgil in the metre and manner of Scott. In his miscellaneous writings which, after his death were found sufficient to fill three volumes, there is much critical matter of high value, in Mr Courthope's opinion the essay on Pope is a model of sound and masculine criticism.

Couplings latest production was an English version, in the Spenserian stanza, of the second twelve books of the Iliad in completion of a task left unfinished by another fine tempered Oxford scholar of strong poetic sensibility, PHILIP STANHOPE WORSLEY (1831-1866) whose still earlier death blighted a promise that was at least equally fair. Worsley's translation of the first twelve into this metre was an experiment which the impression made by his version of half The Odyssey (1861) had encouraged him to try. Its rank high among modern translations from the classics.

Yet in this art, which is still the despair of imaginative scholars and erudite wits, it is thought that none has gone nearer success than the brilliant statesman, EDWARD GEOFFREY SMITH-STANLEY, Earl of DEBY (1799-1869) whose Translation of the Iliad into blank verse was generally hailed as excellent in more respects than any other, and amply entitled him to an honourable standing among noble authors.

RICHARD JEFFERIES (1818-1857), an untutored genius to whom Nature had given an eye of singular acuteness and a heart of singular sensibility, but whose worth was fully recognized only when lost, was the son of a Wiltshire farmer. After a boyhood of little education and some adventure, and an early manhood of service as a local journalist, and author of several novels and tragedies, which were all failures, he gradually crept into notice as an occasional writer on rural life and scenery, and at length clearly demonstrated his remarkable gifts as a naturalist and sympathetic observer of every form of country life by The Gamekeeper at Home (1877). This was followed by Wild Life in a Southern County, whose praise is still in the mouths of many. The immediate successors of these two were not so well received, but these again were followed by four works—Wood Magic, Deer, The Story of My Heart, and After London—in which the best powers of the naturalist and the novelist combine to secure him a high place in literature which is likely to be permanent.

GEORGE JOHN WHITE MELVILLE (1821-1878) was a gentleman of Fife, Eton boy, captain in the Coldstream Guards, and man of fortune who eventually settled down to the enjoyment and study of life, from the point of view of country house in Berkshire. He began his career as a novelist with Digby Grand (1853). This was pitched in the key he struck so persistently and successfully throughout, the life of the rich country house of the hunting field of buxant and bourgeois association with horses and dogs, found in him a hearty and unflagging interpreter. In this vein he kept writing producing some sixteen novels in all, till a fall in riding over a ploughed field appropriately finished his course. His books were exceedingly popular, especially it would seem General Pounce (1854), Kate Corentry (1856), and Katterfelto (1875).

GEORGE ALFRED LAWRENCE (1827-1876), the son of a clergyman, a Fugby boy, an Oxford man and a barrister, made in 1857, something of a sensation among readers of fiction by publishing anonymously, his novel of Guy Livingstone, or Thorough. The notoriety of this work lasted for several years and its author took advantage of its popularity to add to it about a dozen others before he died. Of these, Sword and Gown (1859) and Breakspare, or, the Fortunes of a Free Lance (1868), are fair examples. Guy Livingstone is an unabashed glorification of sheer physical strength, and is of questionable morality besides.

CHARLES PEASE, D.C.L. (1814-1884) was another man of brilliant parts, whose inflammable spirit and aggressive temper not seldom involved him in war with his fellows. After a distinguished University career in which he had been a Demy and then Fellow of Magdalen he became a barrister in 1843. Of his many contributions to the literature of prose fiction those in best esteem are Peg Woffington (1852), Christie Johnstone (1853), It is never too Late to Mend (1857), The Cloister and the Hearth (1861), Hard Cash (1863), and A Terrible Temptation (1871). Men themselves of high rank in letters are disposed to rate the best work of Read as very high.

IRVAN MARIE MULOCK (1826-1887) who was married in 1860 to Mr George Little Craik brought from her father's parsonage in Staffordshire a very different ideal of true manhood, though perhaps one that did not quite square with the reality either. Her first publication, The Opium (1849), found appreciative readers, her second Oliver (1850) received a warmer recognition. With John Halifax, Gentleman (1856), she achieved a success that may be called brilliant. Mrs Craik had a decidedly prolific pen, and her compositions which amount to a good two dozen novels and tales, and more than as many more miscellaneous publications, are all of unimpeachable correctness of principle. Criticism thinks best of A Life for a Life (1860); but Agatha's Husband and My Mother and I have also had a fair share of general admiration. It can hardly be denied that the world has been the better for this pure and wholesome writer.

General Sir EDWARD HUBERT HAMILLET (1824-1893) was an example, perhaps unique, of a consummate soldier both theoretical and practical, and of a versatile man of letters. His exhaustive and searching work, The Operations of War and services in the field and the lecture room that began in the Crimea, were matured in the Staff College, and ended in Egypt, testify to his having been the former. His Shakespeare's Funeral and Other Papers, The War in the Crimea his genial and altogether delightful parody of the Idylls of the King, entitled Sir Tray, and more than one other solid or sparkling contribution to the literature of knowledge or of intellectual gaiety, entitle him to a rank in literature.

Whether Time will discover anything so well care to keep in the heap of works of once popular fiction raised by HARRISON AINSWORTH, author of the Tower of London and Rookwood. WILLIE COLLINS, the noted disciple of Dickens and author of The Woman in White and The Moonstone, and Colonel MEADOWS TAYLOR, author of The Confessions of a Thug and Scots, time only can tell.

TO DAVID LIVINGSTONE (1817-1873) and WILLIAM GIFFORD PALGRAVE (1826-1893), no one adds to the literature of travel not easy to overrate, and to Sir

RICHARD INNES BURT (1821-1890), not only contributions of at least equal value to the same branch of knowledge, but also several monuments of literary scholarship, in particular, a translation of Camões's Lusads: The Book of the Sword, and an unflinching version of The Arabian Nights, luckily of a magnitude and costliness that ensures its limitation to a few.

PHILOSOPHERS AND DIVINES

RICHARD HUBERT FEOLDE (1803-1836) held a place among the men of the Oxford movement not unlike that which Sterling filled among his friends. The son of a Devonshire archdeacon, and eldest brother of Mr Froude the historian, he early became a pupil of Keble fellow of Oriel and bosom intimate of Newman and a frank and fearless apostle of his tutor's principles, and from him more than from any other, came the impulse that started the movement. Already, however, crippled in his energies by decaying health he was cut off when this was still in its infancy, leaving only a fondly cherished memory to his associates, and to the public two volumes of Imagines, which illustrate the strength of his convictions and his absolute unreserve in their expression. Froude wrote three of the Tracts for the Times and is the β of the Iyra Apostolica (1836), the latter being his finest distinction.

JOHN FREDERICK DENISON MURPHY (1804-1872), perhaps the most copious writer on theological and social topics of equal intellectual keenness that was ever in the orders of the English Church was the child of Unitarian parents who emigrated in his boyhood from Suffolk to the neighbourhood of Bristol. After an early manhood of shifting residence and work passed mainly at Cambridge, London and Oxford in study and literary employment on The Athenæum and another periodical he joined the Church of England, and was ordained to her ministry in 1834. In this service he toiled till his death, first as a country curate, then as chaplain successively to Guy's Hospital and Lincoln's Inn, and last as incumbent of St Peter's, Vere Street. But his direct clerical duties, punctually discharged as they were, formed but a subordinate item in his vast and varied activity. An educational editor, a Professor—now of English Literature at Cambridge, now of Theology at King's College, London, now of Moral Philosophy at Cambridge—a frequent lecturer, a social reformer, a founder of colleges in London, and indefatigable labourer therein, an eager and subtle controversialist, an ardent apostle of social and theological tenets, regarded with dislike and dread by most of his class, he yet gained an enormous influence over certain estimable minds, and is still held in deep reverence by many. Fearless and untiring with voice and pen, he naturally became the centre of no little strife in the Church and the world, but his profound sense of the supernatural, and glowing devoutness of spirit, won him the respect even of his opponents. He certainly did more than any other of his order to widen the horizon of English clerical thought, and broaden the basis of the English Church, and to bring the higher instruction and the best intellectual light to classes hitherto neglected, especially to women and working men. In number and variety of sort and size his publications were without parallel in their kind, and to select is not easy. But among his most popular may be reckoned The Patriarchs and Lawgivers of the Old Testament, The Gospel of St John, and Social Morality, while the Theological Essays, The Kingdom of Christ, Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy, and certain volumes of sermons would seem to have exercised the strongest influence. Maurice was a character of singular attractiveness, and made many disciples, in whom his principles still live and work. Criticism, however, while recognizing in the man a "pure and fine spirit," charges the author with an indistinctness, a haziness of thought and expression, that materially impairs the worth of his writings.

The most heated of Maurice's attacks was provoked in 1859 by a volume of HENRY LONGUEVILLE MANSSEL (1820–1871), then a teacher and writer of large repute at Oxford for moral and metaphysical learning and skill in using it, and for caustic wit as a disputant. The son of a Northamptonshire clergyman, he became a Fellow of St John's College, Oxford, in 1842, and graduated with a First in Classics in 1843. The publication, in 1849, of an edition of Aldrich, and of his Prolegomena Logica in 1851, gave him rank among the foremost of his day in mental philosophy. In 1858 he delivered his famous course of Bampton lectures on The Limits of Religious Thought, which sought to base the doctrine of revelation on principles that moved Maurice to the composition of his somewhat vehement reply, What is Revelation? Mansel was made Waynflete Professor in 1859, succeeded Stanley as Professor of Ecclesiastical History in 1867, and Milman as Dean of St Paul's in 1869. A treatise on Metaphysics, reprinted from the Encyclopædia Britannica, a brief account of The Philosophy of Kant, and his Philosophy of the Unconditioned (1866), substantially exhaust the record of his remaining work. Though a vindicator of Hamilton against Mill, and a follower in many ways of Kant, Mansel occasionally criticizes and dissents from both his masters. He was unquestionably a thinker of great force and definiteness, his writings afford an intellectual tonic of the first order.

THOMAS HILL GREY (1836–1882)—also sprung from a clerical stock—was an indolent and somewhat backward boy at Rugby, but grew apace at Oxford, where as a member of Balliol, he won a First in Classics, and was elected a Fellow of his college in 1860. His energies once roused, he continued to show an eager interest in social and intellectual questions throughout life, working warmly and steadfastly in the city as well as the University for the success of the cause he had espoused, that of a tolerably advanced practical liberalism. He was appointed in time a tutor of Balliol, and obtained a marked ascendancy over the minds of young men of ability, who absorbed and propagated his philosophical and religious principles. The former of these though Kantian and Hegelian in their origin and general character, drew most of their undoubted power, and much of their component elements, from his own intellect and spirit, which was in decided antagonism to the empirical doctrines then prevalent. Till 1874 he was known outside Oxford only by an occasional article in a review, but in that year his introductions to a republication of Hume brought him into more general note, and this was extended and strengthened by a succession of papers on Lewes and Spencer, contributed to a London magazine. But his reputation now rests chiefly on his Prolegomena to Ethics, made up in large bulk of lectures that he gave as Whyte Professor of Moral Philosophy—a post that he held for the last five years of his life—and not published till after his death. Perhaps his two lay sermons, entitled The Witness of God and Faith, which were also of posthumous publication, are as effective examples of Green's special power as an ordinary inquirer need desire.

RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCHE (1807-1886), of Dublin birth but Cambridge education and English quality of character, was a poet and theologian of some natural—but many more acquired—gifts and accomplishments. Conspicuous among "the Apostles" (see p. 566) when at Trinity, Trench was not long in orders before he published, in 1835, a volume of verse called Justin Martyr and other Poems, which attracted so much favourable notice as to encourage him to follow it up with a second, in 1839, and that again with a third, in 1842. In these, however, the success that the reception of the first seemed to promise was not maintained. A country clergyman for more than twenty years, and a theological Professor at King's College, London, for nine, he was preferred, in 1862 to the deanery of Westminster, and thence in 1864 to the archbishopric of Dublin. He had already written a good deal besides his poetry, but his Notes on the Parables (1841) and Notes on the Miracles (1846) which have been described as 'treasures of erudite and acute illustration' had already grown into general use and esteem as text books on their several subjects, whilst his lectures on The Study of Words (1851), English, Past and Present (1855) and Select Glossary (1859), proved the advance-guard and stimulus to a department of study that has made enormous progress since. All those publications, except the last, ran through an unprecedented number of editions, and are in use still. But they were only the most popular of an extensive array. Nor was there any slackening of Trench's productivity after his day of dignity had come, but of the consequent publications none seem worthy of special remark save Proverbs and their Lessons (1863), Synonyms of the New Testament (1865), and Lectures on Medieval Church History (1877). Whether as poet, theologian or historian, Trench was far more of a receptive and reproductive than of an originating intellect; but his sensibility to the finer and deeper emotions and wide culture, enabled him to be more generally and solidly useful as a circulator of the thoughts and results of the labours of others, than original genius has often been.

IN FREDERICK WILLIAM ROBERTSON (1816-1853) of Brighton, the Church possessed for too brief a space a richly endowed nature of a rarer type, whose work has made an ineffaceable impress on a larger number of scattered minds within her communion than that of almost any other of his generation. Yet outside his two or three limited areas of work Robertson was as good as unknown in his lifetime—his fame has been wholly posthumous. The son of an officer, he saw much varied life, and essayed or aspired to more than one sphere of action before he went straight from Oxford, into the service of the Church. In this he laboured for thirteen years; at Cheltenham, at London—and for the last six—at Trinity Chapel, Brighton often much distressed in mind and more in body, for disease and pain aggravated the mental unrest that wasted his spirits. His death, at the age of thirty-seven, was little noticed, and in another generation his name might have utterly perished from among men had not his friends, a year or two later, given a volume of his sermons to the world. This made a strong impression, two other volumes were gathered from his papers and, incomplete as each sermon necessarily was, these had a like reception. In a year or two the name of Robertson of Brighton was a power, not in England only, but in America also. His Sermons were even translated into several foreign languages. And a power in the religious world they still continue their strong nervous thought, their intensity of feeling, their intellectual wealth, grasp of things divine, and breadth of culture, have given them a currency more extensive, perhaps than any others have yet reached.

JAMES BOWRING MOZLEY (1813-1878), whom Dean Church declares to have been, "after Mr. Newman, the most forcible and impressive of the Oxford writers," is assuredly an adequate representative of the best—the staunch—side of the Tractarian movement. His wife was a sister of Newman's. Educated at Oriel, he was elected to a Magdalen Fellowship in 1837, and henceforward was an active and resolute worker in the cause, especially after the secession of his illustrious brother-in-law. Then his powerful mind and undaunted heart aided—more materially, some think, than any other cause—in repairing that disaster. The Christian Remembrancer, which replaced The British Critic as the organ of the movement in 1844, had no abler contributor. In 1856 he left Oxford for a country parish, and in 1869 was made a Canon of Worcester. But in 1871 he returned as Regius Professor of Divinity, and so continued till his death. He was a fearless and powerful writer and preacher, of profound learning and trenchant vigour of thought, and a weighty and finished style. His more considerable publications that exhibit his faculty at its full strength are The Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination (1855), Bampton Lectures on Miracles (1865), University Sermons (1876), Ruling Ideas in Early Ages, &c. (1877), together with several of his scattered papers, that were republished as Essays, Historical and Theological, after his death. There is much that is specially admirable in Mozley's writings.

His brother, THOMAS MOZLEY (1806-1893), long a country clergyman and writer for the Times has gained no little distinction in connexion with the same movement by his Reminiscences, which gives a lively and authentic account of it.

HENRY PARKER LIDDON (1829-1890) was the most brilliant of the younger generation of Oxford men who sped the great movement onward, and guided it to and through its further developments. Born in Hampshire, the son of a naval officer, Liddon was early nominated to a studentship at Christ Church, was successively Vice-Principal of Cuddesdon Theological College, and of St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, and was not long in growing into public notoriety as a High Churchman of an advanced description. A sermon written even in boyhood, he now made it his leading professional aspiration to revive the splendid traditions of pulpit eloquence, and aimed at reproducing the grand style of the great French preachers, and in some measure he would seem to have succeeded. He gradually rose to the first place as an orator in the English Church. His fame was fully established by his Bampton Lectures on The Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, delivered in 1866, a work that has since gone through nearly a score of editions. His other publications at this time were numerous, and largely devotional. In 1870 he became a Canon of St. Paul's, and a Professor of Exegesis at Oxford. The latter office he held till 1882, the former for life. The volumes of sermons now came from him thick and fast, all rich in impressive eloquence, mostly original and forcible in thought, and often enlivened with sallies of sarcasm and wit, and the various play of the powers of a pungent intellect. His two series of Sermons before the University of Oxford, his Lent lectures on Some Elements of Religion, his Thoughts on Present Church Troubles, his Advent at St. Paul's, Easter at St. Paul's, and Christmastide at St. Paul's, are certainly adequate embodiments of the peculiar power Liddon possessed, a power that has left a distinct mark on English ecclesiastical thought. For the ecclesiastical spirit was unusually strong in him, and he easily swayed vast congregations with his striking figure and impressive oratory. Earnest, eager, indefatigable, devotional, burning with spiritual and professional fervour, he repeated in modern garb as much of the antique clerical character as circumstances allowed. His Life of Dr. Pusey, with whom he had always been united in the closest of friendships, was approaching completion at the time of his death. Vols. I and II have since been published (1893).

JOSEPH BARBER LIGHTFOOT (1828-1889), revived in the present age, and even improved upon, the best traditions of Christian apologetics, and animated a scholarship that was at once massive and accurate, with a zeal of rare fervency in the cause of revealed religion. Lightfoot, who was the son of a Liverpool merchant, finished his undergraduate career at Trinity College, Cambridge, as First Classic and thirtieth wrangler. Elected Fellow of Trinity in 1852, he was ordained in 1854, and continuing at the university, went forward rapidly in classic and early Christian erudition and literature, till he gained an unsurpassed reputation in both. An untiring contributor to several learned periodicals, he showed a matchless critical faculty in laying bare the deficiencies of contemporary commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles. In 1861 he was made Hulsean Professor, a Canon of St. Paul's in 1871, and in 1875 Lady Margaret Professor, but long before this last appointment, he had proved his mettle in higher controversy by a series of destructive papers on a destructive book of anonymous authorship, entitled Supernatural Religion. As Hulsean Professor also, he made himself a great name, lecturing constantly to crowded audiences kindling and maintaining a vivid and general interest in every branch of his subject. Editions of S. Paul's Epistles, of which that to the Galatians led the way in 1865, demonstrated from time to time the sterling texture of his scholarship, intelligence, and critical insight. In all these he had hardly an equal. In 1879 he was raised to the see of Durham. Fruitful and incessant labour in many directions distinguished his ten years of episcopacy. Light-foot was the most consummate English master, in these later days, of Biblical and patristic learning, and the critical rules needed for its utility, and of post-Biblical Christian literature and history as well. His editions, therefore, of S. Clement of Rome (1869) and The Apostolic Fathers (1885), form, perhaps, the weightiest of his later and greater work. But his various charges, addresses, sermons, and miscellaneous papers, are abundant and valuable.

JOHN WILLIAM BURGESS (1819-1888), elected Fellow of Oriel College in 1848, was a Churchman of the same steadfast and fine-tempered school as Canon Liddon. He was Vicar of St. Mary's for thirteen years, and Dean of Chichester for twelve. As a poet, he lives in a single couplet

"Match me such wonder save in eastern clime,

A rose-red city half as old as Time, as a scholar, by his incisive criticisms on the revision of the New Testament, reprinted from the 'Quarterly Review' in 1883 as The Revision Revised, as a divine by a lengthy file of productions, of which Inspiration and Interpretation, Treatises on the Pastoral Office, and a vindication of The Athanasian Creed, are typical examples. But in attractiveness and enduring value, none of his other publications come near his latest, The Lives of Twelve Good Men (1888). This is indeed excellent, from every pertinent point of view.

MARK PATTISON (1813-1884) was an undergraduate of Oriel in its boyant time, who became a Fellow of Lincoln in 1839, and having attached himself, with seeming devotion, to Newman, was apparently on the point when the crisis came, of following his leader into the fold he had chosen. He not only drew back however at the last moment, but steadily drew away from Tractarianism altogether, and at length was caught by the critical and sceptical wave that next invaded the university—an issue that was more in harmony with his native temper. He showed a lively interest in educational questions, contributing a paper on the subject to Oxford Essays, and another, on Religious Thought in the Last Century to the famous Essays and Reviews. In 1861 he was chosen Rector of Lincoln. Henceforward he was principally known as a persistent and keen tongued advocate of disinterestedness in study, of a pursuit of learning and things of the mind for their own sake. Reviews and addresses more or less seasoned with a peculiar piquancy of sentiment and language, proceeded from him from time to time, and have been republished, in a collected form, since his death, as has also been a volume of sermons, and a curious and not always pleasant self-revelation, called Memoirs. He also wrote a little book on Milton, which bears a strong flavour of the man. But his one masterly production, memorable both as an object-lesson in the doctrine he preached and an example of its practice, is The Life of Isaac Casaubon, published in 1875. There must always be a few in after times that will not let this work die.

JOHN GULLOON (1823-1896), a divine of the Scottish Church, who was principal of the Theological College attached to St. Andrew's University for thirty-two years, was a writer of wide learning, strong intelligence, and marked moderation, on theology and the history of religion and religious thought. His Leaders of the Reformation, and Puritanism and its Leaders are meritorious compositions, but his two volumes on Rational Theology and Christian Philosophy in England in the Seventeenth Century (1872), stand on a considerably higher level, constituting a work that is almost monumental. Even Mr. Matthew Arnold found it "delightful," and "of the most serious value." His Milestones of Religious Thought (1885) is also instructive and interesting but slight and defective as compared with its predecessor.

JAMES CRAIGIE ROBERTSON (1813-1882) born at Aberdeen, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, was vicar of Bekebourne, near Canterbury, from 1846 till 1859 when he was appointed Canon of Canterbury. He wrote several learned works, of which the best known is A History of the Christian Church to the Reformation 4 vols., 1853-1873. His Becket, a Biography (1859) is a calm, rational, and trustworthy work on a singularly contentious subject.

CHRONOLOGICAL LIST

OF THE WORKS OF THE POETS

OF THE FOURTEENTH, SIXTEENTH, SEVENTEENTH, AND EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES,

WITH AN ACCOUNT OF THE ORIGIN OF THE POET LAUREATESHIP AND A LIST OF POET-LAUREATES.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
CHAUCER
Poetry	598
Prose	599
SPENSER
Poetry	599
Prose	600
SHAKESPEARE
Poems	600
Plays	600
Prose	601
MILTON
Poetry	602
Prose	603
DRYDEN
Poetry	603
Translations and Prose	605
POPE
Poetry	605
Translations and Modernizations	606
Prose	606
SWIFT
Prose	607
Verse	607
ADDISON
Prose	608
Poetry and Drama	608
POET LAUREATES	609

THE WORKS OF GEOFFREY CHAUCER,

Arranged with as close an approximation to a chronological order as our scanty materials will allow

POETRY

Chaucer's A B C (freely translated from the French of De Guileville)	}	1366-8
Compleynte to Pite
Detho of Blaunche the Duchesse	.	1369
Lyfe of Seynt Cecile (Secound Nnn's Tale)	.	1373
Parlament of Foules		1374 ?
Compleynt of Mars		1375 ?
Anelida nud Areite		1375-6 ?
The former Age (Ætas Prima)	later than	1376 ?
Troilus and Creseyde	finished	1382 ?
Lines to Adam Scrivener		1383 ?
Hous of Fame		1384 ?
Legende of Good Women (Prologue, the Tales at various times)	}	1385 ?
Canterbury Tales (? 1373-1400)
Good Counsel of Chaucer ("Fle fro the Pres")	central ante	1386 ?
Orisonne to the Holy Virgin ("Moder of God")		1386-7
Proverbs	}	1387-8 ?
Prologue to the Canterbury Tales
Compleynt of Venus		1388 ?
L'Envoy de Chaucer à Scogan	}	1392-3 ?
L'Envoy de Chaucer à Bukton
A Ballade (Gentilnesse)
Ballade sent to King Richard (Stedfastnesse)		1397 ?
Balade de Visage sauns Peynture		1398 ?
Chaucer's Compleynt to his Purse	September, -	1399

The dates in this table are those assigned by our foremost living Chaucer scholar, Mr F J Furnivall, in his 'Trial Forewords to my Parallel-text Edition of Chaucer's Minor Poems' (published for 'The Chaucer Society, 1871). It will be observed that most of the dates are given with a query, indicating doubt, but this doubt refers rather to each particular year assigned as the date of the production of each several poem, than to the general result attained with respect to the succession of the writings, the main outlines of Mr Furnivall's arrangement will probably be confirmed by further investigation. According to this arrangement the life of Chaucer as an author may be thrown into four periods (1) To the 'Detho of Blaunche,' 1369 (2) From 1373, when Chaucer visited Italy, and probably met Petrarch at Padua, to 1384, when probably he wrote the 'House of Fame' (3) 1385-88, Chaucer's best period; 1386, the date assigned in the table for 'The Canterbury Tales,' may be taken as a central date for a work "whose parts occupied Chaucer, off and on, from his manhood to his death" (? 1373-1400), (4) The fourth period is one of decline, after a considerable interval, during which perhaps Chaucer wrote no verse (to which interval belongs his prose treatise on the 'Astrolabe'), he recommenced poetry with the 'Compleynt of Venus,' and afterwards wrote, now and again, some short occasional pieces, of which one of the most interesting is the last, addressed to King Henry IV, describing the impoverished state of the poet's purse. In October, 1399, John of Gaunt's son, now King of England, granted Chaucer 40 marks yearly in addition to his former £20 from Richard II. The date of the 'House of Fame' is approximately inferred from a reference to the poet's employment as Comptroller of the Customs, in 1385 he was allowed to nominate a permanent deputy. The 'Legende of Good Women' must have been written after the marriage of Richard II to Anne of Bohemia (1382), Venus instructing the poet in the Prologue to—

"Leave it to the Queene,
On my behalfe, at Eltham, or at Sheene"

In this Prologue mention is made of 'The Story of Palamon and Arcite' (The Knight's Tale) as already written. The 'Legende of Good Women' is itself mentioned (under the title of the 'Seintes Legendes of Cupide') in the Prologue to the 'Man of Lawe's Tale'. Jack Straw (1381) is named in the 'Nonnes Prest's Tale', Linian—Johannes de Legnano—is stated in the Prologue to the 'Clerkes Tale' to be dead (1383), the death of Barnabo Visconti (1385) is the latest event referred to in the Canterbury Tales. In the above table the doubtful poems are omitted.

PROSE.

Boece (translation of Boethius)	.	.	1376 ?
The Tale of Melibeus		after	1385 ?
Treatise on the Astrolabie			1391
The Parson's Tale			1395 ?

SPENSER'S WORKS,

Arranged chronologically in order of publication

POETRY

*Epigrams (six sonnets translated from Petrarch, published in Vander Noodt's 'Theatro of Wordlings')	1569
The Shepheard's Calendar	1579
†The Faërie Queene, Books I, II, III	1580
The Ruines of Time	}
‡The Teares of the Muses
Virgil's Gnat
Prosopopoeia, or, Mother Hubbard's Tale
The Ruines of Rome (from the French of Bellay)
Visions of the World's Vanitie	}
Monopotmos

* The authenticity of these epigrams is not universally admitted. They were published, however, with an additional stanza, in the volume of 1591, under the title of 'The Visions of Petrarch,' formerly translated.

† From the poet's correspondence with Harvey we learn that the 'Faërie Queene' had been commenced as early as 1580 and that the first six books were finished in 1593 is clear from the 80th sonnet.

‡ What is now universally allowed to be the earliest contemporary allusion to Shakespeare is contained in the complaint of 'Thalia'

Daphnaida	1592
Colin Clout's come Home again	} 1595
Astrophel
Amoretti (eighty-eight sonnets written during his courtship of the lady whom he afterwards married)	} 1595
*Epithalamium (on his own marriage)
Inõrie Queene, Books IV, V, VI	1596
Prothalamion	1596
Four Hymnes (on Love, on Beautie, on Heavenly Love, on Heavenly Beautie)	1596
Faerie Queene (6th and 7th cantos of VIIth Book, and two stanzas of 8th canto, posthumous)	1609

PROSE

View of the State of Ireland (posthumous, printed by Sir James Ware)	1633
--	------

* Mr Hallam pronounces the Epithalamium to be "a strain redolent of a bridegroom's joy, and of a poet's fancy" There is "no other nuptial song," he says, "ancient or modern, of equal beauty It is an intoxication of ecstasy, ardent, noble, and pure"

SHAKSPEARE

CHRONOLOGICAL ORDER OF HIS PLAYS AND POEMS

THE following table, although not claiming for all its details a certainty, as yet unattainable, may be taken as an approximation to the facts of the chronology of Shakspeare's writings

	Probable Date	Date of Publication or First Mention
Venus and Adonis	1585-7	1593, first quarto
Titus Andronicus, part	1587-9	{ (1594, first quarto?) 1598, Meres
Love's Labour's Lost	1588-9	1598, Meres
Comedy of Errors	1589-91	1598, Meres.
The Two Gentlemen of Verona	1590-92	1598, Meres
King Henry VI, Part I, part	1590-92	1623, first folio
" " II	} 1592-93	1623, first folio.
" " III
Richard III	1593	1597, first quarto
Lucrece	1593	1594, first quarto
A Midsummer Night's Dream	1592-94	1598, Meres
Richard II	1594	1598, Meres
Romæo and Juliet . . .	{ (7 two dates) 1591-95	1597, first quarto

	Probable Date	Date of Publication or First Mention
King John	1595	1593, Meres
The Merchant of Venice	1596	1598, Meres
The Taming of the Shrew, part	1596-7	1623, first folio
King Henry IV, Part I	1596-7	1598, first quarto
II	1597-8	1598, Stationers' Register
The Merry Wives of Windsor	1598-9	1602, first quarto
King Henry V	1599	1600, first quarto
Much Ado About Nothing	1599	1600, first quarto
As You Like It	1599-1600	1600, Stationers' Register
Twelfth Night	1601	1601, Manningham's Diary
All's Well that Ends Well	{ (? two dates) 1601-2	{ 1623, first folio
Sonnets (at intervals)	1592-1605	{ 1598, Meres 1609, first quarto
Julius Cæsar	1601-3	{ (? 1601, Weever
Hamlet	1600-3	1603, first quarto
Measure for Measure	1603-4	1623, first folio
Othello	{ (?) 1604	1621, Stationers' Register
Macbeth	1605-6	1610, Forman's Diary
King Lear	1605	1606, Stationers' Register
Troilus and Cressida	{ (? two dates) 1606-8	{ 1609, first quarto
Antony and Cleopatra	1606-8	1608, Stationers' Register
Coriolanus	1607-8	1623, first folio
Timon of Athens, part	1607-8	1623, first folio
Pericles, part	1608	1608, Stationers' Register
Cymbeline	1609-11	1623, first folio
The Tempest	1610	{ ? 1614 Jonson's Bartholomew Fair
The Winter's Tale	1611	1611, Forman's Diary
Two Noble Kinsmen, part	1609-12	1634, first quarto
King Henry VIII., part	1613	{ 1613, T Lorkin and Sir H Wotton

'Love's Labour's Won,' mentioned by Meres, was probably an earlier form of 'All's Well that Ends Well'

The 'Passionate Pilgrim,' as published by William Jaggard in 1598, contained a great many pieces which are certainly not Shakspeare's, among others Marlowe's well-known 'Passionate Shepherd.' Most modern editors have weeded out such poems as are clearly spurious.

The Sonnets, although not published until 1609, are mentioned by Meres, in his 'Palladis Tamia,' as "his (i.e. Shakspeare's) sugred sonnets among his private friends," so that some of them at least must have been in existence in 1598, when Meres's work was published. Two of the Sonnets had appeared in 'The Passionate Pilgrim.'

The Epistles Dedicatory prefixed to the 'Venus and Adonis,' and to the 'Rape of Lucrece,' the very brief Argument of the former and the somewhat lengthy one of the latter, constitute all the non-dramatic prose compositions of Shakspeare now known to exist. These works were published in 1593 and 1594 respectively.

MILTON'S WORKS,

Arranged chronologically in order of composition.

POETRY

First Period (1608-40) —

*On the Death of a Fair Infant	1625
At a Vacation Exercise	1628
On the Morning of Christ's Nativity	1629
Upon the Circumcision	1630
The Passion	1630
On Shakespeare (prefixed to 2nd Folio, 1632)	1630
On the University Carrier (Hobson—two pieces)	} 1631
Epitaph on the Marchioness of Winchester
First Sonnet (on his being arrived at the age of 23)
On Time	1631 (?)
At a Solemn Musio	1632
Second Sonnet (to the Nightingale)	} 1633
Song on a May Morning
L'Allegro and Penseroso	about 1634
Arcades	} 1634
Comus
Lycidas	1637

Second Period (1640-60) —

Sonnets, of which the most remarkable are—

"When the Assault was intended on the City"	1642
To the Lord-General Fairfax	1648
To the Lord General Cromwell	May 16th, 1652
On his Blindness	about 1652
On the Late Massacre in Piemont	1655
To Cyriac Skinner (also on his blindness,	about 1655

Third Period (1660-74) —

†Paradise Lost (published 1667)	1665
Paradise Regained	} 1671
Samson Agonistes

* The 'Fair Infant' was his own niece, a daughter of his sister, Mrs Phillips

† In the year of the Great Plague (1665), Milton had gone to Chalfont in Buckinghamshire and there lent to his friend Ellwood, the Quaker, the manuscript of the finished copy of 'Paradise Lost'

PRINCIPAL PROSE WORKS

Of Reformation in England	1641
Smectymnus Controversy
Of Prolatical Episcopacy	1641
Reasons of Church Government urged against Episcopacy	1641
An Apology for Smectymnus	1642
The Tractate on Education	1644
Divorce Controversy
The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce	1641
The Judgment of Martin Bucer concerning Divorce	1644
Tetrachordon	1645
Colasterion	1645
Areopagitica	1644
Iconoclastes	1649
Salmasian Controversy
Defensio pro Populo Anglicano (Latin)	1651
Defensio Secunda	1654
Pro Se Defensio	1655
Considerations touching the Means of removing Hirelings out of the Church	1659
Ready and Easy way to Establish a Free Commonwealth	1659
History of England (to the Norman invasion)	1670
De Doctrina Christiana (a posthumous work, not published until 1821, written in Latin)	about 1671

DRYDEN'S WORKS,

Arranged in order of composition

POEMS

First Period, 1631-80 (Elegiac, encomiastic, complimentary, and descriptive Fantasticism predominant) —

On the Death of Lord Hastings	1649
To John Hoddesdon, on his Divine Epigrams	1650
1 elegiac Stanzas on the Death of Oliver Cromwell	1659
Astrea Redux	1660
* To Sir Robert Howard (on his excellent poems)	1660
To his Sacred Majesty King Charles II (a panegyrick on his coronation)	1661
To the Lord Chancellor Hyde	1662
† Satire on the Dutch	1662

* It was this gentleman's sister, the Lady Elizabeth Howard that Dryden afterwards married

† This piece afterwards became the prologue and epilogue to the drama of 'Amboyna' (1672)

To the Lady Castlemaine (on her encouraging his first play)	1662
To Dr Charlton (on his treatise on Stonehenge)	1663
To her Royal Highness the Duchess (Ann Hyde—on the memorable victory gained by the Diko over the Hollanders)	1665
Annus Mirabilis	1667
*An Essay on Satire	1679
To the Earl of Roscommon (on his excellent Essay on Translated Verse)	1680
Second Period, 1680–82 (Satire mainly Fantasticism altogether shaken off) —
Absalom and Achitophel, Part I	Nov, 1681
The Medal	March, 1682
To the Duchess of York (Mary d'Este)	1682
Mac Flecknoe	Oct, 1682
Absalom and Achitophel, Part II (from line 309 to 503 only is Dryden's, the rest is Tate's)	Nov, 1682
Third Period, 1682–88 (Chiefly controversial) —
Religio Laici	1682
Threnodia Augustalis (on the death of Charles II)	1685
To the Memory of Mrs Ann Killigrew (an ode)	1685
The Hind and the Panther	1687
A Song for St Cecilia's Day	1687
Britannia Rediviva (on the birth of Prince James Edward, afterwards the "Old Pretender")	1688
Fourth Period, 1688–1700 (Miscellaneous) —
†Elconora (on the death of the Countess of Abingdon)	1691
†To Mr Congreve (on 'The Double Dealer')	1693
Alexander's Feast, or, The Power of Music	1697
§To Sir Godfrey Kneller	about 1698
To John Dryden, Esq (the poet's cousin)	1699
The Fables	March, 1700
The Secular Masque	„ 1700

Of Dryden's epitaphs and inscriptions the lines upon the death of Oldham, and those under "Mr Milton's Picture" are the best. Of his prologues and epilogues, those belonging to the 'Tempest,' 'Aureng Zebe,' 'Troilus and Cressida,' and the 'Duke of Guise,' possess the highest interest—the first and third as expressing his profound respect for Shakespeare, even when laying a profane hand on his works, the second, as containing his retraction of his formerly stoutly-maintained opinions on the use of rhyme in writing plays, and the last as illustrating the terrible ferocity of the party spirit of the time.

* It is not quite certain that Dryden was the author of this, by some it is given to Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, the "sharp-judging Adriel" of 'Absalom and Achitophel'.

† This poem is said to have been written to order.

‡ This piece contains the touching lines, committing to Congreve the care of his posthumous fame.

§ The splendid verses on the Chandos portrait of Shakespeare constitute the main interest of this epistle.

TRANSLATIONS

*Epistles of Ovid (two by Dryden alone, and one by Dryden and Mulgrave)	1683
Juvenal (1st, 3rd, 6th, 10th, and 16th, satires)	1692
Virgil begun in 1694)	1697

PROSE WORKS

Essay on Dramatic Poetry	1697
†Preface to 'Indian Emperor'	1668
Grounds of Criticism in Tragedy	1679
„ 'Epistles of Ovid'	1680
„ 'Fables'	1700

The following quotation from Lord Macaulay may fitly close an account of Dryden — "As a satirist he has rivalled Juvenal As a didactic poet he perhaps might, with care and meditation, have rivalled Lucretius Of lyric poets he is, if not the most sublime, the most brilliant and spirit-stirring But nature, profuse to him of many gifts, had denied him the dramatic faculty" — Hist of England, vol 1, p 402.

Dryden's are 'Canace to Macareus,' and 'Dido to Æneas'

† "Read all the Prefaces of Dryden,
For these our critics much confide in,
Though merely writ at first for silling,
To raise the volume's price a shilling"

SWIFT, On Poetry a Rhapsody

POPE'S WORKS,

Arranged chronologically in order of composition

VERSE

Original Poems
*Ode on Solitude	1706
To the Author of Succession—Lilianah Settle (first attempt at satire)	1702
Pastorals	1704
Windsor Forest (first Part)	1704
Essay on Criticism	1709
Temple of Fame	1711
-Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady	1711
†The Messiah (in imitation of Virgil's 'Polio')	1712

* "As yet a child, nor yet a fool to fame,
I ill-ped in numbers, for the numbers came"

Epistles to Arbuthnot, Dec 7-8

† First published in 'The Spectator.'

*The Dying Christian to his Soul	1712
Rape of the Lock (first form, in two cantos)	1712
Windsor Forest (second part)	1713
Rape of the Lock (second form, in five cantos)	1714
Elisa to Abelard	published 1717
The Dunciad (first form, in three books, Theobalds hero)	1728
Essay on Man (first part)	1732
„ (second part)	1733
„ (third part)	1735
Moral Essays	1731-35
Epistle to Arbuthnot, or, The Prologue to the Satires	1735
Imitations from Horace	1733-38
Epilogue to the Satires	1738
Dunciad (second form, in four books—Theobalds de-throned, and Cibber king)	1742

TRANSLATIONS AND MODERNIZATIONS

†Statius Thebais (first book)	1703
†Ovid (Dryopo, Vertumnus and Pomona, Sappho and Phaon)
January and May (Merchant's Tale of Chaucer)	1705
Prologue to Chaucer's Wife of Bath's Tale
The Iliad of Homer	1715-20
The Odyssey of Homer (twelve books only are Pope's)	1720-25

Of Pope's shorter pieces, the best are the prologue to Addison's 'Cato,' the epistles addressed to Addison and Craggs, the epigrams upon Gay and Kneller, and the 'Universal Prayer'

The dates of Pope's youthful compositions, here given, depend mainly on the author's own statements, which are regarded as very questionable authority by modern critics. Where the exact date of composition cannot be ascertained, that of publication has been taken

PROSE

Dr Norris's Narrative of the Frenzy of Mr John Dennis	1713
Preface to Shakespeare	1721
§Memoirs of P. P., Clerk of this Parish	1727
Debate on Black and White Horses
Treatise on the Bathos, or, The Art of Sinking in Poetry
The Memoirs of Scribblous	1741

* That is to say the lines beginning "Ah, fleeting spirit!" published in the 'Spectator' of November 10, 1712. But the finer translation beginning "Vital Spark of heavenly flame!" was not printed till 1736 when it appeared in Lintot's edition of Pope's works.

† See Elwin, vol 1 p 47

‡ As to Ovid translations, See Elwin, vol 1 p 90

§ These works all appeared in three volumes of 'Miscellanies' to which Swift also contributed. The first is a jeu d'esprit, written in ridicule of Burnet's 'History'; the third is famous as having supplied its author with an ex post facto excuse for having written the 'Dunciad.'

SWIFT'S WORKS

PROSE

	PUBLISHED
The Tale of a Tub	} 1704
Battle of the Books
Sentiments of a Church of England Man	} 1709
Bickerstaff (in ridicule of astrology)
Argument against Abolishing Christianity
Vindication of Bickerstaff	1709
Letter to the October Club	1711
Proposal for Correcting, Improving, and Ascertaining the English Tongue	} 1712
*The Conduct of the Allies
The Public Spirit of the Whigs	1714
The Drapier's Letters	1724
Gulliver's Travels	1726
† A Modest Proposal to the Public	1729
Polite Conversation	1738
Directions to Servants (a posthumous work)	1745

VERSE

† Find the Odes	written 1689
Cadenus and Vanessa	" 1713
Poems to Stella (11 in all)	1718-25
The Grand Question Debated	1729
On the Death of Dr Swift	1731
On Poetry, a Rhapsody	1733
§ The Legion Club	1735

* This was the most successful pamphlet ever printed, if success is to be measured by the immediate effect produced. It mainly contributed to that sudden change in public feeling, which enabled the Tories to carry through the peace of Utrecht, in spite of the victories of Marlborough, and the resistance of the Whig party.

† An excellent specimen of Swift's humour when at its savagest.

‡ This is the work on reading which Dryden is reported to have said, "Cousin Swift, you will never be a poet."

§ A lampoon on the Irish Houses of Parliament.

ADDISON'S WORKS

PROSE

Essay on the Georgics (prefixed to Dryden's Virgil)	1697
Remarks of several Parts of Italy, &c	1705
'The Tatler,' Contributions to	1709-11
'The Spectator,' .. (1st series, seven vols)	1711-12
'The Guardian,' ..	1713
'The Spectator,' .. (2nd series, one vol)	1714
'The Freeholder'	1715-16
'The Old Whig'	1719
*Dialogues on Medals (posthumous)	1721

POETRY AND DRAMA

Verses addressed to Dryden	1693
Account of the most eminent English Poets	1694
† Translation of the greater part of the Fourth Georgic	1694
A Poem to his Majesty (William III), with a Rhyming Introduction to Lord Somers	1695
Letter from Italy to Lord Halifax	1701
The Campaign	1705
Rosamond (an opera)	1707
Hymns The Traveller's, and 'The Retrospect	1711
† Cato	1713
§ The Drummer (a comedy)	1716

* The 'Dialogues' were begun about 1700; and it was in anticipation of their publication in 1715 that Pope wrote his 'Epistle to Mr Addison'

† "After these" (bees), says Dryden, "my later swarm is scarcely worth the hiving"—Postscript to 'Virgil'

‡ He seems to have composed four acts of this play much earlier according to some, while at Oxford, according to others, during his Continental travels

§ This comedy, however, Addison never acknowledged. It was not until after his death that Steele declared him to be the author

A SHORT ACCOUNT OF THE ORIGIN OF THE OFFICE OF POET LAUREATE, AND A TABULATED LIST OF THOSE WHO HAVE HELD IT

FROM a very early period we have occasional glimpses of an officer attached to the English Court, whose function to some extent corresponded to that of our modern Laureate. The exact nature of this function cannot be determined, nor is it clear what position this personage held among the rather brusque courtiers of the times—though it would seem that he was regarded with some consideration—but his existence cannot reasonably be doubted. Among the landowners recorded in Domesday Book, one Berdic, possessing three vills, is described as Joculator Regis—joculator was the Low Latin form of the Norman “jongleur”—and a certain Roger or Raherus, King’s minstrel, is recorded to have founded the monastery of St Bartholomew in Smithfield, in the early part of Henry I’s reign. Coming down to later times we obtain still clearer indications of the existence of such an official. William the Foreigner is taken by King Richard to Palestine, for the express purpose of celebrating his master’s heroic deeds, Baston, the Carmelite Friar, follows Edward II. into Scotland, and a certain John Kaye is mentioned as King’s versifier (versificator) in the reign of Edward IV. This last is considered by some to have been the first Poet Laureate in the present sense of the word.

The term “Poet Laureate” did not make its appearance until the fourteenth century, and was then used in two senses, distinct not only from each other, but also from the present. In one it was simply applied to a person who had taken a particular degree at the University, in the other, any supremely excellent poet was styled by his admirers “Poet Laureate.” Skill in Latin versification was the only qualification necessary for attaining the distinction of Laureate graduate, among the successful aspirants to which we find the names of Maurice Byrchenshaw and John Skelton. The latter seems to have been specially proud of the “addition” (to use a Shakespearian word), he styles himself “Poeta Skelton Laureatus,” in the headings of his Latin poems) and never lets slip any opportunity of drawing the attention of his readers to the fact that—

“A King to ‘him’ the habit gave
At Oxford the University”

But it is in the other signification that the term is most familiar to the readers of the early English poets. Thus Chaucer in his ‘Clerk’s Prologue,’ calls Petrarch “the laureate poete”—though in this passage there may be a special reference to the well-known coronation of Petrarch with the laurel crown, and both Chaucer and Gower are addressed by King James as—“Superlative as poetes laureate

In rhetoric and eloquence ornat.”

But the present dynasty of poet-kings begins with Spenser. The pension of fifty pounds a year granted him by the Queen in 1591, and his own distinct mention of the 'laureal leaf' * in his twenty eighth sonnet, will be convincing proofs to most, though there are still some who would begin the line with Jonson. It must be confessed that Jonson was the first who received formal letters patent appointing him to the office—at least in no earlier case have we any proofs

The following list will no doubt awaken strange reflections in the minds of thoughtful students, as to the wisdom shown by English rulers in their choice of literary monarchs. Still it is some consolation that the—

"sheer, immaculate and silver fountain,
From whence this stream through muddy passages
Has held his current and defiled himself, has purged itself clear of the unwholesome contributions of the last century, and regained its old purity. The names of William Wordsworth and Alfred Tennyson are surely sufficient to redeem the nation from the disgrace of having once numbered among its "supreme in literature" Tate and Pye.

LIST OF POETS LAUREATE

Edmund Spenser	1591-1599
Samuel Daniel	1599-1619
Ben Jonson	1619-1637
(Interregnum)
William Davenant, Knight	1660-1668
† John Dryden	1670-1689
Thomas Shadwell	1689-1692
Nahum Tate	1692-1711
Nicholas Rowe	1715-1718
† Lawrence Eusden, Clerk	1718-1730
Colley Cibber	1730-1757
William Whitehead	1757-1785
Thomas Warton, Clerk	1785-1790
§ Henry James Pye	1790-1813
Robert Southey	1813-1843
William Wordsworth	1843-1850
Alfred Tennyson	1850-1892

* The exact words are these—

"The laurel leaf which you [the fair Elizabeth] this day do wear,
Gives me great hope of your relenting mind,
For since it is the badge that I doe bear,
Ye, bearing it, do seem to me inclined."

† Though Dryden did not receive his letters patent until the year 1670, he nevertheless was paid the salary for the two preceding years.

† For Eusden see 'Dunciad,' book 1, line 63, and for Colley Cibber, see same work passim.

§ "Better to err with Pope than shine with Pye," says Lord Byron in his 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.' In the 'Vision of Judgment' the same poet represents the ghost of King George as exclaiming, on hearing Southey's recitation of his 'Vision'—

What what!

Pye come again? no more—no more of that!"

It is by these notices alone that poor Pye still hangs on the human memory.

At the appointment of Jonson the annual salary was fixed at one hundred marks, which on Ben's well-known rhyming petition to the "best of monarchs, masters, men, King Charles," was raised to the same number of pounds sterling, and to this was added, at the same time, the annual gift of a tierce of Ben's favourite wine—Canary. With this office Jonson conjoined that of city-chronologer, with an annual salary of one hundred nobles, which he afterwards lost, and Dryden that of Historiographer Royal, which added 100*l* to his yearly income. The presentation of the butt of wine, as all the readers of Macaulay know, was discontinued by James II, though it must have been resumed afterwards, for we find it commuted for 27*l* a year in the laureateship of Pye.

In the time of the Georges, the Laureate was expected to present an ode to the King every year on his birth-day, called by Cowper, in his 'Table Talk' —

His quit-rent ode, his pepper-corn of praise '

I N D E X.

A-B-L A-F-D

A.

Abelard, 21
 Acca, 19
 Adam, David, 49
 Addison, Joseph, 314-321, 608
 Adrian, Abbot, 18
 Alured of Rievaulx, 23
 Ainsworth, Harrison, 592
 Akenside, Mark, 387
 Albert, Archbishop of York, 19
 Alcuin, 17, 18, 19
 Aldhelm, 18
 Alfred, King, 19, his translation of Bede, 19, 20
 — or Alured of Beverley, 23
 Alfric, 20
 —, another, 20
 —, another, 20
 Alison, Sir Archibald, 586
 Allingham, William, 585
 Amory, Thomas, 380
 Aneren Riwle, the, 26
 Anerum, Earl of, 38
 Angles, 7
 Anglo-Norman literature, 20, 52
 Anglo-Saxon, date of its change into English, 17
 — language, 7, 15, 16
 — literature in Latin, 18
 — poetry, the vernacular, 17
 — prose, the vernacular, 19
 Anglo-Saxons, 5, rise of literature among, 6, 17
 Anselm, 21, 22, 24
 Anstey, Christopher, 408
 Aquinas, Thomas, 24
 Arbuthnot, Dr John, 305
 Armstrong, John, 393
 Arnold, Dr Thomas, 519
 —, Matthew, 556-560
 Arthur, legends of king, 14, 25
 Ascham, Roger, 61
 Ashmole, Elias, 286

B-E-O-W-U-L-F

B

Asser, Bishop, 19
 Athelstane, 20
 Atterbury, Bishop, 322
 Aubrey, John, 286
 Ansten, Miss, 497
 Aytoun, William Edmondstone, 582
 Bacon, Francis, 93-106
 —, Roger, 22
 Baillie, Joanna, 410
 Baldwyne, Richard, 85
 Bale, Bishop, 69, 115, 118
 Ballads, 65-67, 412
 Banim, John, 496
 Barbauld, Mrs, 409
 Barbour, 30, 51, 58
 Barclay, Robert, 197
 Barham, Richard Francis, 582
 Barklay, Alexander, 64
 Barnes, Rev William, 583
 Barnfield, Richard, 87
 Barrow, Isaac, 274
 Barton, Bernard, 475
 Battle of Finnesburg, 17
 — of Otterburne, 67
 Baxter, Richard, 196
 Bawly, Thomas Haynes, 476
 Beaconsfield, Lord, 513
 Beattie, James, 382
 Beaumont, 165
 —, Sir John, 87
 Bec, Abbey of, 21, 22
 Becket, Thomas, 24
 Beckford, William, 499
 Beddoes, Thomas Lovell, 582
 Bede, 9, 17, 18, 19
 Behn, Mrs Aphra, 265
 Bell, Currer See Brontë
 Bellenden, John, 69
 Bentham, Jeremy, 533
 Bentley, Richard, 329
 Beowulf, Lay of, 6, 17

BERENGARIUS

Berengarius of Tours, 22
 Berkeley, Bishop, 325
 Bernard, St, 21, 24
 Berners, Lord, 60
 Bible, English translation of, 55
 Birch, Dr Thomas, 379
 Blacklock, Thomas, 409
 Blackmore, Sir Richard, 312
 Blackstone, Sir William, 373
 Blackwood's Magazine, 528
 Blair, Robert, 382
 Blake, William, 581
 Blessington, Lady, 497
 Blind Harry, 51, 58, 68
 Blondel, 25
 Bloomfield, Robert, 476
 Boleyn, George, 68
 Bolingbroke, Viscount, 324
 Boniface, 18, 19
 Borrow, George, 590
 Boston, Thomas, 286
 Boswell, James, 367
 Bowles, Rev William Lisle, 475
 Boyle and Bentley Controversy, 328
 —, Robert, 282
 Breton, Nicholas, 86
 Brewer, John Sheeren, 589
 Brontë, Charlotte, 504
 —, Emily, 585
 Brooke, Arthur, 86
 —, Henry, 410
 —, Lord, Fulk Greville, 86
 Broome, 174
 —, William, 289
 Brougham, Lord, 586
 Brown Dr Thomas, 378
 —, Tom, 328
 Browne, Isaac Hawkins, 408
 —, Sir Thomas, 189
 —, William, 181
 Browning, Robert, 560-564
 —, Mrs, 479
 Bruce, James, 381
 —, Michael, 409
 Brunton, Mrs Mary, 504
 Brut d'Angleterre, 25, 26
 Bryan, Sir Francis, 68
 Bryant, Jacob, 380
 Buchanan, George, 88, 110, 181
 Buckingham, Duke of, 267
 Buckle, Thomas Henry, 585
 Budgell, Eustace, 328
 Bull, George, 285

CHRISTIANITY

Bunyan, John, 237-243
 Burgon, Dean, 596
 Burke, Edmund, 370
 Burnet, Gilbert, 283
 —, James See Monboddo
 —, Thomas, 283
 Burney Frances, 485
 Burns, Robert, 400
 Burton, John Hill, 588.
 —, Sir Richard Francis, 592
 —, Robert, 106, 107
 Butler, Bishop, 374
 —, Samuel, 222-228
 Byrom, John, 407
 Byron, Lord, 435-444

C

Cædmon, monk of Whitby, 18
 Calamy, Edmund, 285
 Calverley, Charles Stuart, 585
 Cambrensis, Giraldus, 20
 Camden, William, 110
 Campbell, Dr George, 377
 —, Thomas, 457
 Canning, George, 474
 Canute, 20
 Caradoc of Llanerhan, 23
 Carow, Thomas, 87, 181
 Carleton, William, 496
 Carlyle, Thomas, 533
 Carte, Thomas, 379
 Carter, Elizabeth, 411
 Cary, Henry, 476
 Cavendish, George, 69
 Caxton, 51, 57
 Cecil, William, Lord Burleigh, 109
 Celtic dialect, 3, writers, 18
 Celts, 1, 3, 5
 Chalmers, Thomas, 523
 Chamberlayne, William, 187
 Chamier, Captain, 503
 Chapman, George, 86, 173
 Charleton, Dr Walter, 249
 Chatterton, Thomas, 396
 Chaucer, Geoffrey, 31-49, 598
 Cheke, Sir John, 61
 Chesterfield, Earl of, 380
 Chettle, Henry, 176
 Chevy Chase, 67
 Chillingworth, William, 189
 Christianity, conversion of Anglo-

ELPHINSTONE

- Elphinstone, Mountstuart, 589
 Ely, Monk of, 26
 Elyot, Sir Thomas, 69
 English Literature, divisions of, 17
 English, origin of the name, 7, history of language, 15
 — Prose Literature, beginning of, 51
 Erigena See Scotus
 Erskine, Ebenezer, 377
 —, Ralph, 377
 Ethelred, 20
 Etherege, Sir George, 251
 Evelyn, John, 246

F

- Faber, Frederick William, 583
 Fabliaux, 25, 28, 44, 47
 Fabyan, 60
 Fairfax, Edward, 84, 87
 Falconer, William, 393
 Fanshawe, Sir Richard, 187
 Farmer, Dr Richard, 381
 Farquhar, George, 255
 Feltham, Owen, 198
 Fenton, Elijah, 289
 Ferguson, Dr Adam, 378
 Fergusson, Robert, 411
 Ferguson, Sir Samuel, 584
 Ferrers, George, 85
 Ferrier, Miss, 498
 Field, Nathaniel, 176
 Fielding, Henry, 340
 —, Sarah, 354
 Filmer, Sir Robert, 221
 Finlay, George, 587
 Finnesburg, Battle of (Saxon poem), 17
 Fisher, Bishop, 69
 —, Edward, 286
 Fiamsteed, John, 281
 Flavel, John, 285
 Fletcher, Sir Andrew, 330
 —, Giles, 84, 87
 —, John, 165
 —, Phineas, 84, 87
 Florence of Worcester, 22
 Foote, Samuel, 405
 Ford, John, 171
 Forster, John, 587
 Fortescue, Chief Justice, 57
 Foster, John, 523

GREVILLE

- Fox, George, 196
 Foxe, John, 60
 Fraser, James Baillie, 504
 Freeman, Edward Augustus, 578-580
 Frere, John, 476
 Fridegode, 18
 Froissart, Chronicle of, 25, translated into English, 60
 Froude, Richard Harrell, 592
 Fuller, Thomas, 191

G

- Gale, Theophilus, 285
 Galt, John, 495
 Garrick, David, 405
 Garth, Sir Samuel, 309
 Gascoigne, George, 70
 Gaskell, Mrs, 590
 Gauden, John, 198
 Gay, John, 307
 Geoffrey, 21
 — de Vinsauf, 23, 25
 — Gaimar, 25
 — of Monmouth, 28
 Gesta Romanorum, 44, 46
 Gibbon, Edward, 359
 Gifford, William, 528
 Gilbert, William, 280
 Gildas, Histories of, 18
 Gillies, Dr John, 544
 Glapthorne, Henry, 176
 Glascock, Captain, 513
 Gleig, George Robert, 503
 Glover, Richard, 410
 Godfrey, prior, 21
 Godwin, William, 487
 Goldsmith, Oliver, 350
 Gower, 30, 45, 51-54
 Grafton, Richard, 109
 Grahame, James, 476
 Grainger, James, 393, 410
 Grammaticus See Alfrie
 Granger, James, 380
 Grandville, George See Lansdowne.
 Grant, David, 583
 —, Thomas, 388
 Green, John Richard, 577-9
 —, Matthew, 383
 Greene, Robert, 109, 130
 —, Thomas Hill, 593
 Greenwell, Dora, 585
 Greville, Fulke, Lord Brooke, 86

GRIMOALD

Grimoald, Nicholas, 68
 Grosseteste, Robert, 21, 24, 25
 Grote, George, 519
 Gnest, Edwin, 589
 Guillaume de Lorris, 35

H.

Habington, William, 186
 Hailes, Lord, 380
 Hakluyt, Richard, 91
 Hale, Sir Matthew, 226
 Hailes, Alexander, 22
 —, John, 188
 Halifax, Earl of, 249
 —, Marquess of, 246
 Hall, Edward, 60
 —, Joseph, 83, 84, 198
 —, Robert, 523
 Hallam, Henry, 521
 Halley, Edmund, 281
 Halyburton, Thomas, 286
 Hamilton, Mrs Elizabeth, 504
 —, Sir William, 524
 Hamley, General, 592
 Harding, John, 61, 68
 Harrington, James, 59, 220
 —, John (the father), 87
 —, Sir John (the son), 87
 Hartley, David, 378
 Harvey, Gabriel, 73
 —, William, 280
 Hathaway, Ann, wife of Shakspeare, 136,
 Hawes, Stephen, 64
 Hawker, Robert Stephen, 583
 Hawkesworth, John, 366
 Hayley, William, 410
 Hayward, Sir John, 110
 Hazlitt, William, 543
 Heber, Dr Reginald, 476
 Helps, Sir Arthur, 586
 Hemans, Mrs, 475
 Henry VIII, 58
 —, Matthew, 285
 — of Huntingdon, 23, 24
 —, Dr Robert, 379
 Henryson, Robert, 58, 68
 Herbert, George, 178
 —, Lord, 107
 —, Rev William, 476
 Hereford, translator of the Old Testament, 55

ISCANUS

Herman, Bishop, 21
 Herrick, Robert, 180
 Hervey, James, 377
 —, Lord, 379
 Heylin, Peter, 198
 Heywood, John, 116
 Heywood, Thomas, 174
 Higgins, John, 85
 Hilarius, 24
 Hill, Aaron, 410
 Hoadley, Benjamin, 376
 Hobbes, Thomas, 108
 Hogg, James, 478
 Holcroft, Thomas, 504
 Holinshed, Raphael, 90
 Home, Henry See Kames
 —, John, 410
 Hood, Thomas, 478
 Hook, Theodore, 498
 —, Walter Farquhar, 587
 Hooke, Nathaniel, 380
 Hooker, Richard, 92,
 Hope, Thomas, 500
 Horne, Dr George, 376
 Horne-Tooke, John, 381
 Horner, Francis, 524
 Horsley, Dr Samuel, 376
 Hosack, John, 588
 Houghton, Lord, 583
 Howard, Mr, 503
 Howe, John, 285
 Hrolf the Ganger, 10, 12
 Hugh of Lincoln, 46
 Hughes, John, 328
 Hume, Alexander, 88
 —, David, 355
 Hunnis, William, 86
 Hunt, James Henry Leigh, 458
 Hurd, Dr Richard, 376
 Hutcheson, Dr Francis, 377
 Hutchinson, Lucy, 221
 Hyde Edward See Clarendon

I.

Inchbald, Mrs Elizabeth, 486
 Inductive Method, 101, 103, 105
 Ingulphus, 22
 Interludes, the, 116
 Ireland, William Henry, 398
 Iscanus, Josephus, 24

JAMES

J

- James G P R, 484
 James I of Scotland, 57, 68
 — VI of Scotland, 88
 Jean de Menn, 35
 Jefferies, Richard, 591
 Jeffrey, Francis, 527
 Jerrold, Douglas, 504
 Jocelin de Brakelond, 23
 John Barbour, 30, 51, 58
 — de Hauterville, 24
 — de Trevisa, 23, 51
 — of Fordun, 51
 — of Salisbury, 22, 24
 Johnson, Samuel, 362
 Johnston, Dr Arthur, 88
 Johnstone, Charles, 354
 Jones, Sir William, 381
 Jonson, Ben, 160
 Jortin, Dr John, 376
 Julius Cesar, 2
 Junius, Letters of, 372

K.

- Kames, Lord, 377
 Kave, Sir John William, 589
 Keats, John, 456
 Keble, John, 549-550
 Kemble, John Mitchell, 585
 Kennett, Basil, 379
 King, Dr Henry, 187
 Kinglake, Alexander William, 588
 Kingsley, Charles, 546-549
 Knolles, Richard, 110
 Knowles, James Sheridan, 478.
 Kyd, Thomas, 130

L.

- Laing, Malcolm, 380
 Lamb, Charles, 529
 Landon, Letitia, 477
 Landor, Walter Savage, 459
 Lanfranc, 21, 22, 23
 Langhorne, Dr John, 381
 Langlande, Robert, 50
 Langton, Stephen, 24
 Langue-d'Oc, the, 12
 Langne-d'Oil, the, 12.
 Lansdowne, Lord, 312

LYTTLETON

- Lardner, Dr Nathaniel, 377
 Latimer, 60
 Latin element in English language,
 4, 9
 Laureate Poets, 551, foll
 Law, William, 376
 Lawrence of Dunham, 24
 —, George Alfred, 591
 Laws, the Anglo-Saxon, 20
 Layamon, 26
 Lee, Harriet, 504
 —, Nathaniel, 262
 —, Sophia, 504
 Leighton, Robert, 285
 Leland, John, 69
 Lennox, Charlotte, 381.
 —, Dr., 380
 Leslie, Charles, 376
 L'Estrange, Sir Roger, 248
 Lever, 504
 Lewis, Matthew Gregory, 483
 —, Sir George Cornwall, 519
 Levden, John, 477
 Liddon, Canon, 595
 Lightfoot, Bishop, 595
 Lillo, George, 265
 Lingard, Dr John, 544
 Lister, T H., 497
 Literature, Anglo-Norman, 20-25
 —, Anglo-Norman and Anglo-Saxon, in Latin, 21
 —, earliest Anglo-Saxon, 17
 Anglo-Saxon in Latin, 18, influence of foreign scholars on, 20
 —, Old English, 27, 28
 —, Semi Saxon, 25-27
 Lithgow, William, 110
 Livingstone, David, 592
 Locke, John, 269-274.
 Lockhart, John Gibson, 504, 528
 Lodge, Thomas, 87, 131
 Logan, John, 409
 Lollius, 40
 Lombard, Peter, 21
 Lovelace, Sir Richard, 180
 Lover, 504
 Lowth, Dr Robert, 376
 —, Dr William, 235
 Lucas de Gast, 25
 Ludgate, John, 67
 Lyly, John, 109, 129
 Lyndsar, Sir David, 68
 Lyttelton, Lord, 379

LATTON

- Latton, Edward Robert, Earl of, 572-3
—, Lord, 507

M.

- Macartney, Lord, 381
Macaulay, Thomas Babington, 520
—, Mrs Catherine, 379
Mackenzie, Sir George, 286
—, Henry, 504
Mackintosh, Sir James, 513
Macpherson, James, 380, 394
Maculloch, J R, 533
Mahon, Lord, 588
Maine, Sir Henry James Sumner, 574-5
Maitland, Sir Richard, 88
Mallet, David, 325
Malone, Edmond, 381
Malory, Sir Thomas, 25, 69
Mandeville, Bernard, 225
—, Sir John de, 51
Manley, Mrs, 330
Manning, Robert, 27
Mansel, Henry Longueville, 593
Mapes or Map, Walter, 24, 25
Marlowe, Christopher, 131
Marrvat, Captain, 502
Marshman, John Clark, 589
Marston, John, 64, 174
Martineau, Harriet, 590
Marvell, Andrew, 220
Mason, William, 410
Massinger, Philip, 170
Matthew Paris, 23
Maturin, Charles Robert, 483
Maurice, Frederick Dawson, 592
Maxwell, Sir William Stirling, 589
May, Sir Erskine, 589
Melville, George John Whyte, 591
Michael of Kildare, 28
— Scot, 51
Mickle, William Julius, 408
Middleton, Dr Conyers, 379
—, Thomas, 173
Mill, James, 533, 543
—, John Stuart, 539
Miller, Hugh, 523
Milnan, H H 537
Milnes, Richard Monckton, Lord
Houghton, 583
Milton, John, 199-219, 602

OPIE

- Minot, Laurence, 30, 50
Miracle Plays, 111
Mitford, Miss, 499
—, William, 544
Monboddo, Lord, 378
Montagn, Charles See Halifax, Earl
of
—, Lady Mary, 326
Montgomery, Alexander, 88
—, James, 475
—, Robert, 477
Moore, Dr John, 504
—, Edward, 368
—, Thomas, 444-451
Moralities, the, 114, 116
Moro, Henry, 284
—, Hannah, 408
—, Sir Thomas, 58
Morgan, Lady, 496
Morie, James, 500
Mozley, James Bowling, 594
—, Thomas, 595
Mulock, Dinah Maria, 592
Munday, Anthony, 176
Murphy, Arthur, 410
Mysteries or Miracles, 111, 116

N

- Nabbes, Thomas 176
Napier, Sir William, 544
Nash, Thomas, 109, 130
Nennius, 18
Neville, Henry, 286
Newcastle, Duchess of, 187
Newman, John Henry, 550-554
Newton, Sir Isaac, 281
Neeols, Richard, 85
Nicholas Trivet, 23
Nicholson, William, 376
Norman Conquest, effects of, 9-13
— family names, 11
— French, 15 16
— influence on English language
previous to the Conquest, 9
North, Christopher See Wilson
Norton, Thomas, 118

O

- Ocelere, Thomas, 33, 67
Odo, 19
Opie, Mrs Amelia, 487

ORM OR ORMIN

- Orm or Ormin, 27
 Ormulum, the, 27
 Ossian, 394
 Otway, Thomas, 261
 Overbury, Sir Thomas, 198
 Owen, John, 285
 —, Sir Richard, 575
 Owl and Nightingale, the, 28
 Oxford, Earl of, Edward Ver, 86

P

- Paley, William, 374
 Palgrave, Sir Francis, 576
 —, William Gifford, 592
 Park, Mungo, 381
 Parnell, Thomas, 309
 Pattison, Mark, 596
 Peacock, Thomas Love, 545
 Pearson, John, 277
 Pecock, Bishop, 68
 Peele, George, 180
 Penn, William, 197
 Pepys, Samuel, 247
 Percy, Bishop, 66, 383, 412
 Peter of Blois, 22, 24
 Philippa de Roet, wife of Chaucer, 31, 32
 Philips, Ambrose, 312
 —, John, 267
 —, Mrs Katherine, 187
 Philosophy, Scholastic, 21
 Piets, 3
 Pindar, Peter, 404
 Pinkerton, John, 380
 Piozzi, Mrs, 409
 Plegmund, 20
 Poetry, Macaronic, 24
 Poets, Laureate, 609, foll
 Pollok, Robert, 476
 Pomfret, John, 267
 Pope, Alexander, 287–294, 605
 Porson, Richard, 379
 Portet, Anna Maria, 504
 —, Jane, 504
 Potter, Dr, 379
 Præd, Winthrop Mackworth, 477
 Price, Dr Richard, 378
 Prideaux, Humphrey, 376
 Priestley, Dr Joseph, 378
 Printing, its importation into England, 57
 Prior, Matthew, 306

ROMANCE POETS.

- Procter, Adelaide Anne, 581
 —, Bryan Walter, 581
 Psalter, the Surtees, 27
 Purchas, Samuel, 91
 Purvey, 55
 Pusey, Edward Bouverie, 554
 Puttenham, Webster, 109

Q.

- Quarles, Francis, 177
 Quarterly Review, 527

R.

- Radcliffe, Ann, 482
 Raleigh, Sir Walter, 90
 Ralph or Ranulph Higden, 23, 51
 Ramsay, Allan, 311
 Randolph, Thomas, 176
 Ranulf de Glanvil, 28
 Ray, John, 282
 Reade, Charles, 591
 Reeve, Clara, 481
 Reformation, the, 56, its connection with the improvement of literature, 59
 Reid, Dr Thomas, 378
 Renaissance literature, its influence on Chaucer's writings, 34, its influence in England, 49
 Reviews, Edinburgh and Quarterly, 527
 Ricardo, David, 533
 Ricard Cœur-de-Lion, 24
 Richard of Hampole See Rolle,
 Richard
 Richardson, Samuel, 336
 Robert de Barron, 25
 — of Brunne See Mannyng
 — of Gloucester, 27
 Robertson, Edward William, 589
 —, Frederick William, 594
 —, James Craigie, 596
 —, William, 358
 Robin Hood ballads, 67
 Rochester, Earl of, 266
 Roger de Hoveden, 23
 — de Wendover, 28
 Rogers, Samuel, 475
 Rolle, Richard, 30, 49
 Romance languages, 12
 — poets, 14

ROMANCES

Romances, 25, 28, their introduction into England from France, 13
—, metrical, 28
Roman invasion, 2
— wall, 3
Roseot, William, 379
Roscommon, Earl of, 268
Rose, William Stewart, 476
Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, 584
Rowe, Nicholas, 264
Rowlands, Samuel, 87
Rowley, William, 174
Russell, Lady Rachel, 221
—, Dr William, 390,
Rutherford, Samuel, 286

S

Sackville, Thomas, 71, 81, 118
Sander son, Robert, 198
Sands, George, 110
Sattin, 23, 28
Savage, Richard, 312
Savile, George See Halifax
Saxon element in language, 8, 9
— family names, 11
— invasion, 15
Saxons, their condition under Norman rule, 10
Schoolmen, the English, 22
Seots, 3
Scott, Michael, 503
—, Sir Alexander, 88
—, Sir Walter, 412-434
Scottish poetry in fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, 57, 58, 68, 88
Seotus, Johannes Duns, 18, 22
Sedley, Sir Charles, 267
Selden, John, 80, 198
Semi-Saxon, duration of, 17.
Senior, A W, 533
Seward, Anna, 409
Shadwell, Thomas, 265
Shaftesbury, Lord, 323
Shairp, John Campbell, 560
Shakespeare, William, 134-159, 600
Sheffield See Buckingham
Shelley, Mrs, 484
—, Percy Bysshe, 451
Shenstone, William, 385
Sheridan, Frances, 381
—, Richard Brinsley, 405

SYMONDS

Sherlock, William, 279
Shirley, James, 174
Sidney, Algernon, 221
—, Philip, 73, 78, 79
Skolton, John, 58, 62
Smart, Christopher, 409.
Smith, Adam, 378
—, Albert, 504
—, Alexander, 582
—, Horace, 475
—, James, 475
—, Mrs Charlotte, 486
—, Sydney, 527
Smollett, Tobias George, 344
Somerville, William, 393
Sotheby, William, 476
South, Robert, 278
Southerne, Thomas, 263
Southery, Robert, 469
—, Mrs, 477
Southwell, Robert, 84, 86
Spedding, James, 589
Speed, John, 90
Spelman, Sir Henry, 110
Spenser, Edmund, 72-78, 599
Sprat, Thomas, 279
Stanhope, Earl, 588
Stanley, A P, 538
—, Thomas, 187
Staunton, Sir George, 381
Steele, Sir Richard, 816
Steevens, George, 381
Sterling, John, 589
Sterne, Laurence, 347
Stewart, Dugald, 378
Still, John, 119
Stillingsfleet, Edward, 278
Stirling, Earl of, 88
St John, Henry See Bolingbroke
St. Maur, Benoit de, 25
Storer, Thomas, 86
Stow, John, 90
Strickland, Agnes, 589
Styrye, John, 331
Stuart, Dr Gilbert, 380
Sueking, Sir John, 180
Snrey, Earl of, 64, 65
Swift, Jonathan, 294-305, 607
Sydenham, Thomas, 281
Silvester, Joshua, 86
Symonds, John Addington, 585

TAILLEFER.

T

- Taillefer, 25
 Talford, Thomas Noon, 477
 Taylor, dramatist, 174
 —, Jeremy, 192
 —, John, 187
 —, Sir Henry, 584
 —, Meadows, 592
 —, William, 476
 Temple, Sir William, 321
 Tennant, William, 581
 Tennyson, Alfred, Lord, 564-572
 Tennyson-Turner, Charles, 565 583
 Teutonic race, parentage of English nation traced to, 5
 Thackeray, William Makepeace, 489
 Theodore of Tarsus, 18
 Thirlwall, Bishop, 519
 Thomas Lermont, 51
 — of Kent, 25
 Thomson, James, 383
 Thornton, Bonnell, 366
 —, Edward, 589
 Thorold, 25
 Thrale, Mrs., 409
 Tickell, Thomas, 309
 Tighe, Mrs., 478
 Tillotson, Archbishop, 277
 Tindal, Dr Matthew, 377
 —, Nicholas, 377
 Tottel's Miscellany, 65, 68
 Tournour, 174
 Travellers Song, the, 17
 Travers, Walter, 92
 Trelawny, Mr, 503
 Trench, Archbishop, 594
 Trollope, Anthony, 515
 —, Mrs, 498
 —, Thomas Adolphus, 589
 Troubadours, 13
 Trouvères, 13, 25
 Tucker, Abraham, 378
 Tulloch, Principal, 596
 Turberville, George, 71
 Turner, Sharon, 544
 Tusser, Thomas, 68
 Tyndale, William, 55, 59
 Tytler, Alexander Fraser, 544
 —, Patrick Fraser, 544
 —, William, 379

WILKINS

U

- Udall, Nicholas, 119
 Universities, foundation of the English, 21
 Ussher, James, 198

V

- Vanbrugh, Sir John, 253
 Vaughan, Henry, 187
 Vaux, Lord Thomas, 68, 85
 Vere, Edward, Earl of Oxford, 86
 Verse, Leonine, 24
 Vitalis, Ordericus, 22

W.

- Wace, 25, 26
 Wakefield, Gilbert, 380
 Waller, Edmund, 182
 Walpole, Horace, 481
 Walsh, William, 249
 Walsingham, 23
 Wilton, Isaac, 245
 Warburton, Bishop, 376
 Ward, R Plumer, 497
 Warner, Dr, 380
 —, William, 86
 Warren, Samuel, 590
 Warton, Joseph, 390
 —, Thomas, 390
 Watson, Dr Richard, 376
 —, Robert, 380
 —, Thomas, 86
 Watts, Dr Isaac, 312
 Webster, John, 172
 Werfred, Bishop, 20
 Wesler, John, 377
 West, William, 411
 Whately, Archbishop, 525
 Whetstone, George, 119
 Whiston, William, 376
 Whitaker, John, 380
 White, Gilbert, 375
 —, Henry Kirke, 407
 Whitehead, William, 410
 Whitelocke, Bulstrode, 286
 Whitfield, George, 377
 Wicliffe, 30, 34, 49, 55
 Wilberforce, William, 543
 Wilfred, 19
 Wilkins, Dr John, 280

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY

William of Malmesbury, 22
 — of Occam, 22, 49
 — of Pontiers, 22
 — Lushanger, 23
 Williams, Sir Charles Hanbury, 408
 —, Isaac, 583
 Willoughby, Francis, 281
 Wilson, Professor John, 495, 503, 528
 —, Thomas, 61
 Winchelsea, Countess of, 312
 Witan, the, 20
 Witenagemot, 11
 Wither, George, 177
 Wolcot, John, 404
 Wolfe, her Charles, 475

YOUNG

Wolstan, 18
 Wood, Anthony, 286
 Wordsworth, William, 461-466
 Worsley, Philip Stanhope, 591
 Wotton, Sir Henry, 87
 —, William, 329
 Wrangham, Francis, 476
 Wulstan, 20
 Wyatt, Sir Thomas, 58, 64, 65
 Wycherley, William, 251
 Winkyn de Worde, 51
 Wyntoun, Andrew, 51

Y.

Young, Edward, 310

THE END.

LONDON

PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, LIMITED, STAMFORD STREET AND CHARING CROSS

50, ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON
September, 1896

MR. MURRAY'S LIST OF SCHOOL BOOKS.

MURRAY'S STUDENT'S MANUALS.

A Series of Class-books for advanced Scholars.

FORMING A CHAIN OF HISTORY FROM THE EARLIEST AGES
DOWN TO MODERN TIMES.

English History and Literature.

"The great foundation for all useful knowledge we hold without any doubt, to be the knowledge of the history and literature of our own country. On this ground Mr Murray is especially strong. We are acquainted with many admirable books on these subjects, issued by various firms of high standing, some of which, such as Mr Green's and Mr Bright's have universally recognized merits; but for the utility and completeness of the course we give the first place to Mr Murray's series."—Literary Churchman.

THE STUDENT'S HUME A HISTORY OF ENGLAND,
FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE REVOLUTION IN 1688 By DAVID HUME Incorporating the Researches of recent Historians.
Now Edition revised, corrected and continued to the Treaty of Berlin in 1878, by J S BREWER, M A With Notes, Illustrations, and 7 Coloured Maps and Woodcuts. (830 pp) Post 8vo 7s 6d.

* Also in Three Parts 2s 6d each

- I. FROM B.C. 55 TO THE DEATH OF RICHARD III, A.D. 1485.
- II. HENRY VII TO THE REVOLUTION, 1688
- III. THE REVOLUTION TO THE TREATY OF BERLIN, 1878.

* Questions on the "Student's Hume" 12mo 2s

STUDENT'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND FROM THE ACCESSION OF HENRY VII TO THE DEATH OF GEORGE II By HENRY HALLAM, LL.D (680 pp) Post 8vo 7s 6d

STUDENT'S MANUAL OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE By GEORGE P MARSH (538 pp.) Post 8vo 7s 6d

STUDENT'S MANUAL OF ENGLISH LITERATURE By T B SHAW, M.A. (510 pp.) Post 8vo. 7s 6d

STUDENT'S SPECIMENS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE Selected from the BEST WRITERS, and arranged Chronologically By THOS. B SHAW, M.A. (560 pp) Post 8vo 5s

Scripture and Church History.

- STUDENT'S OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY FROM THE CREATION OF THE WORLD TO THE RETURN OF THE JEWS FROM CAPTIVITY With an Introduction to the Books of the Old Testament. By PHILIP SMITH, B.A. With 40 Maps and Woodcuts. (630 pp) Post 8vo 7s 6d
- STUDENT'S NEW TESTAMENT HISTORY WITH AN INTRODUCTION, CONTAINING THE CONNECTION OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS By PHILIP SMITH, B.A. With 30 Maps and Woodcuts (680 pp) Post 8vo 7s 6d
- STUDENT'S MANUAL OF ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY A History of the Christian Church to the Reformation By PHILIP SMITH, B.A. 2 vols. Post 8vo 7s 6d each PART I—A.D. 30—1003. (654 pp) With Woodcuts.
 PART II—A.D. 1003—1614 (744 pp) With Woodcuts.
- STUDENT'S MANUAL OF ENGLISH CHURCH HISTORY By G. G. PERRY, M.A., Canon of Lincoln 3 Vols. 7s 6d each.
1st Period From the Planting of the Church in Britain to the Accession of Henry VIII A.D. 596—1509 (576 pp)
2nd Period From the Accession of Henry VIII to the Silencing of Convocation in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY (A.D. 1509—1717) (635 pp)
3rd Period From the Accession of the House of Hanover to the Present Time. (A.D. 1717—1884) (578 pp.)

Ancient History.

- STUDENT'S ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE EAST From the Earliest Times to the Conquests of Alexander the Great, including Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Media, Persia, Asia Minor, and Phœnicia By PHILIP SMITH, B.A. With 70 Woodcuts. (608 pp) Post 8vo 7s 6d
- STUDENT'S HISTORY OF GREECE FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE ROMAN CONQUEST With Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By SIR WM SMITH, D.C.L. With Coloured Maps and Woodcuts. (640 pp) Post 8vo 7s 6d
 * * Questions on the 'Student's Greece' 12mo 2s
- STUDENT'S HISTORY OF ROME FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE EMPIRE. With Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By DEAN LIDDELL. With Coloured Map and Woodcuts (686 pp) Post 8vo 7s 6d
- STUDENT'S HISTORY OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE FROM THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE EMPIRE TO THE ACCESSION OF COSMODOUS A.D. 180. With Coloured Maps and Numerous Illustrations. By J. B. BURY, Fellow of Trin. Coll., Dublin. (626 pp) Post 8vo. 7s 6d
- STUDENT'S GIBBON AN EPITOME OF THE HISTORY OF THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. By EDWARD GIBBON Incorporating the Researches of Recent Historians. With 100 Woodcuts. (700 pp) Post 8vo. 7s 6d

Europe.

STUDENT'S HISTORY OF MODERN EUROPE

FROM THE CAPTURE OF CONSTANTINOPLE BY THE TURKS, 1453.
TO THE TREATY OF BERLIN, 1878. By RICHARD LODGE, M.A.
Fellow of B.N.C., Oxford (800 pp.) Post 8vo 7s 6d

"Mr. Lodge has treated this wide subject in a broad and intelligent spirit. While his pages abound in facts, he has not been content to give a mere crowded summary of events: he presents us with many sound and thoughtful remarks on the tendencies of each of his periods. His grasp is firm and he never loses his way amidst a multitude of details: above all we believe that we are justified in saying that it is minutely accurate. —Journal of Education"

STUDENT'S HISTORY OF EUROPE DURING THE MIDDLE AGES. By HENRY HALLAM, LL.D. (650 pp.)

Post 8vo. 7s 6d.

France.

STUDENT'S HISTORY OF FRANCE FROM THE

EARLIEST TIMES TO THE FALL OF THE SECOND EMPIRE. With Notes and Illustrations on the Institutions of the Country. By W. H.
JERVIS, M.A. 4 Coloured Maps and Woodcuts. (760 pp.) 7s 6d.

Geography and Geology.

STUDENT'S MANUAL OF ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY

By CANON BEVAN, M.A. 150 Woodcuts. (710 pp.) 7s 6d.

STUDENT'S MANUAL OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY

MATHEMATICAL, PHYSICAL, AND DESCRIPTIVE. By CANON
BEVAN, M.A. With 120 Woodcuts. (684 pp.) Post 8vo 7s 6d.

STUDENT'S GEOGRAPHY OF BRITISH INDIA,

POLITICAL AND PHYSICAL. By GEORGE SMITH LL.D. With Maps. Post 8vo 7s 6d.

STUDENT'S ELEMENTS OF GEOLOGY By SIR

CHARLES LYELL. A New Edition thoroughly revised by PROF. J. W. JUDD. With 600 Woodcuts. 9s.

PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY By MARY SOMERVILLE.

7th Edition, corrected and revised. Post 8vo 9s.

A DICTIONARY OF PLACE NAMES Giving their

Derivations. By C. BLACKIE. With an Introduction by JOHN STUART BLACKIE. Crown 8vo 7s.

Law and Philosophy.

- STUDENT'S MANUAL OF MORAL PHILOSOPHY
With Quotations and References. By WILLIAM FLEMING
D D (440 pp.) Post 8vo 7s 6d
- STUDENT'S EDITION OF AUSTIN'S JURISPRUDENCE
Compiled from the larger work. By ROBERT CAMP
BELL (544 pp.) Post 8vo 12s
- AN ANALYSIS OF AUSTIN'S JURISPRUDENCE.
By GORDON CAMPBELL (214 pp.) Post 8vo. 6s.

Sir Wm Smith's Smaller Manuals

These Works have been drawn up for the Lower Forms, at the request of several teachers who require more elementary books than the STUDENT'S HISTORICAL MANUALS.

- SMALLER SCRIPTURE HISTORY OF THE OLD AND THE NEW TESTAMENT IN THREE DIVISIONS — I Old Testament History II Connection of Old and New Testaments. III New Testament History to A.D 70 Edited by SIR WM SMITH With Coloured Maps and 40 Illustrations. (370 pp.) 16mo 3s 6d.

This book is intended to be used with, and not in the place of, the Bible.

"Students will know the value of Dr Wm. Smith's larger Scripture History. This abridgment omits nothing of importance, and is presented in such a handy form that it cannot fail to become a valuable aid to the less learned Bible Student."—People's Magazine.

- SMALLER ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE EAST FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE CONQUEST OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT By PHILIP SMITH, B.A. With 70 Woodcuts. (310 pp.) 16mo 3s 6d.

"This book is designed to aid the study of the Scriptures, by placing in their true historical relations those allusions to Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Phoenicia, and the Medo-Persian Empire, which form the background of the history of Israel from Abraham to Nehemiah. The present work is an indispensable adjunct of the 'Smaller Scripture History' and the two have been written expressly to be used together."

- SMALLER HISTORY OF GREECE FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE ROMAN CONQUEST By SIR WM SMITH With Coloured Maps and 74 Woodcuts. (268 pp.) 16mo 3s 6d.

This history has been drawn up at the request of several teachers for the use of lower forms, elementary pupils. The table of contents presents a full analysis of the work, and has been so arranged, that the teacher can frame from it QUESTIONS FOR THE EXAMINATION OF HIS CLASS the answers to which will be found in the corresponding pages of the volume.

- SMALLER HISTORY OF ROME FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE EMPIRE. By SIR WM SMITH, D.C.L. With Coloured Map and 70 Woodcuts. (324 pp.) 16mo 3s 6d.

The "Smaller History of Rome" has been written and arranged on the same plan, and with the same object as the "Smaller History of Greece." Like that work it comprises separate chapters on the institutions and literature of the countries with which it deals.

SMALLER CLASSICAL MYTHOLOGY With Translations from the Ancient Poets, and Questions on the Work. By H. R. LOCKWOOD With 90 Woodcuts. (300 pp) 16mo. 3s 6d.

This work has been prepared by a lady for the use of schools and young persons of both sexes. In common with many other teachers, she has long felt the want of a consecutive account of the heathen deities which might safely be placed in the hands of the young and yet contain all that is generally necessary to enable them to understand the classical allusions they may meet with in prose or poetry, and to appreciate the meanings of works of art.

A carefully prepared set of QUESTIONS is appended, the answers to which will be found in the corresponding pages of the volume.

SMALLER MANUAL OF ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY By CANON BEVAN, M.A. (240 pp) With Woodcuts. 16mo. 3s 6d.

"This work has been drawn up chiefly for the lower forms in schools, at the request of several teachers who require for their pupils a more elementary work than the Student's Manual of Ancient Geography. The arrangement of the two works is substantially the same. The more important towns alone are mentioned, the historical notices are curtailed, modern names are introduced only in special cases, either for the purpose of identification or where any noticeable change has occurred, and the quotations from classical works are confined for the most part to such expressions as are illustrative of local peculiarities. A very ample Index is supplied, so that the work may supply the place of a dictionary for occasional reference."

SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE YEAR 1887 28th Edition, Revised and Enlarged. By RICHARD LODGE, M.A. With Coloured Maps and 68 Woodcuts. (400 pp) 16mo. 3s 6d.

"The most recent authorities have been consulted, and it is confidently believed that the Work will be found to present a careful and trustworthy account of English History for the lower forms in schools, for whose use it is chiefly intended."—Preface

"This little volume is so pregnant with valuable information, that it will enable anyone who reads it attentively to answer such questions as are set forth in the English History Papers in the Indian Civil Service Examinations."—Reader

SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE Giving a Sketch of the Lives of our Chief Writers. By JAMES ROWLEY (276 pp.) 16mo. 3s 6d.

The important position which the study of English literature is now taking in education has led to the publication of this work, and of the accompanying volume of specimens. Both books have been undertaken at the request of many eminent teachers, and no pains have been spared to adapt them to the purpose for which they are designed—as elementary works to be used in schools.

SHORT SPECIMENS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE Selected from the chief authors and arranged chronologically. By JAMES ROWLEY With Notes. (368 pp) 16mo. 3s 6d.

While the "Smaller History of English Literature" supplies a rapid but trustworthy sketch of the lives of our chief writers, and of the successive influences which imparted to their writings their peculiar character, the present work supplies choice examples of the works themselves, accompanied by all the explanations required for their perfect explanation. The two works are thus especially designed to be used together.

Sir Wm Smith's Biblical Dictionaries.

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE COMPRISING ITS ANTIQUITIES, BIOGRAPHY, GEOGRAPHY, AND NATURAL HISTORY
By Various Writers With Illustrations. 3 vols. Enlarged and Revised Edition. Medium 8vo £4 4s

"The most complete, learned, and trustworthy work of the kind hitherto produced."—Athenæum.

CONCISE DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE Condensed from the larger Work. For Families and Students. With Maps and 300 Illustrations. (1039 pp.) 8vo 21s

A Dictionary of the Bible, in some form or another, is indispensable for every family. To students in the Universities, and in the Upper Forms at Schools to private families, and to that numerous class of persons who desire to arrive at results simply, this CONCISE DICTIONARY will, it is believed supply all that is necessary for the elucidation and explanation of the Bible.

SMALLER DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE
Abridged from the larger Work. For Schools and Young Persons.
With Maps and Illustrations. (620 pp.) Crown 8vo. 7s 6d

"An invaluable service has been rendered to students in the condensation of Dr Wm. Smith's Bible Dictionary. The work has been done as only a careful and intelligent scholar could do it, which preserves to us the essential scholarship and value of each article."—British Quarterly Review

The two following Works are intended to furnish a complete account of the leading personages, the Institutions, Art, Social Life, Writings, and Controversies of the Christian Church from the time of the Apostles to the Age of Charlemagne. They commence at the period at which the 'Dictionary of the Bible' leaves off, and form a continuation of it

DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES
The History, Institutions and Antiquities of the Christian Church.
Edited by SIR WM SMITH, D C.L., and ARCHDEACON CHEET-
HAM, D D With Illustrations. 2 vols. Medium 8vo. £3 13s. 6d.

"The work before us is unusually well done. A more acceptable present for a candidate for holy orders, or a more valuable book for any library, than the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities could not easily be found."—Saturday Review

DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY, LIT-ERATURE SECTS, AND DOCTRINES Edited by SIR WM
SMITH, D C.L., and HENRY WACE, D D 4 Vols. Medium
8vo £6 16s 6d

"The value of the work arises, in the first place, from the fact that the contributors to these volumes have diligently eschewed mere compilation. In these volumes we welcome the most important addition that has been made for a century to the historical library of the English theological student."—Times.

Sir Wm Smith's Classical Dictionaries.

AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF CLASSICAL ANTIQUITY.

By VARIOUS WRITERS. Edited by SIR WM SMITH, D.C.L. and LL.D.

'It is an honour to this College to have presented to the world so distinguished a scholar as Dr Wm Smith who has, by his valuable manuals of classical antiquity and classical history and biography, done as much as any man living to promote the accurate knowledge of the Greek and Roman world among the students of this age.'—Mr Grote at the London University

I. DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQUITIES.

Including the Laws, Institutions, Domestic Usages, Painting, Sculpture, Music, the Drama, &c. 3rd Edition, Revised and Enlarged. With 900 Illustrations. 2 Vols. Medium 8vo. £3 3s

II. DICTIONARY OF BIOGRAPHY AND MYTHOLOGY

Containing a History of the Ancient World, Civil, Literary and Ecclesiastical (1700 pp.) With 520 Illustrations. 3 vols. Medium 8vo. £4s

III. DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN GEOGRAPHY

Including the Political History of both Countries and Cities, as well as their Geography (1500 pp.) With 530 Illustrations. 2 vols. Medium 8vo. 56s

FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

CLASSICAL DICTIONARY OF BIOGRAPHY, MYTHOLOGY, AND GEOGRAPHY

For the Higher Forms in Schools. Condensed from the larger Dictionaries. New and Revised Edition, by G. L. MARINDIN. With over 800 Woodcuts. 8vo. 16s

SMALLER CLASSICAL DICTIONARY

For Junior Classes. Abridged from the above Work. With 200 Woodcuts. Crown 8vo. 7s 6d

SMALLER DICTIONARY OF ANTIQUITIES

For Junior Classes. Abridged from the larger Work. With 200 Woodcuts. Crown 8vo. 7s 6d.

Sir Wm Smith's Ancient Atlas.

AN ATLAS OF ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY, BIBLICAL

AND CLASSICAL. Intended to illustrate the "Dictionary of the Bible," and the "Classical Dictionaries." Compiled under the superintendence of SIR WM SMITH, D.C.L., and SIR GEORGE GROVE, LL.D. With Descriptive Text, Indices, &c. With 43 Maps. Folio, half bound. Price Six Guineas.

'The students of Dr Smith's admirable Dictionaries most have felt themselves in want of an Atlas constructed on the same scale of precise and minute information with the article they were reading. This want has at length been supplied by the superb work before us. The indices are full, the engraving is exquisite and the delineation of the natural features very minute and beautiful. It may safely be pronounced—and higher praise can scarcely be bestowed—to be a worthy companion of the volumes which it is intended to illustrate.'—Guardian.

8 MR. MURRAY'S LIST OF SCHOOL

Sir Wm. Smith's Latin Dictio

"I consider Dr Wm Smith's Dictionaries to have conferred service on the cause of classical learning in this country"

I have found Dr Wm. Smith's Latin Dictionary a great work. I think that he has been very judicious in what he has omitted, has inserted."—Dr SCOTT.

A COMPLETE LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY

ON THE WORKS OF FORCELLINI AND FREUND WITH A Roman Calendar, Measures, Weights, Money, and a PROPER NAMES By SIR WM SMITH, D.C.
(1200 pp) Medium 8vo 21st Edition 16s

This work aims at performing the same service for the Latin as Liddell and Scott's Lexicon has done for the Greek. It has been paid to Etymology, in which department especially, to maintain a superiority over all existing Latin Dictionaries.

A SMALLER LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY

A SEPARATE DICTIONARY OF PROPER NAMES, TERMS, MONIES, &c. 33rd Edition Thoroughly revised and re-written Edited by SIR WM SMITH and T D L
The Etymological portion by JOHN K. INGRAM,
12mo. 7s 6d

This edition of Dr Smith's 'Smaller Latin English Dictionary' gives in great extent a new and original Work. Every article revised.

A COPIOUS AND CRITICAL ENGLISH-LATIN

DICTIONARY Compiled from Original Sources By SIR
D C L and T D HALL, M.A. (970 pp) Medium 8vo
Edition 16s

It has been the object of the Authors of this Work to produce a more complete and more perfect ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY than any other. Every article has been the result of original and independent research.

Each meaning is illustrated by examples from the best authors. Those phrases are as a general rule given in both English and Latin.

A SMALLER ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY

from the above Work, by SIR WM SMITH and T D L for the use of Junior Classes. 16th Edition (730 pp) 7s 6d.

"An English Latin Dictionary worthy of the scholarship of the country. It will take absolutely the first rank, and be the standard Latin Dictionary as long as either tongue endures. Even a single volume of the pages will serve to reveal the minute pains taken in fulness and philological value, and the work is to a large extent an English language, as well as an English Latin Dictionary." English Churchman.

A NEW GRADUS AD PARNASSUM

AN ENGLISH-LATIN GRADUS, OR VER

TICTIONARY, on a new plan with carefully selected
Synonyms, intended to Simplify the Composition of Latin
A. C. AINGER, M.A., Trinity Coll., Cambridge,
WINTLE, M.A., Christ Church, Oxford. (450 pp)

MR MURRAY'S LIST OF SCHOOL BOOKS.

Sir Wm Smith's Educational Series.

Latin Course

THE YOUNG BEGINNERS COURSE.

2s each

I. FIRST LATIN BOOK.—Grammar, Easy Questions, Exercises, and Vocabularies.

II. SECOND LATIN BOOK.—An easy Latin Reading Book with Analysis of Sentences

III. THIRD LATIN BOOK.—Exercises on the Syntax, with Vocabularies.

IV. FOURTH LATIN BOOK.—A Latin Vocabulary for Beginners, arranged according to Subjects and Etymologies

PRINCIPIA LATINA, Part I FIRST LATIN COURSE
Grammar, Delectus, Exercises, and Vocabularies (218 pp) 12mo 3s 6d

APPENDIX TO PRINCIPIA LATINA, Part I Containing
Additional Exercises, with Examination Papers. (125 pp.) 12mo 2s 6d.

PRINCIPIA LATINA, Part II READING BOOK. An Introduction to Ancient Mythology, Geography, Roman Antiquities, and History With Notes and a Dictionary (268 pp) 12mo 3s 6d

PRINCIPIA LATINA, Part III POETRY 1. Easy
Hexameters and Pentameters. 2. Eclogæ Ovidianæ. 3. Prosody and Metre. 4. First Latin Verse Book (160 pp) 12mo 3s 6d.

PRINCIPIA LATINA, Part IV PROSE COMPOSITION Rules of Syntax, with Examples, Explanations of Synonyms, and Exercises on the Syntax. (194 pp) 12mo 3s 6d.

PRINCIPIA LATINA, Part V SHORT TALES AND ANECDOTES FROM ANCIENT HISTORY, FOR TRANSLATION INTO LATIN PROSE. With an English Latin Vocabulary By SIR WM
SMITH, LL.D 10th Edition, Revised and considerably Enlarged By T D HALL, M A (182 pp) 3s 6d

THE STUDENT'S LATIN GRAMMAR FOR THE USE OF COLLEGES AND THE HIGHER FORMS IN SCHOOLS By SIR WM SMITH, LL.D and T D HALL. Thirteenth Edition, thoroughly revised and partly re written. (450 pp) Post 8vo 6s

SMALLER LATIN GRAMMAR FOR THE MIDDLE AND LOWER FORMS. New and thoroughly revised Edition. (260 pp.) 12mo 3s 6d.

TRANSLATION AT SIGHT, OR, AIDS TO FACILITY IN THE TRANSLATION OF LATIN Passages of Graduated Difficulty, carefully Selected from Latin Authors, with Explanations, Notes, &c.
An entirely New and Original Work By Professor T D HALL,
M A. Crown 8vo 2s

A CHILD'S FIRST LATIN BOOK COMPRISING NOUNS, PRONOUNS, AND ADJECTIVES, WITH THE VERBS With ample and varied Practice of the easiest kind Both old and new order of Cases given. By T D HALL, M A. (124 pp) New and Enlarged Edition, including the Passive Verb. 16mo 2s.

s. Keys may be had by AUTHENTICATED TEACHERS on application.*

Sir Wm Smith's Greek Course.

INITIA GRÆCA, Part I. A FIRST GREEK COURSE, containing Grammar, Delectus, Exercise Book, and Vocabularies.
(284 pp.) 12mo. 3s 6d

The present Edition has been very thoroughly revised, and many additions
-and improvements have been introduced*

The great object of this work, as of the "Principia Latina" is to make the study of the language as easy and simple as possible, by giving the grammatical forms only as they are wanted and by enabling the pupil to translate from Greek into English and from English into Greek as soon as he has learnt the Greek characters and the First Declension. For the convenience of teachers the cases of the nouns, &c. are given according to the ordinary grammars as well as according to the arrangement of the Public Schools Latin Primer.

APPENDIX TO INITIA GRÆCA, Part I Containing Additional Exercises, with Examination Papers and Easy Reading Lessons with the Sentences Analysed, serving as an Introduction to INITIA GRÆCA, Part II (110 pp.) 12mo 2s 6d.

INITIA GRÆCA, Part II A READING BOOK Containing short Tales, Anecdotes, Fables, Mythology, and Grecian History With a Lexicon. (220 pp.) 12mo 3s 6d

INITIA GRÆCA, Part III PROSE COMPOSITION
Containing the Rules of Syntax, with Copious Examples and Exercises. (202 pp.) 12mo 3s 6d

THE STUDENT'S GREEK GRAMMAR FOR THE HIGHER FORMS. By PROFESSOR CURTIUS. Edited by SIR WM
SMITH, D.C.L. (386 pp.) Post 8vo 6s

The Greek Grammar of Dr Curtius is acknowledged by the most competent scholars to be the best representative of the present advanced state of Greek scholarship. It is, indeed, almost the only Grammar which exhibits the inflexions of the language in a really scientific form, while its extensive use in schools, and the high commendations it has received from practical teachers, are a sufficient proof of its excellence as a school book.

A SMALLER GREEK GRAMMAR. FOR THE MIDDLE
AND LOWER FORMS Abridged from the above Work. (220 pp.)
12mo. 3s 6d.

THE GREEK ACCIDENCE. Extracted from the above
Work. (125 pp.) 12mo 2s 6d

HALL'S INTRODUCTION TO THE GREEK TESTA-MENT A work designed for students possessing no previous knowledge of Greek. (210 pp.) Crown 8vo 3s 6d

LEATHES' HEBREW GRAMMAR With the Hebrew
Text of Genesis i.—vi., and Psalms i.—vi. Grammatical Analysis and Vocabulary (252 pp.) Post 8vo 7s 6d

Keys may be had by AUTHENTICATED TEACHERS on application.*

Sir Wm Smith's French Course

FRENCH PRINCIPIA, Part I A FIRST FRENCH COURSE, containing Grammar, Delectus and Exercises, with Vocabularies and Materials for French Conversation. (202 pp) 12mo. 3s 6d

This work has been compiled at the repeated request of numerous teachers who finding the "Principia Latina" and "Initia Græca" the easiest books for learning Latin and Greek, are anxious to obtain equally elementary French books on the same plan. There is an obvious gain in studying a new language on the plan with which the learner is already familiar. The main object is to enable a beginner to acquire an accurate knowledge of the chief grammatical forms, to learn their usage by constructing simple sentences as soon as he commences the study of the language, and to accumulate gradually a stock of words useful in conversation as well as in reading.

APPENDIX TO FRENCH PRINCIPIA, Part I. Containing Additional Exercises and Examination Papers. (110 pp) 12mo. 2s 6d

FRENCH PRINCIPIA, Part II A READING BOOK Containing Fables, Stories, and Anecdotes, Natural History, and Scenes from the History of France. With Grammatical Questions, Notes, and copious Etymological Dictionary (376 pp) 12mo. 4s 6d.

FRENCH PRINCIPIA, Part III PROSE COMPOSITION Containing a Systematic Course of Exercises on the Syntax, with the Principal Rules of Syntax. 12mo 4s 6d

THE STUDENT'S FRENCH GRAMMAR PRACTICAL AND HISTORICAL FOR THE HIGHER FORMS By C. HERON-WALL, with INTRODUCTION by M. LITTRÉ. (490 pp) Post 8vo 6s

This Grammar is the work of a practical teacher of twenty years experience in teaching English boys. It has been his special aim to produce a book which would work well in schools where Latin and Greek form the principal subjects of study.

"This book as a whole is quite a monument of French Grammar, and cannot fail to become a standard work in high class teaching."—School Board Chronicle

"It would be difficult to point more clearly to the value of Mr Wall's work, which is intended for the use of Colleges and Upper Forms in schools, than by quoting what M. Littré says of it in an introductory letter—"I have carefully tested the principal parts of your work, and have been completely satisfied with the accuracy and correctness which I found there."—Saturday Review

A SMALLER FRENCH GRAMMAR. FOR THE MIDDLE AND LOWER FORMS. Abridged from the above Work. (230 pp.) 12mo 3s 6d

. Keys may be had by AUTHENTICATED TEACHERS on application.

Sir Wm Smith's Greek Course

INITIA GRÆCA, Part I. A FIRST GREEK COURSE, containing Grammar, Delectus, Exercise Book, and Vocabularies. (284 pp) 12mo. 3s 6d.

* * The present Edition has been very thoroughly revised, and many additions and improvements have been introduced.

The great object of this work as of the "Principia Latina," is to make the study of the language as easy and simple as possible, by giving the grammatical forms only as they are wanted and by enabling the pupil to translate from Greek into English and from English into Greek as soon as he has learnt the Greek characters and the first Declension. For the convenience of teachers the cases of the nouns, &c. are given according to the ordinary grammars as well as according to the arrangement of the Public Schools Latin Primer.

APPENDIX TO INITIA GRÆCA, Part I Containing Additional Exercises, with Examination Papers and Easy Reading Lessons with the Sentences Analysed, serving as an Introduction to INITIA GRÆCA, Part II (110 pp.) 12mo 2s 6d

INITIA GRÆCA, Part II. A READING BOOK Containing short Tales, Anecdotes, Fables, Mythology, and Grecian History With a Lexicon. (220 pp) 12mo 3s 6d.

INITIA GRÆCA, Part III PROSE COMPOSITION Containing the Rules of Syntax, with Copious Examples and Exercises. (202 pp) 12mo. 3s 6d

THE STUDENT'S GREEK GRAMMAR FOR THE HIGHER FORMS. By PROFESSOR CURTIUS Edited by SIR WM SMITH, D.C.L. (326 pp) Post 8vo 6s

The Greek Grammar of Dr Curtius is acknowledged by the most competent scholars to be the best representative of the present advanced state of Greek scholarship. It is, indeed, almost the only Grammar which exhibits the inflections of the language in a really scientific form; while its extensive use in schools, and the high commendations it has received from practical teachers, are a sufficient proof of its excellence as a school book.

A SMALLER GREEK GRAMMAR FOR THE MIDDLE AND LOWER FORMS Abridged from the above Work. (220 pp) 12mo. 3s 6d.

THE GREEK ACCIDENCE Extracted from the above Work. (125 pp) 12mo 2s 6d.

HALL'S INTRODUCTION TO THE GREEK TESTAMENT A work designed for students possessing no previous knowledge of Greek (210 pp) Crown 8vo 3s 6d

LEATHES' HEBREW GRAMMAR With the Hebrew Text of Genesis i.—vi., and Psalms i.—vi. Grammatical Analysis and Vocabulary (252 pp.) Post 8vo 7s 6d

* * May be had by AUTHENTICATED TEACHERS on application.

English Course—continued.

PRIMARY ENGLISH GRAMMAR for Elementary Schools

With 134 Exercises and carefully graduated parsing lessons. 1,
T D HALL, M A (120 pp.) 16mo 1s

This Work aims at the clearest and simplest statement possible of the first principles of English Grammar for the use of children from about eight to twelve years of age.

"We doubt whether any grammar of equal size could give an introduction to the English language more clear, concise, and full than this."—Watchman.

SCHOOL MANUAL OF ENGLISH GRAMMAR With

194 Exercises. By Sir WM SMITH, D C L., and T D HALL
M A. With Appendices. Eighth Edition, carefully revised (270 pp.) Post 8vo 3s 6d

This Work has been prepared with a special view to the requirements of Schools in which English, as a living language is systematically taught, and differs from most modern grammars in its thoroughly practical character. A distinguishing feature of the book is the constant appeal for every usage to the authority of Standard English Authors.

"An admirable English Grammar. We cannot give it higher praise than to say that as a school grammar it is the best in this country."—English Churchman.

. Keys may be had by AUTHENTICATED TEACHERS on application.

MANUAL OF ENGLISH COMPOSITION With

Copious Illustrations and Practical Exercises. Suited equally for Schools and for Private Students of English. By T D HALL, M A.
Fourth Edition. (210 pp.) 12mo 3s. 6d.

"Certainly the most sensible and practical book upon English composition that we have lately seen. The great variety of subjects which it suggests as themes for exercising the imagination as well as the literary powers of young students will be found a great assistance to teachers, who must often be sorely puzzled to hit upon subjects sufficiently diversified without being ridiculously beyond the scope of youthful experience."—Saturday Review

PRIMARY HISTORY OF BRITAIN for Elementary

Schools. Edited by Sir WM SMITH, D C L. and LL D With a Map (420 pp.) 12mo. 2s 6d

A New and thoroughly revised Edition, continued down to 1880.

Sir Wm Smith's German Course.

GERMAN PRINCIPIA, Part I. A FIRST GERMAN COURSE. Containing Grammar, Delectus, Exercises, Vocabularies and materials for German Conversation. (244 pp) 12mo 3s 6d.

* The present edition has undergone a very careful revision, and various improvements and additions have been introduced.

This work is on the same plan as the "French Principia," and therefore requires no further description except in one point. Differing from the ordinary grammars, all German words are printed in Roman, and not in the old German characters. The Roman letters are used by many modern German writers, and also in Grimm's great Dictionary and Grammar and it is believed that this alteration will facilitate, more than at first might be supposed, the acquisition of the language. But at the same time, as many German books continue to be printed in the German characters, the exercises are printed in both German and Roman letters.

GERMAN PRINCIPIA, Part II A READING BOOK. Containing Fables, Stories, and Anecdotes, Natural History, and Scenes from the History of Germany With Grammatical Questions, Notes, and Dictionary (272 pp) 12mo 3s 6d.

PRACTICAL GERMAN GRAMMAR With a Sketch of the Historical Development of the Language and its Principal Dialects. (240 pp) Post 8vo 3s 6d.

* Keys may be had by AUTHENTICATED TEACHERS on application.

Sir Wm Smith's Italian Course.

ITALIAN PRINCIPIA, Part I A FIRST ITALIAN COURSE. Containing a Grammar, Delectus, Exercise Book, with Vocabularies, &c. By SIGNOR RICCI, Professor of Italian at the City of London School. (288 pp.) 12mo. 3s 6d.

ITALIAN PRINCIPIA, Part II A FIRST ITALIAN READING-BOOK, containing Fables, Anecdotes, History, and Passages from the best Italian Authors, with Questions, Notes, and an Etymological Dictionary By SIGNOR RICCI 12mo. 3s 6d.

* Keys may be had by AUTHENTICATED TEACHERS on application.

English Course

A READABLE ENGLISH DICTIONARY Etymologically arranged By DAVID MILNE, M.A. Crown 8vo 7s 6d.

"An excellent book. We gladly allow that its contents justify the title. It is sound matter very skilfully arranged."—Pall Mall Gazette

"Mr Milne has, we think, in his new Readable English Dictionary, hit the right nail on the head. We have no hesitation in pronouncing his Dictionary to be one of the most entertaining and instructive and readable books of the season."—Bookseller

English Course—continued.

PRIMARY ENGLISH GRAMMAR for Elementary Schools—

With 134 Exercises and carefully graduated parsing lessons. 1,
T D HALL, M A. (120 pp.) 16mo 1s

This Work aims at the clearest and simplest statement possible of the first principles of English Grammar for the use of children from about eight to twelve years of age.

"We doubt whether any grammar of equal size could give an introduction to the English language more clear, concise, and full than this."—Watchman.

SCHOOL MANUAL OF ENGLISH GRAMMAR With

194 Exercises. By SIR WM SMITH, D C.L., and T D HALL, M A. With Appendices. Eighth Edition, carefully revised. (270 pp.) Post 8vo 3s 6d

This Work has been prepared with a special view to the requirements of Schools in which English, as a living language, is systematically taught, and differs from most modern grammars in its thoroughly practical character. A distinguishing feature of the book is the constant appeal for every usage to the authority of Standard English Authors.

"An admirable English Grammar. We cannot give it higher praise than to say that as a school grammar it is the best in this country."—English Churchman.

*•• Keys may be had by AUTHENTICATED TEACHERS on application.

MANUAL OF ENGLISH COMPOSITION With

Copious Illustrations and Practical Exercises. Suited equally for Schools and for Private Students of English. By T D HALL, M A. Fourth Edition. (210 pp.) 12mo. 3s 6d.

"Certainly the most sensible and practical book upon English composition that we have lately seen. The great variety of subjects which it suggests as themes for exercising the imagination as well as the literary powers of young students will be found a great assistance to teachers, who must often be sorely puzzled to hit upon subjects sufficiently diversified without being ridiculously beyond the scope of youthful experience."—Saturday Review.

PRIMARY HISTORY OF BRITAIN for Elementary

Schools. Edited by SIR WM SMITH, D C.L. and LL.D. With a Map (430 pp.) 12mo. 2s 6d

A New and thoroughly revised Edition, continued down to 1880.

Eton College Books

THE ETON LATIN GRAMMAR An entirely New Work. For use in the Higher Forms. By F H RAWLINS, M A., and W R INGE, M A., Fellows of King's Coll, Cambridge, and Assistant Masters at Eton Coll (396 pp.) Crown 8vo. 6s

THE ETON ELEMENTARY LATIN GRAMMAR. For Use in the Lower Forms. Compiled with the sanction of the Headmaster By C. A. AINGER, M A., Trinity College, Cambridge, and H G WINTLE, M A., Christ Church, Oxford, Assistant Masters at Eton College. (327 pp) Crown 8vo. 3s 6d.

THE ETON PREPARATORY GRAMMAR Abridged from the above Work. (108 pp) Post 8vo 2s

THE ETON FIRST LATIN EXERCISE BOOK. Adapted to the Eton Latin Grammar (152 pp) Crown 8vo 2s 6d.

THE ETON FOURTH FORM OVID Being Easy Passages selected from the ELEGIAC POEMS of OVID and TIBULLUS. With Explanatory Notes. By H. G WINTLE. (155 pp.) 2s 6d.

THE ETON HORACE THE ODES, EPODES, AND CARMEN SÆCULARE. With Notes. By F W CORNISH, M A., Assistant-Master at Eton College. With Maps. (380 pp.) Crown 8vo. 6s

THE ETON MATHEMATICAL SERIES

I ETON EXERCISES IN ALGEBRA. By E P ROUSE and A. COCKSHOTT Crown 8vo 3s

II. ETON EXERCISES IN ARITHMETIC By REV T DALTON, M A., Assistant Master at Eton College. Crown 8vo. 3s.

Keys may be purchased by AUTHENTICATED TEACHERS on written application to the Publisher

Natural Philosophy and Science.

WORKS BY SAMUEL NEWTH, M A., D D.

Specially adapted to the Regulations of the Examinations of the University of London.

FIRST BOOK OF NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, an Introduction to the Study of Statics, Dynamics, Hydrostatics, Light, Heat, and Sound, with Examples. (200 pp.) 3s 6d

ELEMENTS OF MECHANICS, INCLUDING HYDROSTATICS. With numerous Examples. (362 pp) 8s 6d.

MATHEMATICAL EXAMPLES A Graduated Series of Elementary Examples in Arithmetic, Algebra Logarithms, Trigonometry, and Mechanics (378 pp) 8s 6d.

University Extension Manuals.

Edited by PROFESSOR KNIGHT, of St Andrew's University

The following are now ready —

AN INTRODUCTION TO MODERN GEOLOGY

By Dr R. D. ROBERTS With Illustrations and Coloured Maps 5s

THE REALM OF NATURE A Manual of Physiography By Dr HUGH ROBERT MILL 19 Coloured Maps and 68 Illustrations. 5s

THE STUDY OF ANIMAL LIFE By J ARTHUR THOMSON With many Illustrations 5s

THE ELEMENTS OF ETHICS. By J H MUIR-HEAD 3s

ENGLISH COLONIZATION AND EMPIRE By A CALDECOTT Coloured Maps and Diagrams. 3s 6d.

THE FINE ARTS By Prof BALDWIN BROWN Illustrations. 3s 6d

THE USE AND ABUSE OF MONEY. By Professor CUNNINGHAM, D D 3s

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE BEAUTIFUL By Professor KNIGHT Parts I and II 3s 6d each part.

FRENCH LITERATURE By H G KEENE. 3s

THE RISE OF THE BRITISH DOMINION IN INDIA. By Sir ALFRED LYALL From the Early Days of the East India Company With Coloured Maps. 4s 6d

THE PHYSIOLOGY OF THE SENSES By Professor McKENDRICK and Dr SNODGRASS. With Illustrations. 4s 6d

CHAPTERS IN MODERN BOTANY By Professor PATRICK GEDDES With Illustrations. 3s 6d

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION By C E MALLET, 3s 6d

ENGLISH LITERATURE By WILLIAM RENTON With Diagrams 3s 6d

LOGIC, INDUCTIVE AND DEDUCTIVE By WILLIAM MINTO, late Professor of Logic, University of Aberdeen. With Diagrams 4s 6d

GREECE IN THE AGE OF PERICLES By A J GRANT, King's College, Cambridge, and Staff Lecturer in History to the University of Cambridge With Illustrations. 3s 6d

THE JACOBAN POETS By EDMUND GOSSE. 3s 6d

THE ENGLISH NOVEL By Professor RALEIGH, University College, Liverpool 3s 6d

HISTORY OF RELIGION By ALLAN MENZIES, D D 5s

LATIN LITERATURE By J W MACKAIL, Balliol College, Oxford 3s 6d

SHAKSPERE AND HIS PREDECESSORS IN THE ENGLISH DRAMA. By F S BOAS, Balliol College, Oxford. 6s.

Mrs Markham's Histories.

"Mrs. Markham's Histories are constructed on a plan which is novel and we think well chosen, and we are glad to find that they are deservedly popular, for they cannot be too strongly recommended."—JOURNAL OF EDUCATION

HISTORY OF ENGLAND, FROM THE FIRST INVASION BY THE ROMANS TO 1880. New and revised edition With Conversations at the end of each Chapter 100 Woodcuts. (528 pp.) 3s. 6d.

HISTORY OF FRANCE, FROM THE CONQUEST OF GAUL BY JULIUS CÆSAR TO 1878 New and revised edition. Conversations at the end of each Chapter 70 Woodcuts. (550 pp.) 3s. 6d.

HISTORY OF GERMANY, FROM ITS INVASION BY MARIUS TO 1880 New and revised edition. 50 Woodcuts. (460 pp.) 3s. 6d.

LITTLE ARTHUR'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND By LADY CALLCOTT New and revised edition. Continued down to 1878 500th thousand With 36 Woodcuts. 16mo 1s. 6d.

"I never met with a history so well adapted to the capacities of children or their entertainment, so philosophical, and written with such simplicity."—MRS. MARCETT

LITTLE ARTHUR'S HISTORY OF FRANCE FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE FALL OF THE SECOND EMPIRE. With Map and Illustrations. 16mo. 2s. 6d.

"The jaded schoolboy, surfeited with tales and the 'over pressure arising from long attention to lives and adventures, will, towards the latter part of his holiday, turn with some relief to this book, and begin feasting afresh. Those who know what Little Arthur's England did to popularise the subject among little folks will know what to expect in this France. The book is capitally illustrated and very wisely the compiler does not reject the exciting and legendary parts of the subject."—Schoolmaster

ÆSOP'S FABLES A NEW VERSION Chiefly from the Original Sources. By REV THOMAS JAMES. With 100 Woodcuts. Illustrations by JOHN TENNIEL. (168 pp.) Post 8vo 2s. 6d.

"Of ÆSOP'S FABLES there ought to be in every school many copies, full of pictures."—Fraser's Magazine.

THE BIBLE IN THE HOLY LAND Extracted from Dean Stanley's work on Sinai and Palestine. With Woodcuts (210 pp.) Crown 8vo 3s. 6d.

SERMONS FOR CHILDREN PREACHED IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY By DEAN STANLEY Post 8vo 3s. 6d.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET

Bradbury, Agnew & Co. Ltd]

[Printers, Whitefriars.

